To the most High and Mighty Monarch, ELIZABETH, (my dread Sovereign) by the grace of God, Queen of England France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c.

Your labour whatsoever, in translating another man's work, I present here unto your Highness, and consecrate to the happy and immortal memory of your most sacred Majesty. An attempt (I confess) in regard of mine own imperfections, eventuous and over-bold, as the first enterprise, right hard and exposed to peril. Yet, most Worthy and Powerful Empress; Who is there so insufficient, that by the favourable aspect of your countenance, may not be graced and enabled? What so difficult and dangerous, which under the fortunate auspices of your Majesty, cannot be effected with ease and pass in safety?

Accept then, most gracious Lady, the first fruits of a few years study, for the benefit enjoyed of life and liberty. An offering, as well in that respect as of myself the meanest of many thousands, under all proportion; but considering either the argument or the first Author, not much unsitting. He, in penning the History of the greatest State in his time, for exquisite eloquence had not his equal: no more than your Highness in glorious government at this day any second: Such are the incomparable perfections resplendent in your Royal person; the wonder of the world.

Vouscsafe also, of your accustomed clemency bestowed to aliens, of your fervent zeal to learning and good letters, wherein (among other rare virtues and singular gifts seated in your Heroick mind) no Prince cometh near unto your Excellency, to reach forth your gracious hand to T. Livius: who having arrived long since and conversed as a mere stranger in this your famous Island, and now for love thereof, learned in some sort the language, humbly craved your Majesties favour to be ranked with other free denizens of that kind: so long to live under your Princely protection, as he shall duly keep his own allegiance, and acquaint your liege subjects with religious devotion after his manner, with wisdom, policy, virtue, valour, loyalty, and not other wise.

And the Almighty guard your Majesty alwayes with his holy Angels, prolong your life among us in perfect health, adorn your noble heart with divinie graces, maintain your Regal estate in all honour: bless the rest of your daies (and infinite may they be) with sweet repose and firm peace, to the joy of your true-hearted and loving people; and finally, accomplish all your desires, for present prosperity and future felicity.

Your sacred Majesties most humble and obedient subject, Philemon Holland.

TO THE READER.

Rue is that Axiome received from Philosophy: \( \text{i.e., the corruption of one thing is the generation of another.} \) Thus out of the ashes and ruins of Troy sprung the City of Rome: and by the woful fall of that one state, arose not only the most glorious empire of the Romans, but also the best writer of their history, Titus Livius. For whereas after the fatal destruction of Troy, two principal men of name remained alive, Aeneas and Antenor: the one with his fleet arriving in that coast of Italy where Tybre runneth, built Lavinium, and became the first father of the Romans, according to Virgil in the first Aeneid:

--- genus unde Latinum, Albanique patres, aeterna Roma:--- from whence are Latines come, The noble Albanes eke, and walls of stately Rome.

Antenor entered the Venice gulf, & founded the City of Padua, the native place of Livy their historiographer; as the same Poet writeth a little after:

\[ \text{Hic tamen ille urbs Padua sedesque locavit} \]

Yet here the City Padua built he: therein to plant His Trojanes, left when Troy was lost, who resting there did want.

And I wot not well, whether they were more beholden to that fortune of theirs, (whereof so much they boasted) for Aeneas the author of their beginning and admirable greatness: than for this writer Livy, who commended their deeds to everlasting fame. For from their very first rising [even with Aeneas] unto their sensible declining and decay, were not 1200 years compleat: but since Livy enchronicled their acts, fifteen hundred are come and gone: yet continue they as fresh this day as at the first, and spread still far and neer into all parts of the world: So much more durable and permanent are the memorials recorded by learned Historians, than either any Monarchy be it never so great, or all those wonderful Pyramides and Obeliskes, reared by most magnificent Kings, and mighty Emperors, to immortalize their name and memory. This T. Livius then, was born at Padua, in the year 694 after the foundation of Rome, when L. Afranius and Q. Cecilius Metellus Celer were Consuls. He flourished rished all the time of Augustus Caesar, and died in the fourth year of Tibullus. By which account he lived full LXXVI. years: as appeareth by an ancient Epitaph upon his tomb at Padua, (where it is thought he died) with the portrait of his visage: whereof the one is represented here, and the other immediately before the beginning of the History.

I had some little skill in to come as near as possibly I could, to the true meaning of the Author: making this account, that if I could approve my diligence that way to men of reason and understanding, all other my wants and defects might sooner be passed by and pardoned. A desire I had to perform, in some sort, that which is profitable to the most, namely, an English History of that C. W. which of all others (if I have any judgment) affordeth most plenteous examples of devout zeal in their kind, of wisdom, policy, justice, valour, and all virtues whatsoever. According to this purpose and intent of mine I framed my pen, nor to any affected phrase, but a mean and popular style. Wherein, if I have called again into life some old words, let it be attributed to the love of my country language: if the sentence be not so concise, couched and knit together, as the original, loath I was to be obscure and dark; have I not engliished every word aptly? Each Nation hath several manners, yea, and terms appropriate by themselves; have I varied in some places from the French or Italian? Censured I look to be, and haply reproved; but like as Alcibiades said to one, othdr6v b evob, i.e. Strike hardly (Euribades) to you hear me speak? even to I say, find fault and spare not; but withall, read the original better before ye give sentence. And howsoever I have faulted otherwise by oversight, let against it my affection and desire to do some good whiles I live to my sweet native country; add thereto the long travels that I have taken to testifie the same; and if that will not bring down the balance, let the profit and delight both, which you shall find in the argument and discourse of the history, counterpoise and overweigh my wants, more or less. And thus recommend unto my countrymen Livy in English habit; Livy (I say) who whether he were more honored whiles he lived, than beloved at this day of foreign nations, I cannot easily determine. For like as then (by the testimony of S. Hierom, and Pliny in his Epistles) there repaired many great and noble personages from the farthest parts of Spain and France, only to see his face, lor the admiration they conceived of him by the fame of his incomparable eloquence; even so of late time, his spirit (which yet liveth in his writing) hath made a voyage by Florence into the same France and Spain, and past as far as into Arabia one way, and Almain another. In which distant and remote parts he hath found such kind entertainment, not only in Courts of Emperors and Kings, in palaces of Princes and great Potentates; but also with the people in general; that they seem to strive no less (who may endow him with most ample franchises and free burgeoise) than those seven cities in old time who every one, challenged to themselves the birth of the Poet Homer. Since then, he hath thus long been desirous to cross the seas to this noble island, not as a traveller to tojourn for a time in the Court only or the Universities, but to remain here still both in City and country, and thereto, hath learned our language indifferently; let it now appear that this nation of ours (like to reap as great fruit and benefit by his acquaintance as any other) is ready to receive and embrace him as friendly as the rest.

THE FIRST BOOK OF THE HISTORIES OF TITUS LIVIUS OF PADUA, FROM THE FOUNDATION OF THE CITY OF ROME.

The Breviarium of L. Florus upon the First Book.

He comming of Æneas into Italy, and his altis there: the image of Ascanius in Alba: of Sylvius Æneas, and so forth of other Sylvii, Kings thereof, are contained in the first Book. The daughter of Numinot with child by Mars, Romulus and Remus are born. Amulius killed. The city of Rome built by Romulus. The Senate by him chosen. He made war with the Sabines. He presented unto Jupiter Feretarius the royal spoiles of their Kings, whom he slew with his own hands. He divided the people into Centuries, wassified his Fidenates and Veientianus, and was canonized a god. Numa Pompilius taught the rites and ceremonies of sacrifice and divine service, erected a Temple to Janus, and was the first that put the dores thereof, after he had made peace with all the Nations thereof: and ensuing that he had secret company and conference by night with the goddes Ægertia, won the stout and fierce hearts of the people to Religion. Tullius Holmius warred upon the Albanians, whereupon ensued the combate of the three brethren, twins on both sides. Horatius was again for killing his sister. The execution of Mertioc Sueticius, Alba raged and destroyed. The Albans made free denizens of Rome, and there dwelt. War denounced against the Sabines. Finally, Tullius was consumed with lightning. Ancus Martius renewed the ceremonies by Numa first ordained. He to the Latines, being conquered and made Citizens of Rome, he signified the mount Aventinero inhabit. He won again by force a town of the Latines called Politorium, which the old Latines had surprized and possessed themselves of and utterly destroyed it. He made the Sublician or wooden bridge over Tybris, and adjourned to the City the hill Janiculum. He enlarged the bounds of the Empire, built Oltis, and reigned three and thirty years. In the time of his reign, Lucumo the son of Demaratus a Corinthian removed from Tarquins, a City of Tuscane, and came to Rome: and there entering into amity with Ancus, went to bear the name of Tarquinius, and so to be called: and after the death of Ancus took the Kingdom upon him. He increased the number of the Senators by one hundred but subdued the Latines appointed the Circus or Theatre, for both the public games and plots; and being warred upon by the Sabines, he augmented the centuriae of the horsemen. And for to make prove and trial of Accius Navius the Augur, subduing him, he demanded of him, as they say, whether that which he conceived in his mind was possible to be effected: and when he made answer, that it was, he commanded him to cut a whele stone in two with a sword, which out of hand was by Accius done. Moreover, he was the field of the Sabines, and defeated them, pulled the City about, made the wanting links: and when he had reigned eight and thirty years, was murdered by the sons of Ancus. There succeeded after him Servius Tullius, the son of a Captive, a noble Lady of Cornulim, who being a child, and being found in the cradle, had a flame of fire (as the report goth) burning about his head. He discomfited the Veientes and Tuscanes in battle: He was the first that numbered the people of Rome, valued their goods, and instituted the Lystraum every five years, in which were reputed to have been numbered eighty thousand Citizens. He described the Clases and Centurie: set out further the bounds of the Pomeria, without and within the City walls: and put to the City the hills Quirinali, Viminatius, and Equilium. He together with the Latines founded the Temple of Diana in mount Aventine, and when he had reigned four and thirty years, he was, with the privity, and by the counsel of his daughter Tullia, murdered by L. Tarquinius, the son of Priscus. After him L. Tatinius Superbus usurped the Kingdom, without the election, either of the Senators or the people. On which day Tullia (most wicked and cursed wretche that she was) caused her Coach to be driven over the Corpse of her father, being dead on the ground. He had about him a troop of armed men for the guard of his person. By a bloody battle he put to death Turnus Herdonius. He hid war with the Volcians, and of their spoiles edificated a Temple to Jupiter, upon the hill of Capitol, where the god Terminus and goddesse Juvetus, agreed not to be displaced, whose altars could not be shirred nor removed, as the others, by The Preface of Titus Livius to his Whole Work.

Herein writing the acts and affairs of the people of Rome, from the first Foundation of the City, I shall perform a work of importance and worth my labour, either well or ill, for I write, dare I say, with both old and new Writers always perceiving themselves, either in matter to deliver more truth and certainty, or in manner of curious penning thereof, to outgo the meredleness of elder time. Howsoever it fall out this, yet will I do such, good that even I also, to the utmost of my power, have endeavoured to extenuate the worthy deeds of those people which is the sovereign of the whole world. And if, among so many Writers, my labour chance to be obscure, yet may I comfort myself in this, That they who shall darken and shew the fame, are men too highly reputed and renowned. Besides, the thing itself is of infinite toil and labour, as counting and computing from above 700 years past, and which springing from small beginning hath proceeded and grown to great, as now the renown thereof is marvelous to itself: and I doubt not, but the Readers for the most part will take but small delight and pleasure, either in those far-fetched Originals, or in the times ensuing, for hath they make to these novelties of later daies, wherein the piuance of that so mighty people hath wrought long since their own downfall and overthrow. But contrariwise will seek even this for my guardian of my pains, namely, to turn away from beholding these calamities, which our Age for many years hath seen, to long at least: whilst I call to remembrance, and wholly employ my spirit in considering of those ancient monuments of old time, exempt from care and trouble, which were able, if not to withdraw my mind as I write from the truth, yet to make it penive and heavy. For such things as are reported, either before, or at the Foundation of the City, more beautiful and out with Poets Fables, than grounded upon pure and faithful Records, I mean neither to aver nor disprove. This leave and privilege hath antiquity, by interlacing the acts of gods and men together, to make the first rising of Cities more sacred and venerable. And if it may be lawful for any people under heaven to consecrate and attribute unto the gods their Original, surely, such is the renowned martial prowess of the Romans, that all nations of the world may as well abide them to report Mars above the rest, to be the prime father both of themselves and of their first founder, as they can be content to live in subjection under them. But those and such like matters, howsoever they shall hereafter be cenured or extolled, I will not greatly weigh and regard. This would I have every man rather to think upon in good earnest, and consider with me what their life, and what their carriage was, by what men and means, both in war and peace, their dominion was achieved and enlarged. Afterward as their discipline began by little and little to shrink, let him mark how at the very first their behaviour and manners funk withall, and how full they fell more and more to decay and ruin yea, and began soon after to tumble down noight even until these our daies, wherein we can neither endure our own fores, nor suffer for the cure. For this is it that is good and profitable in an history, when a man may see and behold, as in a conspicuous monument and light from memorials the lively examples of all forts, set up in open view for his instruction, whereby he may choose for himself and his Country what to follow, as also to learn how to elchew a foul enterprize, and avoid a shameful end. But unless he be deceived with the affectionate love of mine own commenced work, never was there Common-wealth, either more mighty, more holy and devout, better florished of good prelents, or into which covetousneffe and extreme more lately crept, or wherein poverty and truftruity were to greatly or so long time honored, informuch as the more they wanted, the leffe they defir'd. Now of late daies wealth hath brought in averse abundant pleasures have kindled a desire by riot hurt, and loose life, to destroy and bring all to naught. But these complaints, which will be nothing pleasanter, no not when perhaps they shall be needful, banish we must (howsoever we do) at our first entrance of so weake a matter: when as we rather should begin (if it be the Poets use, if it were our manner also) with good prelentes and lucy forespeaking, with vows and prayers to gods and goddesse, to vouchsafe their furtherance and happy successe to the enterprize of so great a Wors.

If of all this is generally held for certain, That the Greek, after the winning of Troy, dealt cruelly with all the Trojans, save only Eneas and Antenor to whom, as well in regard of the bond of mutual entertainment, as also for that they ever prevailed peace and the rending again of H. len, they wholly forbear to shew any rigour at all, as by martial right of war they might have done. And how Antenor afterwards, accompanied with a number of Hellenists, who driven by civil discord out of Pap. Logania, and having lost at Troy their King Pylenes, were to seek both a retting place, and a Captain to conduct them, arrived through many adventures and accidents of fortune, in the inmost gulf of de the Adriatic sea: and siter they had expelled the Eugumani that inhabited between the sea and the Alps, those Hellenists together with the Trojans, kept those parts and there remained. The place where first they landed, called Troy, whereof the Territory and Seigniory thereabout was also called Troy, and the whole people in general called Hellenists. Moreover, how Eneas upon like misfortune, having fled his country, yet aspiring by the fatal direction of the deities to greater affairs, came first into Macedonia: and after into Sicily, seeking an abiding place: and failing with a fleet from Sicily arrived at length, and landed in the country of Laurentia: which place like wife was termed Troy, Where the Trojans being set a shore, having after their long wandering nothing in manner left them but ships and armour, as they forsook and broke booths out of the Countrys, King Latinus with the Aborigines, who at that time inhabited those parts, ran forth in warlike manner out of town and country, to withstand the violent invasion of these strangers. But what befall thereupon is two manner of waies reported. Some say, that Latinus being in a bastall vanquished, first made peace with Eneas, and after that allied himself to him by marriage. Others affirm, that as both armies stood ranged in bastall array, before the trumpets sounded the bastall, Latinus came forth into the Vanguard, and called out the Generals of the strangers to parle: demanding who they were, from whence they came, by what chance they departed from their own home, and to what end they entered the Laurentine borders? After that he heard the company were Trojans, the Captain Eneas, son of Venus and Anchises, and that upon the burning of their City, they having forsoke their country, sought some place to abide and build them a City in: wondred much not only at the noblenesse of the people and their leader, but also at their courageous hearts resolved either for war or peace: whereupon, by giving his right hand he plight his troth, and faithfully promised them friendship and amity. So the two Generals made a League, and each and both saluted other. And Eneas was by Latinus entertained and lodged in the Court, Whereof Latium became in presence of his familiar household gods, by giving his daughter in marriage to Eneas, joynd private alliance to the former publicke confederacy. Which thing truly put the Trojans in good hope and full assurance to end one day their wandering and flitting to and fro and to settle themselves in one certain place of abode, Hereupon, a Town they built, which Eneas of his wives name called Latium. Within a while, by this new marriage, he had issue a son: whom the parents named Aeneas. But after all this, were both Trojans and Aborigines warred upon. For Turnus King of the Rutilians, unto whom Latinus, before Eneas his coming, had been eiqueaned, taking it to heart that a stranger was preferred before him, made war both upon Eneas and Latinus: but neither Army departed from the bastall with joy and well appaid. For the Rutilians were vanquished: the Aborigines and Trojans won indeed the field, but lost their Captain Latinus. Then Turnus and the Rutilians murthering their own strength, fled for succour to the puitant and mighty Tuscians, and to their King Maximus, who keeping his Royall Court at Cer., a town in those daies of great wealth, not well pleased even from the first beginning, with the foundation of a new City and supposing the Trojans power was already much more encreased than might well stand with the safety of the borderers, joynd full willingly his forces with the Rutilians, Eneas to win the hearts of the Aborigines against to dreadfull and dangerous war. But to the end they all should not only live under one government but also be all of one name, called both Nations Latines. And from that time forth were the Aborigines no thing inferior to the Trojans in love and loyalty towards their Prince Eneas, Eneas also trufiting confidently in the valiant and faithful hearts of these two States, growing up daily more and more in mutuell amity, albeit Heteria was so mighty, that the name thereof was renowned not only throughout the inland parts, but the sea coasts also, even from one end of Italy to the other, from the

the Alps to the narrow seas of Sicily; yet whereas he might well have refuted the forces of his enemies, and maintained a defensive war within his walls, he brought his Army forth into the open field. This was the second battle that the Latines fought, and the first deed that ever Excelsius, whom he was man, achieved. And how ever by right he ought to be named, he lieth interred upon the river Numicus, and Jupiter Indiges men him call. Now was not Aesacus, Excelsius his son, ripe as yet for age to sway the Scepter, Howbeit the Royal Crown remained whole and safe for him, until he came to fourteen years of age. So long continued the state of the Latines, and the Kingdom by grand sire and father descended, unto the children, under the government only of a woman, as Proteus: of so vertuous disposition and princely carriage was Dame Laconius. Doubtfull much I stand (for who can certainly say how long ago?) whether this were that Aesacus, or one elder than he, who had to his mother Crescent, while Heron flourished; and who fled with his father from thence, and from whom being named also Julianus, the house and family of the Julian did fetch their name and pedigree. That fame Aesacus, wherefore, or of whomsoever he was born, (but Excelsius his son of a truth he was) when Laconius grew exceeding populous, left that City now flourishing and wealthy (as the world went then) unto his mother or filioperson, I wot not whether, He himself another another out of the ground under the mountain Albo, which is the situation thereof, stretching out in length on the side of the hill, was named Long Albo. Between the building of Laconius and Long Albo, which became an under-town or Colony drawn out of the other, and peopled from thence, were almost thirty years. But so might grew they, especially after the discomfiture of the Tucans, that neither upon the death of Excelsius, nor during the time of a woman's government, nor all the while that the young Prince learned to be a King, dutit either Mezentius, or the Tucans, or any other of the borderers once fir or rise in arms. But peace was concluded upon these terms, That the river Albo, which now they call Tybris, should divide the Tucans from the Latines, and limit to either of them their own bounds. After this raised Sylviaus, the son of Aesacus, born by chance within the forrests: who began Aeneas Sylvius, and he had issue Latins Sylviius, by whom were certain Colonies or petty Townships erected, and the inhabitants named Prefi Latini. And from thenceforward all the Kings of Albo continued the name of Sylviaus. This Latinus began, Albo, of Albo came Atri, Atri begat Capes, and of Capes descended Capetus: who son Tibereus in ferreting over the river Albo was drowned, and by his name renowned that river unto all posterity. Next unto him reigned Augeipp his son; and after him succeeded Romulus Sylviaus in his fathers Kingdom, who being strucken dead with a thunderbolt, left the Crown to Aesculapius. This Aesculapius was buried in that hill, which now is part of the City of Rome, and beareth his name. Then reigned Precus, who had two sons, Numitor and Amulius. And unto Numitor, because he was the elder, he bequeathed by his last will and testament the ancient Kingdom of the Sylvians line. Howbeit, might prevailed more than either the will of the father, or the reverend regard of elder brother. For Amulius having driven out Numitor, raigneth himself: and not herewith content, heareth one mischief upon another. For first he murdered the issue male of his brother: then by making Rhea Sylvia his brothers daughter a Vestal Nun that under colour of honour and dignity, by perpetual vowed virginity, he bereft her of all hope of child-bearing. But it was a fallacious thing, and (as I think) that God would, that so great a City should be built for to yield the ground and beginning of that Empire, which next under the gods is most mighty. For behold, the Vestal Virgin was by force deforced, and after delivered of two twins: and we were it the thought so in very deed, or because the name and credit of a god might carry away and close the fault more cleanly, she fathered her ballad children upon Mars. But neither god nor man was able to have her self or her children from the Kings crueltie. For the Votary was committed to close prison, and there kept bound in irons: as for the babies he commanded they should be cast into the stream of the river. But (as God would) by good the Tyber overflowed the banks, and the flowing waters on either side was nothing, rough, yet so, as there was no coming to the deep current or channel of the river; and they that brought the infants, hoped well they might be drowned in any place of the water, were it never so still and low. So to fulfill after a sort the Kings commandement, they laid the children in the next plash they came to: even whereas now standeth the fig-tree Raminus, called, as they say, Raminus: but all that ground then was nothing but waste deserts, and a very wilderness. The report yet goeth, that when the ebe and shallow water was gone, and had let on dry ground the floating goth or vealness, wherein the babies were put forth, a she-Wolf from out of the mountains thereby, being athirst, turned towards the childrens cry, and with her pendant teats so gently gave the infants milk, that Passiflava the beate Reeve and overseer of the Kings Castell found her licking them with her tongue: who brought them to his homestead, and gave them to his wife Laurentia to be fostered. There be that think, that Laurentina being a common harpeter among these herdsmen and shepherdes, was usually called Lupa. Whereupon arose the occasion of this strange tale and wondrous miracle. Well, so were they born and brought up. And as soon as they grew once to some bigness, it was no boot to keep them within doores, not to set them idly to tend the castell, for they would use to hunt abroad in the forest: whereby having gotten strength of body, and courage with all, they were able now, not only to withstand and the violence of wild beasts, and to kill them, but also to set upon common robbers by the high-warles side, laden as they were with booties, and to spoil them thereof, yea, and divide the prey among the shepherdes, and as the number of youngers dayly increased with them, to keep holidaies, to make merry, and follow their disputations. And even in those days.
there but also man for and other. For we hear of him, whereupon only Where Cantures children: and by farther enquire and computation came to far, as he seemed well-near to acknowledge Romulus for his nephew. Thus on all hands were means wrought to circumvent and surprise King Amulius. For Romulus on the one side not accompanied with a troop of tall fellows, for he was not able in open field to make his part good but giving the herdmen his attendants, in charge to come at a time appointed, come one way, and some another, to the Kings Palace, he set upon the King. On the other side, Numa with another cue from Romulus his house, came to lead and him: and so they flew the King, Numa at the first uprose giving out edicts, that the enemies had entered the City, and assailed the Kings Palace, and thereupon having called the youth of Alba into the Citadell, to keep it by force with a good guard, and expelling the two young men after the murder done, comming towards him with joy: forthwith assembled the people together, and declared openly before them all, the wicked dealings of his brother against him, the parentage of his Nephews, their birth and bringing up, and how they came to be known: after that he reported the murder of the Tyrant, and took it upon himself as the author thereof. The two young men passing with their companies through the midst of the people, saluted their grandfathers King, whereat the multitude allo with one accord and voice ratified the name: so was his roiall name and estate by them established, Thus was the whole Regiment or Kingdom of the Alburns committed to Numa. Then Romulus and Remus had a great desire to found themselves a City in the very place where they had been cast forth and forter. Now were there of Alburns and Latins both, very many that mightbe spaire: besides, a number of herdmen: who all set together. put then in good hope, that Alba and Latium too, would be but small Cities in comparison of that which now was a building. Whilst they were deviling of these things, an old canon came between to mar all, even desire of rule and sovereiety, the name which had troubled their grandfathers before them: and thereupon a foule lay, which arose from a small and flight occasion. Forasmuch as they were both twins at one birth, and the respect of their age might yield no choice and difference, it was thought good and agreed upon, that the gods, who had the tuition of those places, should by Augury or flight of birds declare and shew whether of the twins should both name the City. and also rule the same, Romulus chose the mount Palatine, and Remus the Aventine, for their temples or religious quarters, to mark the bird-flight, and each one spait to receive their Augury. First (as they lay) had Romulus appearing in flight six vultures or griffes: and as tidings came unto him of this Augury it hapned that the number into Romulus was premited double: whereupon they were both of them by their affilants and favorites saluted Kings. The one side took the vantage of the time: the other of the number, for the prerogative of the Kingdom. Thus they fell to hot words first, and from cholerick words to blows and bloodshed: in which fir and pret of the people, Remus was wounded and flain in the place. The more common report goeth, that Remus in form of his brother, leapt over the new walls: whereupon Romulus in great choler flue his brother with his own hands, and in menacing wise, added these words withall, So perih he, whatever else he be, that shall alone dare to leap over my walls, Thus Romulus alone became King, and the City new built of the founders name was called Rome. Wherein first he fortified mount Palatine, in which he was himself retir'd. To all the rest of the gods he sacrificed after the rule and suffrimg of the Alburns: only to Hercules after the manner of the Greeks, according to the first institution of Encander. For the Gimen goeth, that Hercules upon a time, after he had slain Geryon, drove that way exceeding fair Oxen, and near the River Tybris, where he had swum over with his droves afore him, laid them down in a faire green meadow, as well to restreh him, as being weary of his way, as alfo to rest and bixt his cattle in so plentiful grassfe and forrage. There, fell thee into a sound sleep, as having well charged himself with wine and viandes: and one Cacus a sheepwode. living thereby, a man right fierce, and bearing him proudly of his strength being greatly in love with the fairest of the beauties, had a good will, and minded to fetch away that boothy: but that if he had driven the beasts into his own cave, the very tracks would have led the owner of them thither. He drew the goodliest and biggest of them backward by their tails into his hole. Hercules early in the morning, when he awoke and beheld his drove, and missed some of his count, went on towards the next cave; if happily their footing would have him thither. But seeking all traces from thence, and leading no other way as one troubled in spirit, and doubting what to do, he began to drive farther out of that therein and dangerous corner. But as some of the Osen in driving missed their fellows behind and honing after them, bellowed as their nature is: Hercules chanced to hear them low again, and answer from out of the cave wherein they had been belotted: whereat he turned back, and made halfe thither. But as Cacus forcibly made head against him, and would have kept him from entrance, Hercules smote him with his club: and for all his calling upon other herdmen for help, he knew him outright. At the same time Eumolus, who fled out of Peloponnesus, governed that Country, rather by kind of comendation and authority, than by force and Lordly command. A man much honored for his wonderful invention of Letters, a strange and rare thing among those rude and unlearned lost arts: but more honored for the opinion that the people had of his mother Carmenta, reputed to be a goddess, whom for her spirit of prophesie, those countries, before that Syllia came into Italy, had in great reverence and admiration, This Eumolus being raised with the concurrence of the shepherds, afflicted about the stranger, guilty of manifest murder, and hearing of the act committed, and the occasion thereof: viewing well therewith the person of the man, his feature and favour, more likely a good deal; and carrying a greater Majesty than the ordinary proportion of men; demanded of him who he was. And as soon as he understood his name, his father, and native Country: O Hercules (quoth he) the son of Jupiter. All hail: my mother a most true Prophetess hath foreshewed unto me, that so shall encrease the number of heavenly widows, and that in this place an Altar shall be reared and dedicated unto thees, which the most mighty and richest nation one day of the world shall name Maximus, and honour according to the ceremonies by thee ordained. In a good hour be it (spoken quoth Hercules) and the preface I gladly accept: and so giving him his hand, faithfully promised to accomplish the will of the gods, and erected it straightways and consecrated an Altar in the place. There and then first, he ascribed one of the fairest Oxen, chosen out of the whole drove, calling to the ministration of that divine service and set to the Poeti and Pneus, two noble youths at that time in those parts. It hapned to, by chance, that the Poeti were ready at hand in due time, and the inwards or entrails were set before them: that being eaten, the Pneus came to the good cheer behind: whereupon the customary head, that so long as the family of the Pneus continued they might not feed of the sacred inwards. But the Poeti, instructed by Eumolus, became the Priests of that holy sacrifice many ages after: until the solemn service and ministration of this family was put over to publickseivers, and the whole stock of the Poeti utterly worn out and dead. These were the only forain sacrificing of all other, that Romulus received and admitted, being even then a furtherer and maintainer of immortality, by his own properws achieved, and whereunto his fortune conducted him. Having in this manner religiously performed and established the service of the gods, he assembled the multitude to an audience: and for that they could by no means but by Laws be united together into one body and society of a people, he devised Statutes, and ministrated justice unto them, and supposing that those Laws would be accounted sacred and inviolable of the wild and rusticall sort of men, in case he shewed himself by some regall ensigns venerable: he carried with him a greater port and Majesty, not only in his robes and princely habit, but most of all in the attendance of some Twelve Officers and Sergeants, called Lictors, whom he caus'd to go ordinarily before his person. Some think he chose this number according to the birds, which by Augury did foretell and prognosticke his reign: I rather am of their opinion, who think that Sergeants at Arms, and this kind of Officers came from the Tuscan's their neighbours, from whence also the Ivory chair of estate, called Sella carnis, and the Royall purple robe embroidered, named Taga praestata, was fetched, as also the very number of Sergeants or Lictors. For that the Tuscan had this manner, when they chose their King by the common voices of their twelve principal States, each one found a Sergeant, All this while grew the City more and more to be fortified with Ramparts and Bul-warks, as men (ill built in fancie parts where they liked best, seeming thereby to provide rather for a future multitude in time to come, than for the present number wherewith it was then peopled. Farthermore left that the City, so large in compass, should stand void and vacant, Romulus for so, to encrease the number of the inhabitats (according to the old prattise of the founders of Cities, who by gathering about them the bare multitude and obscure, signified that they were an off-spring born out of the earth) set up a Sanctuary, or lawfull Church, called Afiylum, in that place which this day between the two groves, is enclosed and tarried round about with thick briers and brambles. Thither retired as to a place of refuge, out of the neighbor Countries, a rabbined and confused medley of all sorts, fort and rag, bond and free, one with another; folk defirous of change and novelty.

So began first the City according to the plot of large buildings to be well peopled and grow mighty. Thus being provided of power sufficient: he thought then upon a Counsell and policy to his power. And so created a hundred Senators: either because that number seemed great enough, or for that there were no more but one hundred that were of worth to be election counsellors or (wise) fathers. These men certainly for honor and dignity were called Patres or Sage fathers: and their lineal descent Purtini or Nobles. Now by this time was the State of Rome so mighty and puissant, puisnis, that it was able in fight to match any City not adjoining whatsoever. But for defect of woman kind, this puissance was to endure but the age of one man: for neither had they hope offire among themselves at home, nor yet made marriages with their neighbors abroad. Whereupon Romulus by the advice of his Senators, sent Embassadors to the countries thereabout, to treat for society and alliance for his new people, by way of marriage. Alleding that Cities also, as well as other things, arose of base beginnings, and in process of time by their own proves, and help of God withal grew to great power and reputation: * Whereas therefore they were full well assured, that as the gods were gracious to their first upring, to their own vertue and valor should not be wanting: their neighbors ought not, in regard of common wealth, and as they were men, think much and disdain to join in blood and kinned with them, being also men as well as they. Now, be it, this embassy in no place had gentle audience, and countious entertainment. For they all in general despised them, and were in fear for themselves and their posterity, by reason of so mighty a state, erecting in the midst of them, and under their very noses. And from the most of them the Embassadors were dismissed and sent away, with this a harsh demand and question, Whether they had set up a Sanctuary or lawful place for women too? For that were alone, and a fit marriage indeed to fort together. This took the youth of Rome in great displeasure, and doublethe quartet grew like to be tried by knacks. But Romulus dissembling his inward heart-burning, to the end he might find time and place meet for the purpose, prepareth to set forth certain solemn plays and games, which he nameth Considia, to the honor of Neptune Equesiris. Hereupon he commanded to proclaim those games all over the country adjoining; and with as great preparation and furniture, as in those days either their skill or ability might afford, they celebrate the same, and all to make the new more goodly, and worthy to great expectation. Thither received many a one, for some also to see this new City, but their next neighbors especially of Cenina, Crafalusum, and Antemnae: the whole multitude of Sabins likewise came with their wives and children. Who being friendly invited to their houses. From one to another, and courteously entertained: when they beheld the situation of the City, the strong walls and fair buildings: so thick standing wondered how to frame a space the City of Rome was grown to great. Now when the time of this solemn sport was come, and that their minds were bended, and their eyes bent thereon: then at once, as it was agreed before, there arose an uproar. And the youth of Rome upon a token and watch-word given, fell one vely side to carry away the Sabin Maidens. A great many of them were ravished by capriazd, as they did light upon them, and as they came next to their hands. Other some more beautiful then the rest, were appointed for the chief of the Senators, and by certain of the Commons, as they had given them in charge, conveyed home to their houses. But one passing fair and lovely above all others, was hurried by the company or cue of one Thalus (they say) and when as any asked to whom they carried her, they ever cried out (for fear she should be lost or deflowered) Thalus, i.e. unto Thalus. Whereupon Thalus became a common by-word at Weddings ever after. Thus their sport and pleasure upon this fit and trigus, was marred, and the Parents of the Virgins flew away with heavy cheer, blaming them highly, and complaining of their breach of hospitality: and calling upon the god for vengeance, to whole festival games they being come, were under colour of religion and truth, beguiled. The Danis likewise that were ravished, conceived neither better hope of themselves, nor less indignation against them. But Romulus himself in peril went from one to another, declaring: That their fathers pride who denied their neighbors marriage was the cause of all this: promising nevertheless that they should be linked in lawful wedlock, made par-takers of all worldly goods, obtain the freedom of a City, and, then, which nothing is more dear to mankind enjoy the blessing of children, exhorting them to appease their anger, and quiet themselves, and to give them their hearts, whose wag it was to have their bodies. For oftentimes upon wrong and injury there groweth love and reconciliation. Alleding moreover, that they should find their spouses to much more loving and kind, as every one of them for his part would endeavor, after they had in their turn and course fulfilled the duty to them of good husbands, to make amends, and supply the mis they have of father, mother, and native country. Their husbands withal used fair speeches, and flattering words, excusing the matter, and laying all the weight upon fervent affection and pure love: which kind of persuasion of all other. prevailiseth most with women's nature. Thus were the ravished young Wives in some sort quieted in mind, and held themselves well contented. But their fathers then most of all arrayed in mourning weed, with tears and heavy complaints, stirred up the Cities where they dwelt: neither contained they their mood within home, but assembled themselves from all parts unto Tatius the King of the Sabins; and to him repaired their Embassadors, for that the name of Tatius was highly renowned in those countries. They of Cenina Crafalusum, and Antemnae, who were partly touched and griefed for that wrong done, thought that Tatius and the Sabins dealt boldly in the action, and went but slowly about revenge.

These three nations therefore banded themselves, and agreed to prepare for war. But so sharp an act were the Ceninians that the men of Crafalusum and Antemnae, beheld it not themselves quick enough for. So they of Cenina entered one by force of arms the Territories of the Romans. As they waited and spooled without order and manner Romulus met them with an army, and in one small skirmish made proof. how much without might is vain and bootless. For he discomfited, put to flight, and pursued in chase their whole host flew their King in battle, and him de-spooled: and having slain their General, at the first assault he won the town: and after he had from thence thence brought back his army with conquest and victory, as a man no less desirous to shew his no-blemished acts with glory, than to achieve the fame by prowess, he bare afore him on high as a pompous Pageant in a flame fitly for the purpose wrought, the spoil and armor of his enemies Captain, by himself claim: and so ascended up to the Capitol Hill, where lying them down at the Oak which the shepherds had in great reverence, he consecrated them as a present to Jupiter: and let out within, the foundation and bounds of a Temple unto him: giving moreover this addition and title to the god, and saying solemnly: "O Jupiter Feretrius, I King Romulus upon my victory, present unto thee this armor of a King, and within this compas of ground, which even now I have conquered, and asigned, I dedicate a Temple, to receive thoesie and rich and royal spoils, which the public templers, following mine example, shall bear away from the Kings and Captains general of their ity, whom they shall happen hereafter to kill. This is the very beginning of that Temple, which first of all other was in Rome consecrated. And so it pleased God, that neither the first founders words were spoken in vain, whereby he foretold and pronounced, that his posterity should bring their spoils thither: nor his glory made vulgar and common to many co-partners with him in the like exploit and glorious present. For after him, in so many years, and after so many wars, two royal spoils only were won of the enemies. So rare was the happiness of honor in that behalf, Whilist the Romans were thus employed about Cenina, the army of the Antemates, taking the vantage of time, and of the Romans absence from home, and seeing their frontiers without a guard, with a power of armed men entered the confines of Rome. Against whom also the Roman Legion made head in all haste, and finding them scattered out of order in the fields, charged upon them, By reason whereof, at the very first vault and shout made discomfited were the enemies and their town surprized. As Romulus returned with triumph and joy for these two victories, his wife Hersilia, at the important tute of the Wives that had been ravished, earnestly besought him to pardon their husbands, and receive them into his City: for by concord and unity the Weale publick, and the good estate of his Kingdom might flourish and grow mighty. This suit was gently heard, and soon obtained. After this, he set forth against the Cœstuminiants that began to war upon him: with whom he had the lea ado, for that their courages were well abated already by the overthrow of others. To both these places as unto Colonies, were new inhabitants sent. But the greater number were defirous to enter their names, and to plant themselves at Cœstuminiants, for the fertility of the soil. And many likewise removed from thence to Rome, the parents especially and kinsfolk of the ravished women. Lat all, the Sabins waited more sharply and dangerously then the rest, for nothing did they either in fury and rage, or for covetous desire of spoil, Neither made they talk and their of war, before they warred indeed and were seen in field. And besides their considerate policy, they dealt also with craft and lightning. For whereas one Sp. Tarpeius had the charge of the Caille in Rome, his daughter a young maiden, Tautis with a sum of money corrupted and procured, at what time as she went to fetch water without the walls for sacrifice, to receive armed soldiery into the fortresses. But loo soon as they were let in, they with their armes Smithereed and killed her: would either that thereby it might be thought the Caille was won by force: or because They would make her an example to posterity, that no Traitor should ever think to escape unpunished. But hereto belongeth a tale, namely that the Sabins used commonly on their left arms to wear brcelets of maffe and weighty gold, and fair rings besides on their fingers, let with precious stones of great value: and that the Convented and agreed with them to have that which they wear on their left hands, whereupon she had their targets in hand of those golden ornaments, heaped upon her. Others lay that upon agreement and covenant made to deliver that which was on their left hands, the demanded their armor, and become the seemed to deal deceitfully, the was over taken therewith and by receiving a reward of her own chuing. However it was, the Sabins were pillagd of the Caille. From whence the morrow after (when as the Romans army well appointed in baretary, had taken up and overspread the whole plain that lieth from mount Palatine to the hill Capitol) they would not come down on even ground before that the Romans partly nether with angered, and partly pricked with an hot desire to recover the Caille again, began with their great disadvantage to climb against the hill. Whereupon the Captains on both sides joined battell, Metius Curtius for the Sabins, Hersilus Hostilius for the Romans: who albeit he was on the lower ground yet in the forefront most courageously and stoutly underwent the brunt of the conflict, But loo soon as he was drunken down and slain, incommittently the Romans retir'd and gave ground: and thus discomfited fled backward to the old gate of Palatium. Romulus himself also, bore back with the victors and throng of those that fled, lift up his weapons on high towards heaven, and cried out saying: "O Jupiter, I Romulus by thy direction guided and ruled, have here in this mount Palatine laid the foundation of this City: and now already have the Sabins by corruption and treachery got the Citadel and forts thereof: from whence they having passed the midit of the vale be tween, make higher in hafte with force of arms. But thou Father of gods and men, vouchsafe O yet from hence at leafwise to repulse the enemies, deliver the Romans from this so great fear, and "let thy flameful flight. And here to thee O Jupiter Stator I vow a Temple, for a memorial to all posterity, that by thy present help this City was saved and preferred. Thus having once prayed, as if he had known for certain that his prayers were heard. Even here (quoth he) O ye Romans doth Jupiter Opt. Maxi: the belt and greatest of all the gods command you to fly and begin the battle afresh. Herewith the Romans, no les then if they had been commanded from heaven above, made A made a stand. And Romulus in person hasted him with all speed to the front of the vanguard. Now was Metius Curtius, principal leader of the Sabines, run down from the Castle, and had startled and chased the Romans back as far as the Forum or common place of Rome at this day teacheth in length: and being come within a little of the gate of Palatium, he lift up his voice and cried aloud:—

‘Vanquish we have the faithless friends; and heartless foes: and now know they well, it is one thing to ravish maidens, and a far other thing to fight with men. In this lott, as he brake it out, Romulus with a troop of lusty young men, made head against him. Metius haply at that time fought on Horse-back, whereby he was forst the sooner to secure, and the Romans made after and pursu ed him. The other battle of the Romans in like manner, being much enraged with the value of them that ran after, leap into a marsh or bog thereby. Which accident, considering the danger of so great a passion, made the Sabins to look back to him. And he verily taking heart again at the calling and encouragement of many of his favourites, escaped. But the Romans and Sabins both, in the middle valley between the two hills, renewed the battle again: where the Romans got the better hand. Then the Sabine Dames, for whose wrongful usage all this war arose, with their hair hanging loose about their shoulders, and renting their garments, for very grief and sorrow, all about, ventured to run amongst the javelins and darts as they flew and thus having thrust themselves violently overthrew between them, began to part these bloody armies, and to end their deadly deeds: Before leaving their own fathers on the one side, and their husbands on the other, that they being fathers and sons in law, would not embroil themselves with so kind and unnatural bloodshed nor as parasites, murder the young ones newly born, some their grand-children, and other their own heirs of their body begotten. If ye our fathers, think much (say they) of the affinity between our bands and you, or if ye our husbands are displeased with our marriage, bend all your anger and walk against us; we are the cause of this war, we are the cause of wounding and killing both husband and father; yet will we rather die then either Orphans without the one, or Widows without the other. This thing moved as well the multitude of Soukiers, as also the Captains; and presently on a sudden was halted, and the fight ceased. Whereupon, the Generals came forth to conclude a League. Neither made they peace only, but one City of two united their Realms, and joined together in the Regiment: but the royal estate they lected in Rome."

C The City thus being made one of twain, the Romans for to gratifie the Sabins in some sort were of Cures, a town of the Sabins, called Qurites, And for a memorial of that battle, the very place where Curtius, after he was gotten out of the deed marsh, first set his horse on firm ground, was named Curtius his lake. E Tithes of Titus Tatius; but of the name and first beginning of the Lucerians, the occasion is not certain. So these two Kings not only reigned together but also governed with great unity and concord. But after certain years the kinred of King Tatius, chased to bear and evil entreat the Embassadors of Lucerium. And when as the Lauretines pleased the law of Nations, for satisfaction of this outrage; Tatius his kinfolk what by favour, and what by intent, prevailed more with him then the just complaint of the others. Wherby he brought vengence due to them upon his own head: for being come upon a time to Lavinium, unto a solemn sacrifice and feast, there in an uproar or hurliest the people ran upon him, and so was he slaine. Which thing (they say) Romulus made the kings of others was meet; either for that fellowship in Lordship is never faithfull, or because he esteemed him not unjustly to be made away. Whereupon be forbade indeed to make war; yet to the end the wrong done unto the Embassadors, together with the murder of the King, might be expiated and purged clean away, the League between the Cities of Rome and Lucerum was renewed, But whilst peace verily was beyond mens expectation with them concluded: behold another fresh war arose, much nearer then the other, and hard almost at their very gates. For the people of Eide ne supposing the Romans power and riches to encroate over much to enter unto them: before they should grow to such greatness as they were like to do, began first to war upon them; and sending a power of lusty tall soldiers, invaded and wafted all the country between the City of Rome and Eide ne. And taking their way on the left hand, for that the Tyber kept from the other, they forsook and spoiled as they went, to the great fear of the Peasants and country people. So as this sudden tumult and garboil heard out of the fields into the City brought the first news of the war, Romulus raised therewith (for to night a war might not delay) forth his army, and encamped within a mile of Eide ne; and leaving there a competent guard he departed thence with all his other forces, commanding part of his soldiers to lie close in certain covert places, among the thickets in ambushment. Himself with the greater number, and all his horse advanced forward, and riding up and down before their gates after a disordered and dragging manner, made semblance of a bravado, and all to train the enemy forth, which was the thing he only sought. This kind of horserie it was a means that the Eidenares left inspected and marvelled at their dying, which they were to counterfeit. For whilst the Cavalry flood unresolved, as it were, in a maimering whether to fly or fight, C and the infantry withal began to retire: all at once the enemies in thronging manner fell back of the gates, and chased the Romans so fiercely, that in their eager pursuit they were drawn to the very place of ambush. Then the Romans suddenly arose, and charged the flank of the enemies; and to encrease their fright, they likewise that were left behind to guard the camp, showed themselves with banners displayed. So the Fidenates terrified sunry ways, before well neer that Romulus and his men of arms could rein about their horse-heads, turned their backs, and rode full gallop towards the town again, and so much the faster, for that they fled now in good earnest themselves, that pursued them, who a little before made but semblance thereof. Yet for all this could they not escape the enemy: for the Romans hard at their heels, rushed together with them pel-mel into the town, before the gates could be shut against them. At this Fidenatian war spreading so dangerously, the Veientians grew angry in their hearts, and began to chafe. Touched they were also in regard of kindred and alliance: for the Fidenates were likewise Tuscans. And fearing lest (if the Roman forces should thus differs and lie upon all the borderers) they being too near should not go free, they were the rather pricked forward, and thereupon made rodes, and entered in arms the confines of Rome, spoiling and rifing, more like robbers than professed warriors. So without pitching any tents, or abiding the coming of their enemies, but only driving and carrying away great booties out of the fields, they return again to Vei. The Romans contrariwise, not finding the enemies in the field, but yet provided and resolved to give battle, and to hazard all, padded over the Tyber. Whom the Veientians understanding to be encamping themselves, fully minded to come against their City: fitted forth and met them, intending to try the quarrel by dint of swords, and in open field, rather then to be mused up within the town, and to fight and defend themselves from off their houses and walls. There the Roman King with the strength only of his old beaten foouldiers, without any other help and supply whatsoever, without policy or stratagens, had the better: and having thus discomfited the enemies, he chas them even to their very walls, and for that the City was exceeding strong, fortified as well by natural situation, as by walls, he forbade to affay it. But in his return homeward, he waited the country, more upon a mind to revenge, than hope of spoil. With this declature the Veientians no les than oried then if they had lost a field, sent Orators to Rome to sue for peace: unto whom Truce was granted for an hundred years, but they were accorded to lose part of their lands. There were in manner all the acts that were done both at home and abroad, during the reign of Romulus. Whereof none seemed to derogate any jot from the opinion, both of his divine birth and beginning, and also of his immortality or deification after his death. Such was his courageous heart in recovering his Grandfathers Kingdom: his policy and wisdom in founding the City first, and after in establishing and governing the same, as well in war as in peace. By whom good proceedings it did such strength, and so sure footing, that for forty yeares space after, it enjoyed peace with safety. Nevertheless of his Commons he was better beloved then of his Nobles: but above all, his Souldiers most heartily affected him: of whom he had always about him, as Equries of the body, three hundred Pensioners armed, not only in time of war, but also of peace, whom he called Celeres. Thus having achieved these noble and immortal deeds, as he upon a time assembled all his people upon the plain, at the March Capre, there to number or muster his army, beheld upon a sudden there arose a tempest with great cracks of thunder, which with thick and cloudy a storm, covered the King, that the people left the fight of him. And never after was Romulus seen on earth. The Roman youth, after, their fear was at length past, and that upon to dark and troublesome weather, it proved a fair day again, and calm withall, seeing the Kings Throne empty, albeit they credited the Senators that flowed near about him, who gave out he was taken up aloft in the storm; yet strucken into dead dumps, as it were for the loss of their father, held their peace a good while. But after wards, when some few of them had once begun, they all set on and cried aloud, All hail god Romulus the son of a god, King and Father of the City of Rome: With earnest prayer beseeching him of his grace, that he would vouchsafe to be propitious, and save their off-spring and posterity for ever. I am of this mind, that some there were even then, that suspected and secretly surmised that the King was pulled in pieces by the hands of the Nobles. For this rumour also was bruited abroad, although in very dark and obscure terms. But by reason of the high admiration of the men, and the present fear withal, the former opinion took place, and was more current. Over and besides, it grew the rather credible through the politic practise of one person. For as the whole City was penive and forrowful for the mifs of their King, and fore displeated with the Senators, one Ponzibus Julios, a substantial good author (as men say) and to be beleeved in a matter of great importance, stepped forth into the assembly. Romulus (quoth he) O Quirites, the Founder and Patron of this City, even this very morning at the day break, descended suddenly down from heaven and met me, and as I stood all quaking for fear, ready to worship him, and humbly beseeching that I might behold him face to face: Away (quoth he) and tell the Romans that the will of the gods in heavenis, that my City of Rome shall be the head and chief of the whole world: will them therefore to follow and practise chivalry, and the knowledge thereof: and want this well, and so let them teach their posterity to wit. That no power in the world shall be able to withstand the puissance of the Romans. Which (said he) was not to soon spoken, but he ascended on high, and departed. A wonder it was to see, how much they gave credit to this mans tale, and how greatly the mifs of Romulus both among the Commons and the Army, was by this belief of his immortality, digested.
A In this mean while the Senators fell to strive who should be King, and the desire of sovereignty troubled much and perplexed their minds. But as yet, there was no banding nor rising from any one person in particular: for that in a State to newly riven, and of so small continuance, there was not one that far excelled another in authority. All the contention was between the two factions in general. For they that were descended of the Sabins, fearing lest because after the death of Titus there was none of their part, that had reigned with Romulus in equal jurisdiction, they should now lose their possession and title to the Crown, were desirous to have a King chosen out of their corporation. The old Romans again might not abide an alien or foreigner to be King. Howbeit, this diversely affected as they were, a King they all will needs have, as who (God wot) had not yet tasted the sweetness of liberty and freedom. Besides, the Nobles began to fear, lest peradventure in case the heats of many Cities thereabouts, should not be well disposed, but provoked against them, some foreign power would make invasion, finding the City without government, and the army without a Captain. Therefore they all liked well to have one head, but none could find in his heart to give place unto another. Whereupon the hundred Senators assemble, and combine together in the rule of the Common-wealth, by dividing themselves into ten Decuries, and for every Decury chusing one to bear the chiefe authority. So that ten governed at once, but one alone had the regal Empowers and the Legions before him. This sovereignty and preheminence determined every five days: and thus went it through them all round in course. After which manner, they continued the space of one year. And the government upon this occasion was (as it is still at this day) called Interregnum. Then after a year began the Commons to grudge and mutter, that their feritude was greater then before, having now Lords over them, an hundred for one: and feared they would no longer endure, but have a King again, yea, and one of their own chusing. The Senators seeing them about, and taking it to be good policy for to offer that of their own accord, which they were otherwise like to forget, caused labour with them in this wise, to wit, by granting the chief prerogative unto the people (in chusing a King) yet so, as they gave them no greater privilege, than they received to themselves. For this it was declared, that when the people had elected a King, it should hand him firm and ratified, if the Senators liked thereof, and gave to them their royal affent. And even at this day in making of Laws, and chusing of Magistrates or Rulers, the same right is in some of the cities, putting aside the violence of Tribunes. For that now before the people give their voices, the Senators paie by their authority, that which they would have done, fall in the assembly of people, by staring, doubtful as it will. To proceed then, the Interegnum having called a general Parliament: In the name of God (quoad he) O Quirites, and which may be to you good, lucky, and prosperous, elect of nominate a new King: for so is the good pleasure of the Nobles and Senators: and in case ye shall elect a man of such quality as may be deemed worthy to succeed Romulus, then will they by their assent pass the same, and allow thereof. This pleased and contented the Commons so highly, that because they would not seem behind in bounty and concord, they answered again, that this only they ordained and agreed upon, to wit, that the Senate should determine who should be King of Rome. There was in those days one Numa Pompilius, much renowned and esteemed for his just life and religious: he dwelt in Cumae, a City of the Sabins, E man right skilful and very well learned (as any one might be in that age) in all Laws both divine and humane: whole reacher and first matter, for want of another Author of his Science and Knowledge (they say) but yet unlearned, was Pythagoras of Samos. Concerning whom, this is well known, that he 100 years after and above, in the days of Servius Tullius King of Rome, held a School of young men Students, that were his Disciples and followed his Sect in the utmost and farthest coast of Italy, about Metapontum, Heraclea, and Croton. From which places (albeit he had lived in that time) what name of him could spread so far as to the Sabins? or by what sect or coupling of language might he possibly have trained any man unto him for desiré of learning at his hands? or by what good means and help could Numa travel alone unto him in safety, through so many countries, of divers tongues and sundry manners? I am of this opinion rather, that the man by nature was framed and disposed to vertue, and that he was instructed, not so much in strange and foreign Sciences, as after that first rule, that stern and severe discipline of the ancient Sabins: then whom, there was not a nation in times past, more precise reformed, and void of corruption. The Roman Senators hearing the name of Numa, although they saw well enough, that the Sabins were like to prove of great reputation and power, by chusing their King from among them, yet was there none of them so audacious, as to propose either themselves, or any one of their party and faction not any one, Numa, Senator or Citizen, before that man: but a linage with one accord agreed to confer the Kingdom upon Numa Pompilius. Who being sent for and come like as Romulus at the founding of the City was inaugurated King, or attainted to the Crown by means of Angerio: so also he would needs, that the will and counsel of God should be fought for, tending his own election. Whereupon he was by the Auger (unto whom for ever after that publick Ministry or Priesthood, in regard of honor and reverence by patent belonged) brought unto the Cattle hill, and there he for him down upon a stone, with his face toward the South. Then the Auger on his left side, with head covered, took his place: holding in his right hand a smooth staff without knot or knob, and hooked towards the top, which they called Liburn. From whence after that he had with good advice, taken a prospect and view towards the City and Country, and made his prayers unto the gods, he limited the quarters of the Heaven, from Eall to West: and the parts Southward he appointed for the
the right hand, and theohe Northward for the left. And so far as ever he could cast his eye and see far forward, he imagined to himself a mark: then shifting his staff into his left hand, and laying the right hand upon Numia’s head, he prayed in this form: O Father Jupiter, if it may be right and lawful, that this Numia Pomptinius, whose head I lay my hand upon, shall be King of Rome, I swear I believe the same certain and manifest signs within that compass and those precincts, that I conceived and set out. Then pronounced he in plain words what tokens by sight or flight of owls he would have to appear. Which being once seen, Numia was declared King, and so came down from the Temple or place of prospect above said.

In this manner, being inaugurated and invested in the Kingdom, he provideth by good Orders, Laws, and Customs, to re-edify, as it were, that City, which before time had been new built by force and arms. Whereunto, he feeling that they might not be brought and framed in time of war, whose hearts were already by continual warfare grown wild and savage: and supposing that this fierce people might be made more gentle and tractable, through lapse of arms, he therefore built the Temple ofNumia in the nether end of the street Argiletum, in token both of war and peace: with this invention, that being open it should signify, that the City was in arms; and flanding fure, that all the neighbor countries were in peace and quiet. Twice only after the reign of Numia was this Temple shut: once, when M. Munius was Consul, after the first CARTHAGINIAN war was done and ended: and a second time (as God would) in my age for us to see, when as the Emperor Caesar Augustus, after the battle of Actium (with Antonius and Cleopatra) had obtained peace both by Land and Sea, Numathen having knitt the hearts of the borderers about him in firm league and amity, and therupon closed up the doors of foes, secured now from all fear and care of dangers abroad, yet doubting left through eafe and idleness their minds might fall to looseness and riot, whom the dread of enemies and martial discipline had held in awe and good order: devised above all things to strike some fear of God into them, and to plant religion in their hearts: a policy no doubt, with the simple multitude (indeed in those days and ignorant) most effectual. Which reverence of God, for that it could not sink nor enter well into their heads, and to make a deep impression, without some device of a fained miracle, he made semblance, and gave out, that he converted in the night season, and had, I wot not what, secret conference with the goddess Aegypt. By whose counsel and direction forthwith, he ordained such divine service and sacrifices to the gods, as to them was most acceptable: and to every god appointed several Priests for the ministration thereof accordingly. But first above all other things he divided the year, according to the course of the Moon, into twelve months: and for as much as the Moon hath not full thirty days to every month, whereby some days are wanting to make up the full year, after the revolution and circle of the Sun: he, by putting the odd days between every month, did dispose and ordered the year, that in every three and twenty years space the days agreed just to the same point of the Sun from whence they began, and to make up the void spaces, and accomplishedfully the term of every year. He appointed likewise law days and days of vacation, called Festi and Nefeti, thinking it good, that otherwheres there should be rest from attendance on the Courts, and no dealing, with the people. After this, he let his mind about the creation of Priests, albeit in his own person he performed very many sacrifices, especially those which at this day pertain to the Priests of Jupiter, called Flamen Dialis. And supposing that in a City so marvellous, there should succeed more Kings like to Romulus then Numia, who in proper person would go forth to war: left haply the divine ministration that belonged to the King, might be neglected, he created a Flame to Jupiter, for to be a sacrificial continually resided: endowed him with a rich cope or vestment, and with an ivory chair of state upon wheels, called Sella curulis. Unto him he adjourned two Flamines more; one for Marcus, another for Q. iuvinus. He instituted also a Nunnery, as it were, of religious Vestal Virgins. A Priestshood that had the beginning from Alba, and fured well with the honie, from whom the first founder of the City was descended. And to the end they should attend continually about the Church, as reftant Chaplains, he allowed them an ordinary fee or pension, at the publick charges of the City: and made them perpetual vowed virginity and other ceremonies to be reverenced and accounted holy, Likewise unto M. S. Gratidius he consecrated twelve Priests called Salii, and gave unto them a rich purple coat, embroidered for an ornament, and to wear upon that coat a brazier breaf-plate, and to bear certain scourches or bucklers that fell from heaven, called Ancilia: commanding them to run about the City, chanting hymns and songs, with dancing and leaping full solemnly. Moreover, he chose for a Superintendent or high Priest, Numia Martius, the son of Marcus, one of the Senators: and to him he gave in writing set down under his hand and seal, a rule, whereby he might know what beasts should be killed for sacrifice, upon what days, and at which Temples, and how the money should be levied and disbursed for the defraying of all charges. All other sacrificed rites as well publick as private, he submitted and referred to the discretion and ordering of that high Priest: to this end, that the common people might know unto whom they were to refer for counsel and instruction, and that no part of O God’s worship and service should by neglect of the ancient rites and traditions of their own country, be confounded and corrupted by bringing in any strange and foreign superstitions. He ordained besides, that the same Arch-Priest should teach, not only these heavenly ceremonies, but also funeral obsequies, and how the spirits beneath, and ghosts of bodies departed, should be quieted and pacified: and what strange and prodigious tokens, that came by way of lightning, thunder, or any other fearful flight whatsoever, should be expiate and purged by sacrifice accordingly.
A for to know the truth, portended by their tokens even from the minds of heavenly spirits above, he conjectured unto Jupiter Elethinus at Assur upon the mount Assurine. And by the means of Augury, he concluded that god, what things he was to enthrone and go about. Whilst the whole multitude was thus drawn away, and came turned from thinking of force and arms, and busied about devising and ordering of these matters, not only their minds were occupied in doing somewhat, but also the continual fear of God now filled them, (as being persuaded that the heavenly power was present in the managing of men affairs,) had possest now all their hearts with such piety and religious holiness, that faithful promise once made, and the reverence of an oath taken, abandoning all fear of law and punishment, was able to rule and govern the City, and

B as the people framed and reformed themselves to the fashions and manners of their King, as the only and special pattern to follow: so the nations likewise bordering upon them, who before time verily thought that City to be built, and as it were encompassed in the midst of them to the disturbance and disquieting of all their peace, were now become so resolute of them, that they thought it an impious and sinful deed, once to offend or offer abuse to that City, to well given, and devoted to worship and service of God. Furthermore, there was a grove, the middle whereof was wateredcontinually by a spring that issued out of a dark and shadowed cave: into which, because Numus fled very oft to retire himself alone, without any other, as it were, to have familiar company with Egeria, he dedicated that grove unto the Muses, for that, their assistance also in council and advice he had figured together with his wife Egeria. And to each alone he instituted a solemn yearly festival day, and erected a chapel: unto which he commanded the Flamines to ride in an arched or embowed clove Chariot, drawn with two horses, and to sacrifice and execute their function, with their hands covered and wrapped close to their fingers ends: signifying thereby, that faith is to be kept and preferred: and that her fear was sacred and consecrated even upon the right hands. Many other sacrifices, and places for sacrifice, which the Priests called Argos, did he appoint and dedicate. But of all his acts this was most worthy and memorable, that during the time of his reign he had no less regard to preserve peace, than to maintain royal estate and dominion. Thus two Kings one after another, taking either of them a federal course by himself, that one by war, this other by peace, mightly promoted the welfare of the City. Romanus reigned 37 years, Numus 43. So that now the City became very puissant, as being well and equally temper'd both with feats of arms, as also with discipline of peace.

C Upon the death of Numus the regiment returned again to an inter-regnum. Then the people nominated and elected for their King, with the royal assent of the Senators, Tullus Hostilius, the nephew or Grandson of that Hostilius, who had in times past fought valiantly against the Sabines, at the foot of the Cattle hill. This man was not only unlike the former King, but also more fierce and hardy then Romanus himself. For besides the heat of youth, and strength of body withal, the glorious remembrance of his Grandfather set him on, and pricked him forward. Supposing therefore that the City through rest and ease began to age, as it were, and to decay, he sought every way to pick quarrels, and to give occasion to make war. It fortunate, that the Peasants about Rome, and those of Alba likewise, prayed upon and spoiled one another's land. At that time C. Claudius was Lord E and King of Alb. From both parts well near at one time, were Embassadors addressed to demand restitution of goods, and satisfaction for their harms, Tullus Hostilius he had firstly charged his messengers to have no dealing with the Alban Prince, before they had delivered unto him their missive. For well he knew, that he would make denial, and yeald no amends: and then might he with confidence justly proclaim war against him. On the contrary side, the Alban Embassadors followed their business but slackly for being courteously invited, and friendly entertained by Tullus, and lodged within his palace; they were well content to be dealt by the King, and were his daily guests so long, that the Romans had by this time both challenged their own first, and upon denial made by the Alban King, given defence and proclaimed open war within thirty days next ensuing. Upon which tidings by them related to Tullus, he gave the Alban Embassadors audience, perceiving them to declare what their errand was, that they came about, "They (simple men) ignorant of all that was done first spent time in exciting themselves, saying they were very loth & unwilling to speak ought that might displease Tullus, but being commanded by authority, they might not will nor chafe but then were come to make claim of goods, & amend for wrongs, and if they were not restored and recouped they had commiffion to denounced war against him.

Whereunto Tullus made answer in this wise, "Tell your King and Master (quoth he) that the Roman King calleth the gods to witness, whether of the two Nations sent the Embassadors away first, and rejected them when they demanded restitution, that upon his head they might bring the misery, loss, and calamity of the present war. With this dispatch the Albans returned home. So they made preparation of forces on both sides, all that they could, most like in all the world to a civil war, between fathers and sons, proceeding both from the Trojan race; considering that by Trojans Livonium was founded; from Livonium came the people of Alba; and from the Alban Kings were the Romans in right line descended. But the final issue and end of this war, made the war tell les woful and lamentable, both because they came not to a set field, and also for that by raising the house only of the one City, two nations were intermingled & united in one, The Albans first with a mighty power entered the Territory of Rome, and encamped themselves not past five miles from the City, where they strongly entrenched themselves: which place of the Captains name was called Foffa Clarie, many years after until both it and the name with all processes of time, decayed clean and came to nothing. In this camp the Alban King Claudio ended his days, in whose stead the Alban army created Metius Saffetius their Dictator, Tullus in the mean time became haughty and proud, especially upon the death of the King, and sometimes giving out and saying, that the mighty power of the gods, having thus begun at the very head, would likewise take vengeance on the whole body of the Alban Nation, for this their unjust and godless war: and one night above the rest palled secretly by the camp of his enemies, and in warlike manner invaded the Alban land. This news railed Metius out of his standing camp. Who led forth his army and marched on as near to his enemies as he could, dispatching thence an Herald unto Tullus, to notify unto him thus much from him, that it was needful and expedient before they joined battle to parle and commune together. If he would vouchsafe to confer, he knew very well, that he should alledge and lay forth such matters, as might concern the Weale of the Romans, as well as of the Alban. Tullus refused not the offer, albeit they were but vain todes that were pre¬ tended, and therefore let his men in barrel array, The Albans in like manner came forth against him.
After they were thus ranged and embattelled ready to fight, the Generals on both sides, accom¬ panied with a few of their principal Nobles, advance between both armies. Then began the Alban Dictator in this wise: "Me thinks (quoth he) I hear already of injury and wrongs done, and how such goods as were demanded are not restored again according to the form of the league. As also that Claudio our King was caife of this war: neither doubt, let us once do, stand upon the truth of such things as are reported upon the one party not what glosses, and goodly sheets of words: it is ambition and desire of rule only and nothing else, that is published on two nations of one blood and near neigh¬ bors to take arms and war one with another: justly or unjustly, I am not able to say. Let him on Gods name that first began the quarrel, in conscience let to that, As for me, the Albans indeed have made them their General, But this one point Tullu, I would have you to remember and consider: How strong about us and you especially the Tufcans are, you know better, the nearer ye are unto them: mighty they are by land, much more by sea. Then went well this, that when you all caife the Trumpet to sound unto battle, if these two armies will be to them a fair mark and spectacle to behold: that they may give an assault to both at once, as well the victors, as thee that are vanquished, whilst they are weary and toiled out of heart. For the love of God, if there be any park of grace in us, since we are not contented with that liberty which we freely en¬ joy, will needs venture and put in doubtful hazard, which of us shall rule and command, and who shall serve and obey the other, let us take some good course whereby it may be decided without great loss or bloodshed on both sides, whether shall be Lord and Sovereign. The motion Tullus milliked not, albeit both for disposition of nature, and hope of victory, he were the haughtier of the twain. And as they fought on both parts what way to take, this means at length they found, whereunto fortune it self presented fit matter and occasion. For by good hap even then, in either host three brethren twins were born at one birth, and thole neither in age nor strength unlike. Their names were Curiaii and Horatii, that is very certain, neither is there any thing of ancient record more famous and notable. Yet as clear in habitance as it is, there re¬ mainteth still some doubt and error in their names: whether people the Curiaii and the Horatii were. Writers beare there on both sides, but the greater number say, as I find, that Horatii were the Romans, to whom I rather encline, and my mind giveth me to follow them. With these three brethren the Kings went in hand, persuading them to fight for the honor of their country, and try the quarrel by dint of word; shewing them shat on what side the victory fell, there should remain the sovereign dominion. Nothing refuseth they to do, the time and place both were agreed upon and appointed. But before the combat, it was covenanted between the Romans and Albans, and those conditions drawn: That whose champions in fight should have the better, that nation should peaceably command the other. There are of covenants many and sundry Capitula¬ tions far different in matter: but they ran all after one manner and form. As for this, it was N made, as we have heard in this wise, neither is there extant a more ancient record of any compo¬ sition whatsoever, The Herald (called Fecialis) demandeth of King Tullus in this wise: Is it your will and commandment my Lord, That I make a covenant and accord with the Patroprate of the Alban people? It is (quoth the King.) Then (quoth he) I demand of you sacred herbes, The King answered again, Take them pure and clean. The Fecialis then reached from the Calfi hill pure herbs from among the graves: which done, he thus asked the King: Do you (my Lord) ordain me the Meffenger Royal of the Commons of the people of Rome? and allow necessary implements, all furniture for my self, and my resumee and train? The King answered: I do, so farth as may be, without the harm or detriment of my self, and of the Citizens of the people of Rome. The Fe¬ cialis having recited all the Articles and conditions thereof, "Hearken (quoth he) O Jupiter, listen that your Herald for the Albans, attend also and give ear ye the Alban people, how these conditions from the first to the last, have been read aloud out of those Books or Tables of wax, without

A "coven, or fraud, and how at this day they are most rightly meant and understood, according to the tenure of the words: from these articles I say, shall not the people of Rome trust more than, nor make default: If they shall first go back and fail therein by publick content, and fraudulent; yet, that day, O Jupiter, imitate them the City of Rome, as I to day will strike this swine; yet and imite thou home so much more, as thou art more able and powerful then my self. And after he had thus said, he imite the swine with a flint stone. The Albans likewise repeated their precept.
form of words, and the oath, by their Dictator and Priests for the purpose. The complements of the covenant and composition thus performed, and all concluded, then those three brethren of both sides, as it was before agreed, buckled to arm themselves. And being encouraged on both hands, by their well-willers and friends, that put them in mind of their country's goods, their native tole and parents, saying, that all their fellow Citizens and country men whatever, both at home in the City, and abroad in the camp, every one had their eye only upon them, their weapons and their hands: the young men being both of themselves by nature forward and hasty, and also embol sembled with the uncomfortable words of their friends, advanc'd forth between both armies. Now were the two hosts set on both sides before their camps, rid of present danger, rather then void of care and penitenences. For why? the whole tribal of Lovaginity and rule, reined in the valour and good speed of a few, Whereupon they longing to see the sequel and issue, were wholly bent to be hold, and only minded this unpleasant sight and spectacle. At found of Trumpet these brave breth ren, three to three; like as they had been two fet battels: and carrying the Romans victory of two great armies, affronted one another, and with cruel and mortal weapons gave the charge. Neither regarded they their own proper peril, but far before their eyes, only the rule or servitude of the Common-weal, as if the rate of their country from them there by wholly upon their good or bad succees in this Action, So soon as they began to cope together and make assault, that their hand and weapons once clattered, and their drawn swords shone and glittered again, behold such an exceeding ear came upon the beholders, that they trembled and quaked withal: and during the time of equal combat, seeing no inclination of victory to the one side or the other, they were so affrighted, that hardly they could well speak or freely take their wind. Afterwards, when they were once to hand-strokes, and that now not only the thrilering of their bodies, and the doubtful handling of their weapons and armor, but bloody wounds also were seen, two of the Romans having fore wounded all the three Albans fell down one upon the other, and yielded up the ghost. At whole fall, the Alban host shouted again for joy: but the Roman legions, albeit they were now past hope of victory, yet they were not void of care being amated, and an exatice as it were, with very fear what should become of him, who being but one, had three Curiass upon him at once. But as good was pac, as he was yet thrash and unwounded. And as he was not able alone to make his part good with them altogether, so in single fight, man to man, he thought himselfe good enough for them all, one after another. To single therefore, and to part them in fight, he begins to flee, thinking thereby they would follow after him, each one as his hurt body would give him leave. Now when he was retired a pretty good way from the place where they fought, and looking behind him, espied them following far at under, and one of them not much behind himself, he turned again upon him with great violence. And whilst the host of the Albans cried out to the Curiass to revenge and succour their brother, Horatius by that time had stain his formost enemy, and was in hand with the second. Then the Romans with such a shout, as they are wont to make, who after a great fright recover themselves and take heart again, encourage their cham pion: and he himselfe haintenced to finish the combat. And before that the third, who was not far off, could get to the other, he flain the second Curiass. So that now there was but one to one, left to fight on even hand: and they, neither in hope nor strength equally matched. As for the one of them, his body as yet not wounded, and his double victory withal, caused him to attempt the third conflict boldly and courageously. The other faint and feeble of his hurt, tired with running, had much ado to come forward, and quite out of heart, seeing his two brethren lie slain at his feet, offereth himself as a prey to his victorious enemy: for surely between them was no fight at all to speak of. The Roman he triumphant and crying out for joy, Two brethren already (quoth he) have I sent to the Divil, the third likewise shall I send after them, that a Roman may command an Alban, which is the cause of all this war. And therewith he thrust his sword aloft into his throat, who had much ado to hold his weapons and toon as he was down, struck and rifled him, the Romans with great triumph and gratulation, receive Horatius rejoicing so much the more, as his cave was more dangerous and well needeperate. Then of both sides address them them-selfes to bury their champions, but not with like cheer and alacrity of hearts: For why? they of the one part were become Lords, and they of the other, Subjects. Their tombes remain yeet to be seen in the very places where they were each of them flain two of the Romans entombed together in one place nearer unto Albis than the three Albans towards Rome, but distant stander, like as they fought and left their lives. Before they dislodged and departed thence the one from another, Me tius, according as it was capitulated in the composition, asked and demanded what Tabius would command him to do: who enjoinned him to keep his youth ready in arms at an hours warning for that he would employ them in service, in case he should war with the Venetians. So were the ar mies dismissed home, And Horatius he went forth and baring afore him the threefold spoil of the twelve brethren, Whom his Sitter a maid affiance before to one of the Curiass met before Capesian gate: &

The combat between the brethren Curiass and Horatius.

...ect upon her brothers shoulders, the coat of arms of her efpouled husband, which she her self had wroght with her own hands; the unbound her head, let her hair loose, and pitiously called upon her dead spouse by name. This lamentable waiting of the fitter principally upon victory, and a mid fio great and public joy, renewed the proud and haughty young man to wrath, and drawing out his fword therewith, ran the filly damsel through: and with their bitter words rebuked her alo. Get thee hence (quoth he) thy spouse with thy unfeetable and foolhally love, forgetful as thou art, of thy two brethren dead, and him that is alive: forgetful of thy native country, and the ho- nor thereof: and fo with a michief go fte, whatever fhe be, that shall bewail an enemy of Rome. A cruel and horrible fact this seemed, as well to the Senators, as to the Commons: but his late and treff defert made it the lefs treipais: yet for all that was he apprehended, and brought before the King. The King, that he might not feem the author of a judgment fo unpleasant and odious unto the people, and consequently of punishment according to the doon, assembled the people together and said: I ordain Duuivirs to fitt upon Horatius, in trial of a criminal caufe of felony, and to judge him according to the law, in that cafe provided. The tenor of the law runneth thus, in dreadful kind of form. [The Magiftrates called Duuivirs shall judge the party accused in a capital action of felony, if he shall appeal from the Duuivirs, let him traverse his appeal, if they over- throw him, then hoodwink him, or cover his head, hang him upon a curfed Gallow tree by a rope, and flangle him, having whipped and scourged him before, either within the Pomer or without.] By ver- tue of this law were the Duuivirs created, who by the rigour of that law thought they might not quif to much as a guideles perdon: and having once condemned him, then one of them gave sentence and said: I judge thee O Publius Horatius a murderer and an enemy to the flate of Rome. Go Lifeter therefore, and bind his hands together. Then came the Lifeter and caft a cord about them. But Horatius, by the advice of Titius, a gentle and mild interpreter of the Law, I appeal (quoth he.) So upon his appeal was the matter debated, and to be tried before the people: who were not a little troubled in deciding or judging his caufe, and moft of all in regard of Publius Horatius the Father, crying out and faying. That he deemed his daughter was juftly and wor- thily killed: otherwise he would himfelf have punifhed his fon by his fatherly authority. Be- feeching moreover, that they would not now make him childifes, whom ere while they law with a good company of children about him. And therewithal the old fathher: embracing the young man, and fiewing the fpoils of the Curati, fix up and hanging in that very place which now is called Pila Horatia, a Pillar. And can ye indeed (O ye Romans, quoth he) abide to fee him bound under a Gallow tree, yes, and whipped and tormentated, whom a while afore ye beheld to match in great glory and jollity for his achiuved victory? So encumfe and foul a fight as which, the Albans themfelves can hardly fuffer. Go Lifeter, go bind thofe fpoils which they armed a little before, wan the people of Rome their dominion: Go Lay and hoodwink his head who faved and delivered this City from bondage, hang him by the neck, and triangle him upon a curfed tree: forcure him and fpare not, either within the circuit of the walls, fo it be among thofe javelin and fpoils of the enemies: or without the walls, fo it be within the compafs of the Curati. Sepulchres. For to what place can you lead this young gentleman, where his honors be his may not fave him from fo unworthy and shameful punishment? The people could no longer endure, either the tears of the old fathher, or the contruitation of the youth his fon, who fhewed himfelf till the fame, and not to change for any danger. So they quitt him, in the honorable regard of their prouds and valor, in the right and equity of his caufe. Yet to the end the murder to manifeft and openly known, fhould be in fome fort expiate, and satisfaction made thercfor, his father was charged to purge his fons fin, and make amends, at the expences of the City. Who having performed certain purgatory sacrifces, which afterward belonged to the house and family of the Horatii, put a ratter or beam cross overwaert the street, and caufed the young man with his head covered to go under, as under a yoke or gallows: which remaineth yet unto this day, from time to time at the City charges repaired, and they call it Sator- vimus Tigitium, i. e. The Sifiers beam. And in that very place where Horatia was wounded and fell down, her tomb was erected of four square stone.

But not long continued the Albans in quiet and peace. For the common people finding fuit and greatly discontented, that the whole flate of the Weale-publick was put into the hands of three fouldiers, incited fo, and poifoned the vain and fhirite head of the Dictator: that for as much as plain and upright dealing iped no better, he began to win again the hearts of his Commons by crooked means, and indirect courses. Seeking therefore war in time of peace, as before in time of war he fought peace: and feering his people had more heart then hand; and their strength not anfwerable to their fkomacks: he stirred up other nations, openly by way of pro- clamation and defiance to make war, and relevcd his own men under a colour of league and confedery, for to pratie treason and falldoth. The Fidenates, a Colony of the Romans, having made the Veientians partakers of their confell, and combined with the Albans to forfake the Romans, when time came, and turn up them, brake out and took arms. When Fidene had thus openly revolted, Titius went for Mefius and his power from Alba, and fearched forward against his enemies: and palling over the river Anio, encamped near the confluent, where both streams meet together. Between which place and Fidene, the army of the Veientians had croffed the Tyber, who put themfelves in the right wing of the bartel fast by the river, and the Fidenates in the left, left nearer to the mountains, Tullus directly opposeth his own forces against the Veientians, and placeth the Albans to affront the Fidenates. The Alban Captain having as little heart as honesty and truth, neither durst keep his standing, nor openly turn unto the enemy, but by little and little withdrawth himself toward the mountains; and when he thought he had gained vantage enough, he mounted up the hills with all his companies, and with a wavering mind to spend the time, dislayth his ranks. His intent and purpose was, on what side fortune seemed to give the better, with them to join and take their part. The Romans that stood next perceiving their flanks nacked by reason of the departure of their friends and allies, at first marvelled much at the matter: but afterwards there gallopt an horseman, and advertised the King that the Albans were gone away, Tullus in this so fearful and dangerous case, vouched twelve Tribus Salis and two Tempes to Pater and Pater, i.e. to Palenets and Fear (and with a loud voice cried out in the hearing of his enemies, commanding the said horseman to return to the bartel, laying, There was no cause at all to fear, for that himself had commanded the Alban host to wheel and get back, and to charge the Fidenates on their backs where they lay open. Willing him expressly moreover, to cause the men of arms to hold up their lances on end. By which means, a great part of the footmen could not see the Albans as they departed and went their ways. And those that had seen, thinking it was a truth which they heard the King to speak, fought so much the more hotly. So the tear turned now from them, and fell upon the enemies: for they heard the King when he spake so loud, and also a great many of the Fidenates being co-habitiis with the Romans, underfoold Latine. For fear therefore, that the Albans should all on a sudden run down from the hills, and stop their passage to the town, they turned their backs and fled, Then Tullus preffeth hard upon them; and having discontented the Fidenates wing, cometh back more fiercely upon the Veientians, being already amazed at the fright of the other. Neither were they able to withstand the brut. Howbeit the river behind between their backs kept them at first from flying away, but afterwards when their flight bended thitherward: some flinging their weapons shamefully away, like blind men, ran headlong into the water other lingering still, and stying on the bank side, doubtful whether to flee, or to stick to it and fight, were trod under foot, and howse in pieces. Never had the Romans before that day a more cruel battle. Then the Alban army, which beheld and saw all this conflict, descended down into the plain. And Metius, footloth, rejoiceth much on this behalf for his victory, Tullus again spakeeth Metius fair, and gavetheroger, that the Albans in a good hour should join their camp to the Romans: and against the next day, prepared a purging or Lulifal sacrifice. The morrow when it was day, and that all things were in readiness, according to the manner, he commanded both armies to assemble together to an audience. The Criers, beginning at the farthest part of the camp, summoned the Albans first, Who also for the strange news of the matter, and desirous to hear the Roman King to make him his Oration, prest forward to stand next, The Roman legion on it purpoze, as it was before decreed, flood armed round about, and hemmed them in: and the Centurions had in charge without delay to execute whatsoever they were commanded.

Then began Tullus to speake in this wise, ‘Hence in any war heretofore had causeth, O Romans, to render thanks, first to the immortal gods, and then to your own manhood and valor, certainly it was in yeidethays battle. For ye fought not then with the force of your enemies more then with the treachery and falshood of your friends and confederates, which is the greater conflict and far more dangerous. For to put you clean out of doubt, and to bear you no longer in hand with a wrong peruation: The Albans went up toward the hills without my commissi on, neither was that my commandment, but a policy and comrreance only of command: to this end, that ye not knowing how ye were forfaken, might not withdraw your hearts from fight, and alo that your enemies seeing they were environed behind, should be afraid and do enforced to flee. Yet are not the Albans all in general to be charged with this fault which I reprove. They did but follow their leader, as ye likewife would have done, if I had willed the marke to have turned any whither from thence. It is Metius that was the guide and leader of this journey, Metius is he that is the worker and deviser of this war. Metius I say it, and none but Metius, the breaker of the Roman and Alban league. But let who that will from henceforth presume hardly to do the like, if I make not him a notable example to all the world. The Centuries flood armed round about Metius, and the King goeth on with the reit of his speech as he began, and said: ‘That which I pray God may turn to the good prosperity and happiness of the people of Rome, of my self, and you the Albans, I am minded to reduce all the Alban nation to Rome: to reduce the Commons with the freedom of the City: to advance their chief Gentlemen to the order of Senators, and to make one uniform City and Common-wealth: that as in times past the Albans stood, out of one body was divided into twain, so now it may be united and become one again. At these words the Albion unarmed, and beate on every side with armed men, albeit they were distracted in mind, yet were they forced with a general fear to keep silence, and hold their peace. Metius Suffecus (quoth Tullus then) If thou couldst have learned to keep allegiance, promise, and covenant, thou mightest have been taught it as my hands with lee. But now since thy froward nature is incurable, teach thou this thy fearful example and death all mankind, to hold and reputethosethings as sacred and holy, which have by thee been broken and violate. Like as therefore crewshiles thou barest a double heart in doub-ful bollance, between the the Fidenates and the Romans sate: even so freightways shalt thou yeild thy body to be drawn asunder, and plucked in two pieces accordingly. Thenforth with he caused two teams of four horses to beset to, and hiatus to besieged and tinct into the chariots to them belonging. Afterwards were the horses driven a contrary way, and carried with them in both chariots the body torn in pieces as far forth as the limbs hung fast together by their cords and ligaments: which made all men, their eyes from beholding so cruel and horrible a spectacle. This was the first and last punishment that ever the Romans executed with so little respect or none at all (to say a truth) of the laws of humanity. In all other they may lately make their boast, that no nation in the world hath been like delighted and pleased with extremity of torment.

Whilst these things were in doing, there had been certain horsemens sent afore to Alba, for to translate the multitude to Rome. After whom were the legions also of the toomen thither led, to raise and destroy the city. At whose entrance within the gates, there was not that filr not fearful hurry, as usually is seen when cities are lost: and when with breaking down the gates, beating and battering the walls with rams and other engines, setting the citadel, the enemies mount, and the armed soldiers run to and fro in the city, killing and slaying, firing and burning all afore them as they go: but a sad silence, and a still kind of sorrow and penitences so poffed, and alone, all their minds, that for fear forgetting what to leave behind them, or what to take with them, without advice and counsel, one asking another what to do, they one while flood in their house entries, another while ran up and down warrding in their houses, as if their last day had been come. But so soon as they heard the horsemans cloud, and command them with menning to void and depart, and that now the rating of the tiles and flakes from off the houses, as they were a pulling down, was from the houfe part of the town heard: and that the dust raised from places far off, had as it were with a cloud overcast and filled all: they every man being up hastily, and carrying forth what he could, leaving their domesticks, gods leaving their houses wherein they had been born, bred, and bought up, departed forth: so that now they flayed the flies as they were clofe on a row together, and the light one of another, with mutual complaint, redoubled their tears and woule complaints. Yeas those pittious moans and lamentations were heard of women especially, as they paled by their fair and sable churches, bese with fonders, and abandoned their gods as it were in captives and prisoners. After the Albus had thus quit the city, down went the Romans every where with the buildings as well, publick as private, and laid them even with the ground: and so in one hour defroyed and razed four hundred yeares work for so long had Alba flood and flourished. Howbeit the tempes of the gods they spared, for the king had given commandment, Rome all this while rich in the spoil of Alba. The number of Citizens increased double to enlarge the city the mount Capitum was annexed to it: and that it should be better people and more inhabited, Tullus had his royal seat and palace there, and therein from that time forth he kept his court. The chief Citizens of the Albas he advanced to the order of Senators, that he might augment that state also of the Commonweal: namely, the houses of the Tullius, Servilius, Quintus, Gracchi, Curtius, etc., and for that degree and order of Senators by him encreased, he build an hall or new court, called until our fathers dayes Holibra cura, that all citizens and degrees might out of this new people be somewhat strengthened, he chose from out of the Albus ten or ten houses of horsemens, and with the fame supply he both fulfilled the number of the old legions, and also made and enrolled new.

Tullus upon this affiance he had in his strength and power denoumceth war against the Sabins, and people in those dayes of all other most puissant and mighty, both in men and munition, near the Tusans. Wrongs had been done, and outrages committed on both parts, and restitution or amends demanded, but to no effect. Tullus found himself grieved, that divers occupiers or merchants of Rome, at an open mart or fair of great resort before the temple of Merula were laid hold upon and apprehended. The Sabins on the other side complained, that their men not withstanding they took sanctuary in a certain laced and privileged grove, were arrested and in hold at Rome. These were the quarrels and occasions pretended of the war. The Sabins well remembering, that not only part of their own forces was by Tullus translated to Rome, and there planted, but also that now of late the puissance of the Romans was well amended by the supplement of the Albas, began likewise for their part to call about, and seek for help abroad, and forain aids. Now was Tullus their neighbour nation, and of the Tusans the covert unto them were the Veientians. From hence they get certain voluntary to take their part, by reason that their minds already were well disposed to revolt upon old grudges and remon remaining still of the former war plait: otherwise also vagrants and idle persons of the rural forts, and needy commoners, were soon hired for mony. But as for any incursion from thence by publick consent of the state they had none at all. So much prevailed even with the Veientians (for in that it was least marvel) the faithful covenant of peace concluded with Romanus. Now when their preparations of war were made on both sides to the uttermost of their power, and that it flood upon this point, That they were like to have the odds and vantage, who should begin first and enter the field: Tullus prevented the enemies and invaded the Sabine land. A sharp and bloody battle was there fought under the wood Malienis. Where the Romans bare themselves bravely that day, much upon the valour of the Legionary foot-
A footmen, but more upon the strength of their men of arms, whose number lately was augmented; for by the faithful and forcible charge of the foremen, the battle of the Sabins was so broken, their ranks so disordered, that they could neither stand close together to fight it out, nor yet force themselves to fly, without great slaughter and bloodshed.

The Sabins thus vanquished, and the kingdom of Tullus and the whole state of Rome, being very glorious and wealthy; behold, news came to the King and Senators, that in the A. L. an mount it rained thrones: which hardly was believed, and therefore certain men were sent of purpose to see this strange and prodigious sight: who might plainly behold thrones to fall thick out of the skies like as when tempestuous winds drive hail in big round balls upon the earth. They imagined merely, that they heard a great and mighty voice out of the grove from the top of the hill crying unto them, and warning the Albines to do sacrifice and divine service according to the rites and ancient manner of their forefathers, which they had discontinued and forgotten, as it together with their country, they had abandoned their gods, and either taken to the Roman fashion, or else brought angry with fortune (as it is commonly said) for to assert and neglected the worship of the gods altogether. The Romans likewise upon that miraculous sign, for the purging and expiation thereof, celebrated publick sacrifices for the space of nine days, called a Novenda, either because they were moved thereto by that voice from heaven, for that also is reported to have taken direction from the sibyls, that pray into the inwards of beasts. Certain it is, that a solemn sollemn remained till this day, and whosoever word cometh of the like wonder, they keep holyday nine days together. Not long after this, the pestilence raged in the city. And albeit the people thereby to lack food and military service; yet would not this martial prince give them telt and require from war, being of this mind, that the bodies of young men were more healthy in armour, abroad in the open field, than at home in the city under court: until him human strength fell sick of a long and lingering disease. Then that haughty and courageous flamma of his together with his lofty and able body, became so abated, that he who before thought nothing lefie befell a king, than to let his mind, and bally his brains about religious ceremonies; now all upon a sudden became wholly devoted to all kind of superstition both more and less, yet, and filled the peoples heads besides with holiness and desolation. So as now the very common fort withing again for the old world, under the reign of King Numa, were fully prevailed, that there was no other remedy left for their sick and diseased bodies, but to obtain at Gods hands grace and pardon. Men say, that the king himself in perusing and turning over the Commentaries and registers of Numa his predecessor, and therein finding certain hidden and solemn facies that had been unto Jupiter Eleusis retailed himself, and kept close within a house to celebrate the same. But for that this holy service was neither begun aught nor duly admitted, he had not only no divine apparence and heavenly vision presented unto him, but also incurred the heavy displeasure and wrath of Jupiter, whom by his preposterous religion he had thus quitted; and lo! both him and his whole house were consumed with lightning. This Tullus, in great glory and renown of martial prowess, reigned two and thirty years.

When Tullus was dead, the government returned again, as it was from the first beginning ordained, unto the Senators; who named an Interregent, and he called a Parliament, wherein the people elected Ancus Martius for their King, and the Senators gave their assent thereto. This Ancus Martius, was Numa's son, who so soon as he was come to the crown, both in remembrance of his grand-fathers glorious government, and also in regard of the reign of his next predecessor, which in other points right excellent and commendable, in this only failed, and was not so happy: either for that religion was neglected, or not with due ceremonies exercised: and thinking it a thing most necessary, and of greatest moment, to reduce all publick divine service and sacrifices to the first institution of Numa, commanded the Arch-priest or High-Priest to make an extract, and transcript of all the said rites and mysteries out of Numa his Commentaries, and ingros them into one table, and to publish them abroad unto the people: whereby both his subjefts and citizens disunited, as also the States thereby adjoining, were in good hope, that the king would altogether conform himself, and take after the customs and ordinances of his grand-father.

Hereupon the Latins, with whom in King Tullus his days a league was made, took heart amongst them, made inroads into the country about Rome, and fought out booties. And when the Romans demanded restitution, they made them a proud answer, flattering like, that the King of Rome would pass the whole course of his reign in eafe and idleness, sitting still in his chappel, and by his holy altars. But Ancus was of a mean and indifferent disposition by nature, having an eye as well to Numa, as to Rome, and composed as it were of both. For over and besides, that he thought peace more expedient and necessary for his grandfathers reign, the people being as then but little men, united, and fierce and wrathful: considering also, that himself should not easily, without taking wrong, enjoy the quiets and quietness which to him happened: for that his patience was already tried, and not once tried, but also despised: and seeing that the State of the present time was fitter for a Tullus to be King, than a Numa; yet to the end that, as Numa in time of peace instituted ceremonies of religion, so he might likewise set out to politer others concerning war: and that wars should not be onely made, but also denounced and proclaimed orderly, and in some religious form of solemnity: he he set down in writing that law and formal order; by virtue whereof restitution is demanded (which at this day the Fecales or Heralds observe) like as he received it from the ancient people.

The ambassador, coming to their borders, at whose hands the goods are required again, covering his head with a bonnet or veil of woollen yarn, faith thus: Hear O Jupiter, give ear ye limits and confines (naming them of such and such a Country) let justice and right be known also to what I shall say: I am the public messenger of the people of Rome, of a just and religious observance and I come, and to my words give credit. After this, he rehearest he all his demands, and then calleth Jupiter to witness, saying: If I unjustly and impietiously demand, that such persons should be delivered, or such and such goods be rendered unto me, the public messenger of the people of Rome: then let me never return again to enjoy mine own country. These words rehearest he, as the fettheth foot, and steps into the confines: the same also he speaketh to him whomsoever he meeteth first: the self same words he pronounceth, as he entereth within the gate of the City; yea, and when he is come into the market place he faith the same, changing and varying in some few words, from the precise form of the demand, and taking the solemn oath. In case then, the persons whom he requireth, be not yielded after 33. days expired (for so many jut are usually granted) then proclaimeth he war in this wife, *Hear O Jupiter, and thou Juno, Quirinus thus: ye celestial Saints all, and terrestrial powers, ye infernal spirits also listen and give ear. I call you all to witness, and protest before you, that this nation (naming them whosoever they be) is unjust, and doth not according to right and equity. But of these matters we will consult at Rome in our own country, with our elders, and ask their advice how we may come by our own. Herewith returneth the messenger unto Rome for counsel, and presently the King would in theele or such like words, sitting in Counsel with his Peers, move them in this manner. Whereas the Patruar or Herald, in the behalf of the people of Rome, and their Quirites, hath treated with the Patruar, or Herald, in the name of the ancient Latins, and with the folk of the ancient Latins, concerning certain things, differences, justes, and causes thereupon depending: which things they have neither yielded nor paid, nor performed and done; which ought to have been paid, yeelded, performed, and done: what is your judgment? Speaking to him, whole opinion first he asketh in this case. Then (faith he) My advice is, that these things be fought for, and recovered by more force, by just and lawful war. This do I fully agree unto, this do I determine resolveously. After him were the other asked in course: and when the greater number of them who were present accorded thereunto, then by general consent, they were content to proclame war in this order: That the Fecalis or King at Arms should go with a javelin, having an iron head, or with a red bloody spear burn at the end, as far as to their borders or marches: and there in the presence of three witnesses at the least, not under fourteen years of age, should say thus: Whereas the people of the old Latines, and the old Latin folk, have prattised and trespassed against the people of Rome and the Quirites, and whereas the people of Rome and the Quirites have so determined, confirmed, and agreed, that war should be made with the ancient Latines: I therefore together with the people of Rome, do pronounce and proclame and make war with the nations of the old Latines, and with the old Latin folk. And when he had thus said, he lanced his spear or javelin within the confines of the enemies. After this manner then, was restitution demanded of the Latines, and war denounced or proclaimed: which order of proceeding, their posterity by tradition received.

Ancus having committed the charge of divine service and sacrifice unto the Flamines, and the other Priests, levied a new Army, went forth into the field, and by force won Poltorium, a City of the Latines. And following the usual manner of the former Kings his progenitors, who had mightily encreas'd the Roman State, by admitting their enemies into the number of Citizens, transported the whole multitude from thence to Rome. And because the ancient natural Romans inhabited Palatium, the Sabins about the Capitol and rock Tarpeia, and the Albans replenished the mount Caelius: therefore the hill Aventine was allowed this new company to dwell in. Unto whom not long after, there came fresh inhabitants to people it, upon the winning of Tifone and Ficace. But after this, the Romans were driven to recover by war Poltorium again: for that while it flood void and empty, the old Latines had surpried and taken it. Which was the cause, that the Romans destroyed that City quite, that it should not be at all times a receptacle for the enemies. Last of all, when as now the Latines war was driven wholly and brought before Medellina, there for a good while was much ado, and doubtful issue of fight, and inter changeable victory: for that the Town was both well fortified with bulwarks, and furnish'd with a strong garrison of men: and also by reason that the army of the Latines being incamped in plain and open ground, had lunny times with banners displayed, encountered hand to hand with the Romans. At the last Ancus bending his whole power against them, first gave them an overthrow in a set battle: and so having gained rich pilage, returned to Rome. At that time also were many thousands of the Latines received into the City: Who to the end, that the Aventine and Palatium should meet together, were appointed to seat themselves about the Temple of *Mars. The Juiculumlikewise was adjoined unto the City, not for want of ground, but because it might not at any time a fortres and hold for the enemies: which was thought good to be united unto the City, not only with a wall, but also for more commodious passageto and from, with a wooden bridge over Tyber. The Qiritesfos or ditch also, no small defence against the easy acces from the plain grounds, was a work of Ancus. Thus the estate being grown

A grown to exceeding strength and bigness: when as now in so huge a multitude of people there was much confusion, and no difference of well-doing or ill, and thereby many mischief and outrages began secretly to be committed: for to restrain therefore with some terror, such boldness increasing daily more and more, there was a goal or common prison built in the heart of the City, even over against the common place of assembly. And this Kings days not only the circuit of the City was enlarged, but also their Lands and Territories. By reason that the forest Megara was conquered from the Veientians, their Signory reached to the Sea: where, in the very month of Tyber was the town Heculae built, and the fault tires made there about, and upon much noble exploits by arms achieved, the Temple of Jupiter Fercrins, was in more ample and glorious manner re-edified.

B In the reign of Ancus there came to dwell at Rome one Lucumo a pregnant nimble headed man, and a wealthy, upon a desire especially and hope of advancement and honor, which at Tarquinius, (where he was born, although descended or foreign parentage) he had no means to attain thereto. The Son he was of Democritus the Corinthian, who upon his troubles and discontents having fled his country, and by chance planting himself in Tarquinius, there married a wife and had issue by her two sons, named Lucumo and Armus. Lucumo himself her father, and became heir of all his goods. Armus died before his fathers, leaving his wife behind him, conceived with child: neither lived the father Democritus long after his son, who not knowing that his daughter-in-law and sons wife was with child, made no mention at all of his Nephew in his Will, and so departed this world, Whereupon the child after his Grandfathers decease being born to no part of his goods, for his poor condition, was called Ergenius. But Lucumo on the other side the sole heir and inheritor of all, as he began by his wealth to be haughty enough, and to look aloft, so grew much more proud for his matching in marriage with Tarquinius, a dame of a right noble house descended, and who could hardly bear a lower estate and degree then that wherein he was born. When she was once married, and saw the Tarquins to disdain Lucumo, for that his father was a stranger and banished person, she could not endure that indignity. But forgetting all kind of affection to her native country, to the might see her husband raised to high promotion, she resolved and plotted to leave Tarquinius and depart. To which purpose and design, she seemed a place most fit and convenient of all others. For thus the projected and discharged: That in a City lately founded, where all kind of Nobility suddenly cometh up, and añith from vertue and proveds, her husband a valorous and industrious man mult needs have place, and be entertained: that King Tullius a Sabin born, had raigned there: that Numa was from Cures sent for thither, and called to the Crown: that Ancus also a Sabin by his mothers side, had the only image of Numa to shew for his Nobility. Thus the soon perverted him, as being a man ambitious and desirous of honor, and whose mother only was a Tarquinian born, and therefore he was to make his couple of abandoning the place of his Nativity. Thereupon they removed with all they had to Rome. And it fortuit that to fumulium they came. Where, as Tarquinius sat with his wife in the chariot, behold an Eagle came gently flying down from aloft, and took up his banquet from his head, and soaring over the chariot with a great noise, and clapping of her wings, as if she had been sent from Heaven to do this feast, let it gently and handomly on his head again: which done, the mounted on high, and flew away, Tarquinius, as they lay, embraced this Augury with great joy, being a woman skillful, as commonly all the Tarquins are, in such prodigious things and apparitions from Heaven: and therewith taking her husband about the neck, willed him to be of good cheer, and to hope for great matters and high prerogatives: saying, how that bird came from such a quarter of the Heaven addressed as a messenger from such a god, and shewed a divine token and prestige upon the highest part of man, even the top of the Crown, and lifted up the ornament that stood upon his mortal head, to give it him again immortal, as from God above. In these hopes and cogitations which they entertained by the way, they entered the City: where they took an house, and from thence forth he was commonly called L. Tarquinius. Now within a while both his new coming and his wealth withal, made him well known: and himself also besides, set forward his good fortune by courteous and fair speech and affable language to every man, by friendly visiting, and liberal feasting, and by making what friends he could by gifts, favours, and good turns; so far forth, as the fame of him came into the Kings Court: where, by his willing service and singular dexterity, in short time he had not only access to the Kings knowledge, but also entered into familiar acquaintance and friendship with his Highness. Infomuch that both in private Councils and publick consultations, as well as home as abroad, he was always present, and bare a great share. And having in all kind of offices carried himself with credit, was in the end by the Kings late Will and Testament made Tutor or Protector of his children: Thus raigned Ancus 24. years, for glory and reputation of his government, as well in war as in peace, equal as to any of the former Kings his predecessors.

G Now were his sons near 14. years of age when he died. Tarquinius therefore made the more haste, that the high Court of Parliament should with all speed possibly be summoned for creation of a King, which being against a day proclaimed, he sent away the boys to the chase a hunting, at the very instant of the said election. He himself, (as men say) was the first that both ambitionately fought for the Crown: and also for to win the hearts of the Commons: devised and framed an eloquent Oration, "Saying, it was no new and strange thing that he flood for: And where he was not the
the first (that any man should be offended, or make any wonder) but the third alien that in Rome and accused and aspire to the Kingdom: that both Titus, not of a foreigner only, but of an enemy became King; and Nero likewise, a man unacquainted with the City and matters of State, was without any moderate feeling of his part, by the Romans sent for, and advanced to the crown, As for himself, he alleged and laid, that from the time that he was at his own liberty and disfraccd him of himself he with his wife and all that he had removed and came to Rome and of that age wherein men are employed in civil affairs, he had spent a greater part in Rome, then in his own ancient country. Moreover, that he was trained up both at home in the City and in war abroad, to the knowledge of the Roman laws, orders, and customs, and that under no mean person but an excellent master, even King Ancus himself. And finally, for faithful service and diligent attendance about the King, he had endeavoured to pass all others; and for liberality and courtesy towards all others, he had it given to go beyond the King, Thence and such-like allegations, as he laid forth and pleaded, and that right truly, the people of Rome with exceeding great content elected him their King. Who being a man otherwise of singular parts and of great worth, as he was ambitious in seeking the kingdom, so continued he still, when he were the crown; and minding no less to establish his own throne and throne than to maintain the good estate of the Common-wealth, advanced one hundred and more to the order of Senators, who afterwards were called Minorum Centum Tarves, as a man would say, Senators of a later sort, and meaner quality, A fiction, no doubt to take part and side with the King by whole means they had been admitted into the Senate. The first war he made, was with the Latins: from whom by force he won the town Appio, &c. from hence having brought away a greater pillage in proportion, than the war imported in brute, he set forth, and plays more patiently and with greater furniture and provision, than the other Kings before him. Then was the plot or compis of ground first let out & appointed for the hills or theater, called now Cursus maximi, wherein were alligned scaffolds for the Senators and for the Gentlemen or Knights severally by themselves, called Portis, where they might make them places to see the pillatimes at their ease and pleasure: And in this manner flood they to behold; namely, upon scalfolds born up twelve foot high from the ground with forked perches or props. The gamings were running of horses, and fighting of bulls and buffets: for performance whereof, there were champions sent for of purpose, especially out of Tyre. These sports continued afterwards from year to year in great solemnity, and named diversely, either the Roman games, or the great Games. This King moreover assign'd certain places about the Forum or common place for private men to build in where the galleries and shops were made, He went in hand likewise to wall the City about with a stone wall, but the Sabin war flaid him in the beginning, that he went not forward with that work. This came so suddenly upon him, that the enemies were pass'd over the river Anio, before the power of the Romans could meet them, and make head against them. Whereupon great fear there was at Rome. And at the first a cruel conflict there was, and much blood shed on both parts, but no appearance of victory. But after the enemies were retired once into the camp, and that the Romans had time to gather fresh forces, Tarquinius supposing his only want was in his cavalry, determined to join unto the Romans, his enemies, which Romulus had ordained, other Centuries or Cornets of horsemen, and them to leave unto the policy after him, bearing his own name. Which because Romulus had done afo time by the counsel and advice of Angurs, Accius Novius renowned and famous in those days for his skill that way, opposed himself and gave out plainly, that there might be nothing changed or newly ordained in that behalf unlesse the birds first approv'd and allowed the same, Whereat the King was wroth, and in scorn and derision of his art, as they say: Come on Sir Soothsayer (quoth he) I see, and tell me by the flight of your birds, whether that may possibly be done, which I now conceive in my mind. To which demand Novius, who had first made proof thereof by his learning, answer'd refolutely, that it might in very deed be effect'd. Why then (quoth he) I have imagined in my conceit, that thou shalt cut a wheatsheaf together with a rato: Here take them to thee, and dispatch that thy fowls foresaw may be done: then as the report goeth, without more ado, he cut the wheatsheaf quire in two. And in that very place where this feat was done, the Statue or Image of Accius was erected, with his head cover'd, even in the Comitium, at the walls thereof on the left hand of the Curia or Council Houle. It is reported that the wheatsheaf also was set up in the same place, for a memorial to all posterity following, of that miracle. Certainly, both Angurs, and the Priesthood and Colleged of Angurs from that time forward was so highly honored, and had in such reverence, that never after was there ought done, either in war abroad, or in peace at home, but by their counsel and advice. Assemblies of people fummon'd were dismissed, armies levied and ready to take the field were discharged, yea, and the greatest affairs of State, were given over and laid aside, when the birds allowed not thereof. Neither did Tarquin for that time alter the Centuries of the horsemen any white, only he redoubled the number, so that in three Centuries or Cornets there were 1500 horse, and thole later sort who were added to the others, bare the names of the former, which at this day, because they be double, are called the six Centuries, Tarquin thus having encreas'd that part of his power, bade the Sabins battle the second time. And over and besides, that the Romans army was in strength well amended, he devised also privily a subtillest stratagem, and set certain men to set on fire a mighty stack of wood, lying upon the bank of Anio, and to caft it into the river: the wood burning still by the help of the wind, and most of it being driven against the piles of the bridge, and

A and there sticking cloie together with the boats and planks, fired and consumed it clean. This accident both terrified the Sabinis in their flight, and when they were dismayed, troubled them much, and hindered their flight: so that many a man having escaped the enemy, yet perished in the very river. Whole armor and weapons floating down the river, were known at Rome, and brought news therewith, in manner before word could be brought thereof by land. In this conflict the horsemen won great price and praze. For being placed at the skirts of both the wings, at what time as the main battle of their own footmen, were now at the point to retire, they charged fiercely upon the enemy (as it is reported) from the flanks where they were marshaled, that they not only stayed the Sabin Legions prelting hard and fiercely upon those that began to shrinke and give back, but all at once put them to fight. The Sabin ran amain towards the mountains, but few gath tered: for the greater number, as we said before, were by the horsemen driven into the river. Tegiamus thinking it good to take the time, and follow hard upon them whiles they were righted, after he had left to Rome, the booty with the prisoners, and burned on a heap together (as he had vowed to Vesta) the spoils of the enemies, marched on still forward, and led his army into the Territory of the Sabins: who albeit they had already sustained an overthrow, and could not hope for better successe, yet because they had no time to consult and advise with themselves, with such a power as might on a sudden in that fire be raised, met with him. Where they once again were defeated and vanquished, and in the end being in despair to make their part good, they fled for peace. Then was Collatia, and all the lands about it taken from the Sabins. Egerius the Kings brothers son, was left with a garrison at Collatia to keep that place. And (as I find upon record) the Collatins were yeelded into his hands, and the manner of their surrender went in this order. First, the King demanded thus and said: Are ye Embassadors, or deputed agenls sent from the people of Collatia to make surrender both of your selves and the Collatines? We are (quoth they.) And are the people of Collatia in their own power, and at liberty to do what they will? They are (say they.) Do ye also render up your selves, the people of Collatia their town, their territory and lands, their waters, their limits; their temples, their housefull stuff and implements, and all thing else, as well sacred as profane, into my power and the peoples of Rome. We do yeeld (say they.) Then (quoth he) do I accept thereof, and receive all into my hands. The Sabin war thus finished, Tegiamus returned to Rome in triumph. After this, he was warred upon the old Latines, but they never proceeded so far on any side, as to join issue in a general battle, and one left field for all. But bringing his power first to one town, and after to another, he made a conquest of the whole nation of the Latins. So as the North, Cornualis, old Ficana, Cameria, Confinorinum, Amorina, Medalla, Nomantia, were recovered from the old Latines, or from those that had revolted unto them.

After all this eneed peace. Then he gave more earnestly to go forward with his works, begun in time of peace, then he was before in the managing of his wars: infomuch, as he gave the people no more repose at home: then he had in wars abroad. For besides that he prepared to compass the City (which as yet he had not fortified) round about with a stone wall, the beginning of which piece of work was by the Sabin war interrupted and broken off: he devised also certain draughts or vaulted links from aloft into the fyver, whereby he drained and kept dry the vale City, or lowly grounds about the market place, and the other valleys between hill and hill, for that out of the plains and flats, they might not easily make riddance and conveyance away of the water. Moreover, he levelled a large court or plot of ground, ready for the foundation of the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitol, which he had vowed in the Sabin war, his mind even then giving him, that one day it should be a flately place. At the same time there happened in the court a wonderful strange thing, both in present view, and also in consequence. For as the report went, a young lad, whose name was Servius Tullius, as he lay asleep, in the sight of many persons he had his head all on a light fire. Upon an outcry railed at the wondring of so great a matter, the King arose: and when one of the household brought water to quench the flame, he was by the Queen stayed. And after the fire was some what appea red, she forbade the boy to be disquieted, until such time as he awok of himself: and within a while as the flame departed, the blaze likewise went out, and vanished away. Then Tegiamus the Queen taking her husband aside into a secret room. See you this boy (quoth she) whom we so homely keep, and in so poor and mean estate bring up? Wot well this, and know for certain, that he will one day be a light to direct us in our dangerous troubles and doubtful affaires. He will be the chief pillar and succent of the afflicted state of the Kings house. Let us therefore cherish and foster with all kindness and indulgence the subject matter of so great a publick and private ornament, Whereupon they began to make the boy, as if he had been one of their own children, and to instruct and train him up in those arts, whereby forward wits are fitted to great enterprises, and to achieve high place of wealth and honor. And soon came to that pass, which pleased the allmighty gods. For he proved a young man indeed of princely nature and towaredness: in such sort that where there should be a son in law fought out to match with Tegiamus his daughter in marriage, there was not one of all the young gentlemen of Rome to be found comptable to him in any respect. So as the King advanced his daughter unto him. This great honor whereunto he was advanced upon what occasion or occasion it was, induceth me to think he was not the son of a bondwoman, nor that he served whilst he was a little one, as a slave, I am of their mind rather, that report thus: When
When Curtiusus was won, the wife of Servius Tullius, a great Lord and principal personage of that City, and there fain, was left great with child: and being among other captives known whose wise she was, in regard of her rare nobility only, was by the Queen preserved from servitude, and at Rome in Presens Tarrginius his house, was delivered of a child upon which so special favor, there grew more familiar acquaintance between the two Ladies, the Queen and her self; and the child also brought up of a little one there in Court, was both tenderly beoved, and also highly regarded. But his mothers fortune, whole hap was after her country was lost, to fall into the hands of enemies, caused men commonly to think that he was the son of a bond-slave. Now in the 28th year, almost, after that Tarrginius began his reign, was this Servius Tullius in right great estimation and credit, not only with the King, but also with the nobility and commons. Then the 2, tons of Servius, who as they always before did disdain in the highest degree, that they were by the deceitful prateile of their guardian, so unworthily put by the inheritance of their fathers Kingdom, and that a stranger alighted at Rome, one who was not descended of any neighbor house thereby, no not so much as of Italian blood; so now they began much more to take him amak and indignation, in case that after Tarrginius, the King should not return unto them and their line, but it should run on end, and herself fall unto such base victors. That in the fame City, 100 years almost after that Romulus the son of a god, and a god himself, reigned therein, during the time he remained here upon the earth a very bond-slave and no better, and one born of a bond-woman, should be possessed of the Crown and that it would be a foul stain and dishonor to generality to the name of the Romans, but most especially to their house & family, if whilst the issue Male of Aeneas lived, the K. Kingdom of Rome should lie open, and be exposed, not to strangers alone, but which is more, to very bond-men and slaves. This ignominy therefore, and open wrong, they resolve by more force to put by and avoid: howbeit, the grievance of this injury done unto them, for them on against Tarrginius himself, rather then Servius Tullius: both for that the King if he lived still, would be a more sharp revever of the murder, then a private person: and also it they should happen to kill Servius, whomsoever besides, the King would vouchsafe for his son in law, him was he like to make heir apparent, and inheritor also of the Kingdom. For these considerations they lay wait for to murder the King himself in this manner: There were for the purpose to do this feat, two paining L. Tarquinii the men and furyd herdmen chosen, who having such talietical iron tools about them, as they were of the same sort, and made a great shew of a most tumultuous brawl and fray in the very porch of the Court gate; by which means, they drew all the Kings officers sergeant, and guard about them: then as they called with a loud voice, both the one and the other upon the King, in such wise, as the noise was heard within the palace, they were convened before his Highness. At their first coming they cried out both at once, and interrupted one another in all outrageous manner, so as by a sergeant they were fain to be restrained and commanded to speak by turns, until a length they gave over their confounded wrubbings. Then one of them, on just purpose as it was before agreed upon, began his tale: and while the King as wholy bent to give ear turned aside towards him, the other hit his As aloof, and stuck the King on the head, and leaving it sticking there still in the wound, they whip out both of them together, and ran their ways. And whilst they that blood next about Tarrginius, took him up ready to die, the sergeant made after them that were M. fled, and apprehended them. Whereupon an outcry arose & a great concourse of people, wandering what the matter might be. Thenatus in this hastily called the Court gates to be shut, and commanded every one to avoid the place: and at one instant with all diligence provided things requisite to cure the wound, as if there were some hope of life: and withal, if that should fail, the preparest other means and remedies against the worst that might happen. Sending therefore in all speed for Servius, when she had heaved him her husband half dead, and already blooded, she took him by the right hand, and beaught him not to suffer, neither the death of his father-in-law unrevenge, or his wives mother to be a slanging flock unto the enemies. Thine is the kingdom O Servius by right (quo ite fice) it hon be a man and not theirs, who by the hands of others have comitted a most shamefull & villainous act, Take a good heart therefore, and arm thy self, and follow N. the guidance and direction of the gods, who long since by a divine and heavenly flame burning about thy head, forebodeed that one day it should be highly advanced. Now let that heavenly blaze rise thee up: now awake in every deed: what man! we also be strangers have born the Scepter; consider with thy self who thou art now. and not from whence thou art descended. And if in to hidden an occurrence, thine own with be astonished and to seek, then follow my rule: and be advised by my counsel. In this while the noise and violence of the people was so great, that it could not well be suffered. Then Tanaquil from the upper loft of the house, and a window that opened onto the new street (for the King kept his Court hard by the Temple of Jupiter Sutor) spake unto the people willing them to be of good cheer. “The King indeed (quo ite fice) was amazed and was oven at the sudden stroke, howbeit it went nothing deep for now is he come again O to himself his wound cleansed from blood, and searched all signs of life, and no danger of death: “and I trust in God within a while you shall see himself again. In the mean time his pleasure was that the people shall be obeyant to Servius Tullius: he shall minister justice and give laws, he shall execute and perform all the offices of the King. Then came Servius aboad in his royal robe, called Thoris, attended with the Lif tors, and rising in the Kings throne some caules he dispatched. Thus Thus for certain daies, the King being dead, and his death concealed, he, under colour of executing the function of another, gathered strength to himself. But when at the last it was openly known by the wailing and lamentation which arose in the Palace, that the King was deprived, Servius accompanied with a strong guard, slewed himself, and was the first, that without the election of the people only by the will and consent of the nobles, took the Kingdom upon him.

The sons of Ancus at the first, seeing the murderers attached, and hearing that the King was alive, and Servius so mighty, retired themselves as banished persons to Surnia Pontinum. And Servius now fought means to make himself strong, as well by private helps, as by publicke, and left peradventure the children of Turrus should another day be as ill affected against him, as the children of Ancus were against Tullus, he gave in marriage his two daughters to Lucius and Ancus, two of the Kings sons late deceased. Yet could not he with all the policy of men wit stay the fatal necessity, nor stop and divert the course of the destinies; but that the envy that followed a Kingdom bred all disturb, dilyoyalty, and malice, even among those of his own household, for all their alliance and affinity. Howbeit in such good time, and tidy for the quietness of the present state, was the war with the Vicentors (for now was the term of the truce expired) and other Tufcans, taken in hand. In which war, both the vantage, and also the good fortune of Tullus was well seen and greatly renowned. Who having difcomfited a mighty host of the enemies as undoubted King in the conceit and judgment as well of the Senators as of the Commons, if their hearts had been lound, returned to Rome.

Then in hand went he with a work of peace, and of all other the greater, and of most importance. To the end, that as Namia was the first author of divine Law and Religion: so the policy forever after might report and record, that Servius was the founder of all distinction and orders whereby between degrees of worship and wealth there might be seen due difference, and regard of worth. For he devised and ordained the Cenio, to wit, the Afflicting and Taxation of the Citizens: a thing most profitable to that state and government, which was like in time to come to grow to worth, by which Citizen, the charges and contributions, either in war or peace, was not levied by the poll upon the Citizens, as aforetime, but according to the valuation of their wealth and ability. So he erected certain Classes and Centuries, and appointed their degrees, according to the afflicting, and valuation, meet in decent manner to serve in war, and meet to be employed in peace. And first of those who were rated at an hundred thousand Ases and above, he ordained 80 Centuries: 40 of the elder forts, and as many of the younger: and all joyntly were count the first Classis. The elder were charged to be in readiness at all hours, for defence of the City: the younger to follow the wars abroad. These were bound to find harness, for defence of their own bodies, an headpiece or motion, a shield, greaves, and corselet, all of brass: and for offence of the enemy, a javelin, and a sword. To this Classis were adjoined two Centuries of Carpenters and Smiths, or Engineers, who were in wage, and served without armour: and their charge was to find the Camp Engines of batterie and artillery. The second consisted of three that were valued between 10000 and 75000 Ases. And of this fort both young and old were enrolled twenty Centuries: who were enjoyned to provide for their armour, a target or buckler instead of a shield: and excepting only a corselet, in all points as the former. The third he would have to be of those that were esteemed worth 50000 Ases, and as many Centuries of them, with the same distinction of age. Neither concerning their armour was any thing altered: only for their greaves they were dispencen with. In the fourth Classis were those that were affiled in the subsidy book, between 30000 and 25000 Ases, and of them were 110 Centuries. Their armour was changed, having no more but a spear and a casting dart, with a loop called *Vermm, the fifth was greater containing thirty Centuries. These carried with them filings, and fenes to flyng star off: among whom were reckoned the beadle, or crider, together with the trumpeters and cornetters, who were divided into three Centuries. This band 1000 of them that were affiled from 25000 unto 110000 Ases. The valuation under this comprised all the rest of the multitude. Whereof at one Century, freed and exempted from warfare. Thus having imployed and disposed the forces of the infantry, he enrolled besides twelve Centuries of horsemen, and those out of the principal men of the City: and six other Centuries likewise, to those three that Rome lat instituted, retaining the fame name till that they in their first solemn institution had. These horsemen far to buy their great horses had 10000 Ases out of the chamber of the City a piece: and for to find and keep those horses were the rich widows left yearly at 5000 Ases a piece. Thus were all those charges and burdenes shifted off from the poor men shoulders, and laid upon the rich. And therefore afterward was their dignity and honour much the more. For in the grand-leaets and solemn elections of Magistrates, every man had not prerogative alike, nor equal authority, as Romol's first ordained, and the other Kings continued, when they gave their voices by the poll indiscriminately one with another: but there was distinction made, and certain degrees; but as neither any one was excluded or shut out, and yet the whole refted and lay in the power of the richer forts, and chief of the City. For first the horsemen were called: afterward, the eighty Centuries belonging to the first Classis, of the principal footmen: who if they disagreed, and hapned to be at any difference, then the Centuries of the second Classis were cited. And never went they likely to low as to the last of all. Neither ought any man to marvcl, that this order in their daies, after fifth and thirty tribes compleat, agree not with the Centuries of the elder elder and younger fort, according to the computation set down by Servius Tullius, considering their H numbers is now doubled. For having divided the City into four Wards, according to the quarters and his; those parts which were inhabited he called Tribes, of the word "tributum" (as I suppose.) For he it was that devised and brought up the manner of equall countenance and payment, proportionably to the assessment and rate of mens goods. Neither were these Tribes any waies at all respective to the division or number of the Centuries aforesaid. When this Levy and taxation was finisht, which he dispatched the sooner, by reason of the people's fear of an act by him made, concerning those that should not come in to be registred and enrolled in the Subsidy book; he published an Edict, under pain of imprisonment and death, that all Citizens of Rome, as well horsemen as footmen, should the morrow after at the break of day, every one in his own Century, I shew him himself in Campus Martius, join Mars Field. There, after he had mustered and embattled the whole Army, he acclanted and puged the same with the sacrifice of a Swine, a Sheep, and a Bull. And this was called Considium Labrara. Which was the very closing up and accomplishment of the assessment. In this Labrara there were numbered and enrolled 80000 Citizens, Fabius Pilor, a most ancient writer faith moreover, that so many there were of able men to bear arms. For to contain this multitude, it was thought good the City should be enlarged. Whereupon he adjoyndeth unto it two hils more, to wit, Quirinalis, and Viminaly. After this, he proceeded to augment the mount Elysium; and to grace that hill, and make it of more reputation, there he dwelt himself, and had his Court. He cast a trench and ditch, and raised a rampire about the City, and then walled it: by occasion whereof, he let out the Pomery further. Pomarium, according to the E-K tyymology and literal signification of the word, is as much to say, as Polarium, or the Arre- more, that is, a plot of ground behind, or without the wall. But indeed it is rather a space about the wall on either side, which the Tullians in old time, when they built their Cities, made by advice of Angers, to hallow and consecrate in certain bounds and limits, all along where they minded to let the wall: that neither within, the houses might joyn upon the wall (whereas now adaiy they build close to) and without also, there might be a void piece of ground, lying common, free, and unoccupied of men. This vacant space, that neither might lawfully be inhabited, nor yet eared and plowed, as well because if it was without the wall, it was under or within the wall, is the Romans called Pomarium. And even as the circuit of the City was made larger, look how much the walls should be let out further for those hallowed and consecrated bounds of the Pomary were extended.

Thus the City being much incresed in compas of building, and all things disposed in good order, requisite as well for war as peace; to the end, that he should not always seek to purchase wealth and puissance by war and martial prowess only, he attempted to amplify his dominion by policy, and withall to below and upon the City some glorious ornament to beautifie the same. And even at that time was the Temple of Diana at Ephesos of great fame, and much renowned: which as the report went, was built in common by all the states and princes of Asia. When as therefore Servius would give highly to praiie and commend unto the Lords and heads of the Latines (with whom of purpose he had both in publique and private, mutual entertainament and familiar acquaintance) that general agreement of the Princes of Asia, in matters of religion, and in the uniform worship of the same gods: at length, by much intertaining and following still that them, he prevai- led with them to far that the nations of the Latines, and the people of Rome together built at Rome a Temple unto Diana: which was a plain condition, and clear cane, that Rome was now the imper- iallest, for which they had so often warred. This quarrel albeit now the Latines all in manner had neglected quite, and made no care at all thereof; seeing they had so often attempted it by force of arms, and spid so badly: yet fortune seemed to one only man to caft a favourable aspect, and yeld good hope, by his private policy and industry, to recover again the imperial dignity unto the Latines. A certain hounil; older foriooth of the Sabins, had, as they say, a cow bred with him of a wonderfull bignes, and faire withall, (for a memoriall of which so rare and wonderfull beats the horns were set up, and remained fail fixt in the porch of Diana Temple, many a hundred years after:) this was suppos'd (as it was no lesse in very deed) a strange and prodigious thing: and the N w i e men or wizards prophesied, that the surreaigny and Empire should be settled and established in that State, where at any one Citizen sacrifed that cow unto Diana, This prophesie came to the ears of the Priest of Dian Temple. The Sabin above saide, so soon as he had espied a meet and convenient day for sacrifice, drives the cow to Rome, and leads her to the Temple of Diana, and there presented her before the Altar: where the Roman Priest wondering to see so huge a beast, whereof there had been fo much speech, and calling to mind withall the forsaied Oracle, spake to the Sabin in this wise. My friend ( quothe) what mean you to sacrifice so uncleanly unto Diana, and do not rather purifie and wash your self all over in some running streem, before you come hither? Lo where Tyber runneth in the valley beneath. The stranger then, moved with some scruple of confidence, who defined nothing more, than that all should be well and orderly done, that an O happy success might be correspondant and answerable to fo prodigious a beast, forthwith went down to the Tyber. In the mean while, the Roman killed the Cow in honor of Diana, This thing pleased the King and the whole City wonderfull well.

Servius, albeit he were now without all question by fo long continuance, fully and really inve- nted in the Kingdom yet because he heard say, that young Tarquinius otherwise gave out speeches of him, that he reigned without the nomination and election of the people: therefore after he had A first want the hearts of the Commons, by dividing among them every one certain lands gotten by conquest from the enemies, he adventure to propound unto the people, and put it to their suffrages and voices. Whether their will and pleasure was, that he should reign over them. Thus was he declared King with as great consent, as never any before with the like. But Tarquinus for all this, had neverthelesse hope to aspire and attain unto the Crown: nay, rather so much the more, because he understood the said division of the lands among the Commons, was a thing concluded and passe against the will and mind of the Senators. Taking thereupon occasion thereby to accuse and blame Servius before them, he supposed he had good means offered to wind himself into favor with the Lords of the Senate, and so to become strong in the Council-house. Over and besides, he was both himself a young man of great courage and hottemper, and his wife likewise at home, dame Tullia, lay ever upon him, and pricked forward his disempered and troubled mind: for you must think, that the roayall Court of Rome also hath brought forth and afforded one example of a tragic-call and horrible act; that by a weareiness and loathning, on eived against the Kings government, liberty and freedom might the sooner enue: and that raion be the lai, which was by milchief gotten first. This L. Tarquinus, whether he were the son or nephew of Priamus Tarquinus, it is not very clear, howbeit, I would rather think with most writers, that he was his son, A brother he had, Arvis Tarquinus, a young gentleman of a mild nature, these two (as is aforesaid) had married the two Tullia the Kings daughters, and they also themselves were in conditions far unlike, and happy-ily it to tell out that two froward and violent natures were not coupled together in wedlock: such C was the good fortune. I believe, of the Roman people, that thereby the raion of Servius might continue the longer, and the City brought and settled in good order. The younger Tullia, a stout dame and a proud grieved and vexed much that her husband had nothing in him, no metall or matter scall either to cover and desire, or to enterprice and adventure: her mind was fully set upon the other Tarquin, him she esteemed highly, and had in admiration, him he laide to be a man indeed, and deceased of roayall blood. As for her sister, she despight and checked her, for that she haing a forward and valorous Knight to her husband, (the Tarquinus,) and seconded him not in audacity and boldness, as a woman should doe. Well, in short time Iikeines and disposition soon brought them together, and as it is commonly seen, Naught will to naught, and fort beit together. But the milchief and trouble that brought all up-side down, arose from the woman. For the using to have secret D conference with her sisters husband, never ceased to speak badly, and to rail of her own husband unto his brother, and of her sister unto her husband. Affirming in good earnest, it were better both for her self to be a widow, and for him to live single, and with not a wife, than to be mitmaatched as they were, through the craven cowardice of others to languish and come to nothing. As for her self, if the gods had given her an husband according to her own quality and worthines, she doubted not to see, and that shortly, the Crown in her own house, that now she feeth in her fathers, in this manner poolely she the quickly the humorous young man, and fil-hed his head with her own raffines and follies. Now when Arvis Tarquinus, and the elder Tullia who died just in a manner both at one time, had well rid their own houses, and made way and overcurse for a new marriage, it was not long but they were married, with Servius his leave and convenency, rather than to his good liking. But then every day more than other began Tullus to be a continually more in their eies, his old age hatefull, and his raion more odious: for now the woman minded nothing but one milchief upon another: and would not suffer her husband to be at rest night nor day, lest peradventure the former murders done and pait, should serve to no purpose, and mis the effect of their depignments. And thus the brake out and faid, That the wanted not before one that carried the name of an husband, with whom she served, and kept her self quiet and said nothing. But she had a want of one, that thought himself worthy of a kingdom, that remembered he was the son of Tarquinus Priamus, that loved better to be feated of a Crown and scepter indeed, than hope for a kingdom, and hear thereof. But for (quoth she) if you be the man to whom I take my self wedded, then I call you both husband and king: if not, then our cafe changed for F the worse, in that cowardlines is accompanied now with wickednesse. Why resolve you not?
why amin you nor your self, and go about this busines? you need not go so far as to Corinthus or Tarquinus for to seek and compass forrain kingdoms, as your father did. The gods of your own house and native country the image and example of your father, the Kings Palace, and therein the royal face and throne of late, ye, the very name of Tarquin, greateth, named, and faideth you King, But an if your father will not serve you to these degins, why bear you them in hand hand and deceive them? why take you fo upon you as you doe, to swow your self as a kings son? Get you hence to Corinthus again, away to Tarquinus, turn backward to your former flock and condition, more like to your brother than to your father. With these and such like motives, by way of reproof the he checklist the young man, and pricked him forwards: and the he for her for G part could be at no repose for thinking that Tanaquil an alien and stranger born, could contrive in her head, and effect so great a matter, as to make two kings together. one after other, namely, her husband first, and afterwards her son in law: and she her self, a Kings daughter, could bear no stroke either in giving or taking away a kingdom. Tarquinus kindled with these furies and temptations of a woman, went about, laboured and made count to the Nobles, especially those that were Minorum gentium: often times putting them in mind of the pleasures and favours that his father had done them, and requiring now of duty the like good turn at their hands. The young men the
flower and manhood in general of the City, he wrought and won to himself with gifts: and so H partly with great promises what wonders would he do, and partly with raising fandiers upon the King in all places, and charging upon him odious crimes, he grew very great and mighty. At the last, eyping a convenient time to let on foot, and put in execution his intended projects, with a strong guard of armed men, he entred forcibly into the Forum or common place of assembly, where the people all surprized with great fear, he fat him down upon the Kings throne, even at the entrance of the Curia or Senate house, and there, by the voice of the crier summoned the Senators to council before King Tarquinius. Who forthwith with them assembled together: Some, thereto made and prepared to rend the others, for fear they not coming might turn them into displeasure, And as they were attioned at this strange and wonderful sight, so they thought Sertorius utterly undone, and his cafe desperate. There Tarquinius began an inquieting in speech & reproachful terms, touching the first pedigree or parentage of Servius saying, that he being a slave, & born of a bondwoman, after the cruel and shameful death of his father Tarquin usurped the Kingdom: not by "means of an Intercin, as the order was foretime, nor by a solemn assembly, and the free voices "of the people, nor yet by the affent of the nobles but only through the wife and fraud of one woman. And as he was (quoth he) thus born and thus created King, so hath he been a partial lover ever of the balet fort even such as his; and in hatred of the noble birth of others hath divided amongst the vilest persons, and taken from the chief men of the City; and all such burdens and charges, as had been in times past common to all, he hath call upon great periogues of quality and worth, and set up an affeding or taxing, that the flate of the wealthieer persons being made K known and exposed to envy, he might bring them into disgrace with the people, and by those their goods upon the poorest and needful at his pleasure. Amidst this Oration of his came Servius in place, advertised of the matter by a fearful messenger in all haste. And presently began to cry out with a loud voice at the very porch or entry of the Curia. What is this here, quoth he and what "meaneath this O Tarquin how darest thou in my life assemble the Senators or sit on my feet? "Whereunto he stoutly made a proud answer that he did but keep his fathers throne, and being "as he was, a Kings son, he deemed himselfe more worthy to be inheritor of the Kingdom than a "bondslave: and as for him, he had been laborous enough to play with his good Maiters, and to intit to his betters. With this arose a great clamour from the partakers and complies of both sides the people they ran from all parts to the Council-houle, and like it was, that the stronger should be King, Then Tarquinius being put to his shutes, and forced to cry the unmute, seeing no other remedy, took Sertorius by the middle, as being himself muuch yonger and stronger far, carrid him out of the Council-houle, and threw him down from the stairs head to the foot and so returned again into the Senate-houle to get the Senators together. The King Officers with the guard attending upon him, fled: Himself: well near dead, with certain of his couriers and train, breathles: also for fear, made speed, and retired towards his Palace, as far as to the top of Cyprinus street, where he was overtaken by them that were sent by Tarquinius, and so flain outright. And it is very thought, that this was done by the yetation and procurement of Tullius: to little difagreeth it from other wicked pranks of hers. But this one thing is known for certaintie, that she came riding in her coach into the common place of assembly, and nothing defianied or abashed at the presence of many men there met together, called forth her husband out of the Senate-houle, and was the first that filled him with the title of King. By whom the being willing to depart away out of that strong and uprose as the returned homeward as far at the pitch of Cyprinus street, where was of late a place confected unto Diana, called Dianus, the coachman that had the guiding and driving of the steeds as he turned the chariot on the right hand up to the cliff Velius, for to pass up to the hill of Esquilia, suddenly laid his head for fear, and reined in his horses, and shewed unto his Lady and Maitris Servius lying there murdered. And hereof followed (as the report goeth) a beastly part, and beyond all feme of humanity which the very place doth witness: till at this day, called therupon Sceleratus Victeus i.e. the wicked street: wherein the raging and frantic woman Tullia, hurried with the fugitives and haunted with the ghosts of her sister and husband, started (men say) her chariot to be driven over her fathers dead corps; and being herself beprinkeled and beraded with the bloody chariot, carrid home with her some part of it in token and witness that her hand was in this particular and murder of her own father: to the end, that she might provoke her own domestical gods and her husbands to wrath and displeasure: and to consequently, as they entered their reign with mightie and wickednes, they might soon after be turned out thereof with shame and infamy. Servius Tullius taigned four and forty years in such wife carrying himself, as it were hard, even for a good and said Prince that should succeed him, to follow his steps. This made moreover for his glory and fame, that together with him died all right and lawfull government of Roman Kings, and even that regimen of his, so mild, so gracious, and temperate as it was: yet because it reigned in the absolute power of one man, he was minded as some do write, to have forgone and O given over had not this wicked wintle practive from his own family come betwixt, to prevent and cut off his good designs and intent to let his country free.

After him began to reign Tarquinius, for his insolent actsformatted Superbus, i.e. the proud. For he would not suffer his wives father (unkind in law he) to be interred: saying oftentimes in jibbing manner, that Romanus also died and was never buried. Moreover, the principal heads of his Peers and Nobles, such (as he thought) had favoured Servius his proceedings, and took part A part with him, the whole made away and flew. Afterwards, fearing upon the guilt of his own conscience, that he had gotten an ill precedent for others, to take vengeance against himself, attaining to the Crown with little hazard, he retained therefore a guard of armed men about his body: and in very truth, setting only that aide, no other right had he to wear the diadem, as who signed neither by people's election nor by the Crown to elect that he might sit late in his seat by fetching fear and dread, who reproved not traitor, nor hope in the love of his subjects; therefore to strike the greater terror into them, and hold them in awe, be by himself alone without assistance of any counsel. Fears upon all matters of life and death: by means whereof he was able to kill, banish, and condemn in forfeiture of lands and goods, not those only whom he suspected and hated, but also them, from whom he could look for nothing else but spot. Thus when he had decayed the number of the nobles, especially he purposed to change new in their place, to make supposition to the end, that the fewer they were, the more contemptible the whole order might grow: and with less of the multitude, the indignity, that they were not employed in the State, nor ought done by their advice. For this King was the hit that abolished the outcome received, and continued by all others afore him, of consulting with the Senate in all matters, and managing nothing without them. He governed the Commonwealth by himself, and after his own wishes: with whom it pleased him he made war and peace, league and truce, even of his own head: and would break the state as himself thought good: thus he did, and did all at his pleasure, without regard of the peoples mind, or the Senate authority. Above all, he sought to win the hearts and good wills of the Latin nation, that by support of certain power also, he might be more secure and safe among his own people: neither entertained he with their Princes friendship and amity only but entered also into alliances and affinity with them. For unto other Men a Tuf man gave his daughter in marriage. This Mariam was of all Latines the principal and nobest person, lineally descended (if we may believe the common report and report from Wifers and Core, by this marriage he gained many kindreds and friends of his new line in law. So that now Turgultus was in great authority and reputation among the Lords and Barons of the Latines. Whereupon, he gave them knowledge, and proclaimed that upon a certain day they should assemble at the sacred grove of Feretia, to treat and consult together about matters concerning the common good of both States. Thereto receiv'd they in great number betimes in the morning. And Turgultus himself failed not for his part, to keep the very day appointed was it was fruitless well near before he came. There, in that assembly all day long, came much talk and reasoning, pro and con, touching him. Turgultus Herdounus of Astrid, had in light wrongfully against Turgultus in his absence (for his being away) saying, *It was not marvel indeed that he was at Rome, summanus Superbus (for even then commonly they termed him so, although he was in and in whispering wife). For could there be (as noth he) a prouder part than this to mock and abuse the whole state of Latins, that when their princes and nobles were there to appear far from the Cities and dwelling houses, he only should be able to fammoned the assembly? Which verily was but a device of his to try their patience, that if they once took the yoke he might keep them still under his vassals: for who feeth not what he reacheth at? even to command and Lord it over the Latines. And in case his own Citizens have done well, in trussing him in the rule over them (if a man may say they trusted him, and not rather that he came lonely and forbibly it even with shameful murder) the Latines also may put themselves into his hands with security. And yet thee not why they should do so, considering he is a man stranger and alien, but how and this own injictions repents, and are diocented with him being once another by him murdered, and deprived, and spoiled of their goods? What better dealings may the Latins hope and look for? Therefore if they should be ruled by him, they should depart home every man and not keep the day of the Dict no more than he doth that published and proclaimed it. What this seditionious and dangerous person, who by these and such like factions or causes was grown to be a great man and powerful in his country, stood reasoning thus, importing and following hard upon other people, tending to the fame end in cometh Turgultus. Whereupon he brake off his speech, and all was hush. Then turned every mans heart and the whole Turgultus: Who a silent silence made (being advised by some of his familiaris that were next unto him, to excise him self for coming at that time of the day) said that he had been taken to be an arbitrator or delietman between the father and the son: and because he was devious and careful to procure an acquaintance between them and to make them good friends: he made the longer stay and came the later. Whi occasion of businesse feeling, he had disappointed them of that day, therefore the more he after he would deliver that which he had in purpose and intended to move unto them, but Turgultus (as they say) could not hold, nor put up so much as this with silence; but brake out and laid again there was no specifiey deciding and taking up of any matter, than between the father and the son: a thing that might be dispelled in few words: for if he would nob obey and give place unto his father he should abide the smart of it with a miffiche: And that the Averon having girded as it were, and glanced at the Roman King, despised out of the Assembly. Whi thing Turgultus taking more deeply an and a good deal than he did: thereance of, forthwith devised and practised to bring Turgultus his death: that he might strike the same terror into the hearts of the Latines, whereby he had kept under his own subjects at home, and for that he had no absolute power to cause him openly to be slain, framed most falsely a criminal action against the guileless man: whereby wrongly to work his destruction. By means of certain Aричian of a contrary faction, he H wrongt a bondslav of Tumus with a sum of money, to hiber a number of swords privity to be conveyed into his Master's Inn or Lodging: which being done in that one night accordingly, Tarchinus somewhat before day, sent for the chief Lords of the Latines to come unto him; and pretending as though he were frightened by some strange accident, said, That his long tarrying the day before, (by God's special providence, as it were, to appointed,) was for the safety of them all. For he was informed that Tumus contrived to mischief both him and the heads of their nation, to the end that he alone might reign over the Latines: That he minded yesterday to have put this plot in execution, even in the very assembly; but the deed was deferred, for that himself (the principal author of that meeting) whose life he sought for above all other, was not in his place; and hereupon it was (even he) that he fared so as he did, and raigned against him fo biitterly the day before in his absence: for that he by his long tarrying had put him by his other. And the effect of his designs: and if all were true that was told him, he nothing doubted but early in the morning at break of the day, to soon as they were set in Councill together, he would come armed and well appointed with a crew of his adherents and sworn confederates: for reported it is, (quoth he,) that a number of swords & other weapons are brought into his lodging: which whether 'tis be or no might (soon be known. And therewith he desired them to take the pains to go with him thither, And verily considering the proud nature and haughty spirit of Tumus, together with his yesterdays Oration, and the long lay of Tarchinus before, for that the pretended massacre seemed thereby to have been put off and prolonged, the matter became very fupicious and k pregnant. Thus go they with minds very sometray enclined and disposed to believe all and yet so, as they would think all the rest but rages and lies, unless they found the swords aforesaid. Being come to the house, and Tumus awakened out of sleep, certain warders were set to keep him on every side: and when they had laid hold upon his servants, who for love of their Lord and Master began to make resistance, the swords were brought forth out of all the blind corners of the hotel very openly to be seen: then was it a clear case and past all peradventures: and Tumus was apprehended and ironed up upon him. And immediately in all haste the Latines assembled together to councilly in that great tumult and uproar: Where, upon holding forth the swords in fight before them, they were so incensed and deadly bent against him, that he was not suffered to answer and plead for himself, but was presently at the source of spring head of the Feroninie water plunged down, and a hurly done all upon him, and great stones heaped thereon, and after a new kind of death stifled and drowned. Tarchinus then, after he had called the Latines again to the place of council, and much commended them for duly executing Tumus, who practising thus to alter and trouble the state, was detected of a manifest intended murder, made this speech unto them: 'I might (quoth he,) if I would, by virtue of ancient rites allead and plead, that forasmuch as all the Latines are descended from Albu, they are comprised within that confederacy and league, whereby in the reign of Tullius the whole Commonweal and State of Albu together with their inhabitants became incorporate into the Empire of Rome. Howbeit, in regard rather of the commonmodity and weal-publike of all, I judge it requisite, that the league were renewed, and that the Latins might enjoy and be partakers of the prosperity and happy fortune of the people of Rome, rather than more to hazard and suffer the destruction and dissolution of their City, with the spoiling and waiting of their lands, which first in Anes days they tasted, and after in my father's times they had abideth & suffered, The Latines were heretofore perished. And although in that league the primogeniture and sovereignty reigned in the Romans, yet they saw well enough that both the Heads and Rulers of the Latine Nation flowed with the Roman King, and were wrought unto his hand, to side with him: and also Tumus unto them was a fresh precedent and example, to teach them what danger might betide every one that should make a part against him and crost his intention. So the alliance was renewed and proclamation made according as it was capitulated, that all the servile men of the Latines should at a day appointed repair in good number with their armes unto the grove of Feroninie. Who when they were there met together from all parts according to the Edict of the Roman King, to the end they should have no Captain of their own to lead them, no privy watchword or regiment by themselves to direct them, nor private enmies distinct from the rest to keep them together; he shuffled or mingled the bands and companies of Latines and Romans one with another, making one of twain, and two of one: and when he had thus doubled the bands, he set Centurions over them. And albeit he was in peace an unjust Prince, yet was he in war no bad Captain; nay, for martiall prowess he had been equal to the former Kings, had he not failed and degenerated in other things, and thereby stained and hurt his glory even in that behalf. He was the first that warred upon the Voliscians, which war after his time lasted more than 200 years: and wan from them by force Succession. Where having made portai of the pillage and raised as much gold and silver as amounted to 40 talents, he conceived in his mind to build so stately a Temple of Jupiter as might becometh the sovereign King of gods and men become the noble Empire of Rome, and answer the Majesty also of the very place where it was to stand. And for the rearing and finishing of this Temple, he laid that money apart, that came of the spoil aforesaid, but presently upon this was he surprized with a war that held longer than he hoped it would. For having made one assault in vain upon Gabii, a neighbour City to Rome, and delpairing also of any good success by beleaguering the town, A for that he was valiantly repulsed from the walls, at the last he devis'd and resolved to get it by wise and deceit: a course that Romans had not usuall practis'd. For making as though he had given over and abandoned this war, as being now entirely bent and busily occupied about laying the foundations of the Temple, and following other publick works in the City: Sextus his son, the youngest of three sld on purpose to Gabini, complaining of his fathers intollerable rigour and cru- dity against him: saying, That now he had turned his accustomed pride from strangers upon his own blood, and was grown to be weary of so many children: that as he had made good hand and clean riddance of his Nobles, and left the Senate defolate, so he might bring it to pass in his own house, to leave behind him no infall nor inheritor of the Kingdom. And for his own perfon

B verily, he was escaped from among the pikes and swords of his father, and was perfwaded fully, he might no where be in safety, but with the capital enemies of L. Tarquinius. For to put them out of doubt, and that they might be no longer abus'd, the war continued still against them, which seem'd in outward show given over and laid away: and his father would not fail, but whenever he could lipy his vantage and fit opportunity, come upon them at unawares. But in case there were no place of refuge and protection for poor humble suppliants amongst them, he would wander & travel all over Latium, and when he might not rest there, he would from thence go to the Volsci, Aeclanis, and Hicknicks, until he came to them that knew how to save the children from the cruelty and inhuman persecution of the fathers. Perhaps he might find means to flir coal and kindle war, yes, and perform himself good service against that most proud

C King, and that most hunt and impotent people. And seeming withall in great anger and discontentment (if they would not regard his complaints) ready to depart and go his ways, he was kindly entertained, and friendly entreated by the Gabins: who wished him to be of good chear and not to marvell at all, that L. Tarquin, became now as length to ill affected against his own children, like as he had tyranniz'd already upon his subje's and consedered, for he would not doubt in the end execute his fell homack even upon himself, for want of other subje's matter to work upon. And as to him right welcome he was to them, alluring themselves that within a while it would come to pass, that if he would come to his helping hand, they should remove the war from the gates of Gabini unto the very walls of Rome. After this he was admitted to sit with them in common counsel. In which he used at times to say, That in other matters he gave place, and receiv'd himself to be advis'd by the ancient Gabins, as men more practis'd and experienced than himself but for the war, which ever and anon he perfwaded them unto, himself took upon him a speciall insight and skill therein, as he knew the strength of both nations, and was fully perfwaded in his conscience, that the Kings pride must needs be odious to his subje's, which his very own children could not brook and endure. Thus whilsts by little and little he solicited the principal Citizens to rebel, and went himself daily in person with a crew of the most forward and able young men, forraeing spoiling, and making rodes into the Territory of the Romans, and that now through his words and deeds, which tended to fraud and deceit in the end, they began more and more to give credit unto him that one day would deceive them, he was at last chos'n General for the war, and having made certain small skirmishes between Rome and Gabes, in which for the most part the Gabins had the better (whilsts the simple people, God wot, saw not his drift and how he carried the matter:) then all the Gabins from the highest to the lowest thought verily and in good earnest, that Sextus Tarquinii was sent them by speciall grace even from God above, to be their Captain and Protector. But with the cowards, what with attempting small enterprizes and performing dangerous service, and what with dealing prizes liberally among them, it pass'd how he grew into credit and how dready he was beloved: inmoch as Tarquinus the Father was of no greater command at Rome, than Tarquinus the Son at Gabes. Thus when he saw he had gather'd strength sufficient. and was fully furnish'd against all affaires, he dispatch'd unto his father at Rome one of his trully servants with a credit to know his will and pleasure, seeing that the gods had done him this grace, that he at Gabes was able to do all in all. To this message made the King no anwer at all by word of mouth, taking the man belike, as I verily think'd for one hardly to be trusted, but as one using with himself and in a deep think what anwer to shape, he went into a garden on the back side of the house and his sons meffinger follow'd after. There walked he up and down, and said never a word: only with his rod or walking staff, as it is reported, he knapp'd off the uttermost heads and tops of the poppies. The messenger weery with calling an anwer and waiting such anwer was return'd to Gabes as wife as he came, and without effect of his errand. He report'd what he had said, and seen, namely, how the King, whether upon anger or hatred, or pride ingrained by nature utter'd no speecch at all, but Sextus knowing by these mysticall and fecret circumstances, his fathers will and direction made no more ado but blew the chief of the Citizens: some by accusations into the people, and others by reason of disgrace they were already in and thereby expos'd unto violence, were soon overthrow'n. Many of them were openly executed, and some, whom there was little apperance or colour of justice or none at all to accuse were secretely murdered. Divers of their own accord fled into voluntary exile, or else they were force'd into banishment: whole goods as well as theirs that were put to death, were divid'd among the people. By sweeter's of this largesses of spoil, by the profit and wealth that grew to private persons: the publick woe and calamity was nothing feel'd and seen: until such time as the Gabins whole estate was dispos'd of counsel, bereft of aid and succour yeelded without dint of sword unto the King of Rome.

Sextus Tarquinii to the Gabins.

The Gabins to Sextus Tarquinii.
Tarquinus having thus gained the town of Gales made peace with the nation of the Eequians, and renewed the league with the Tuscan, After this he converted his mind to the affairs of the City, among which this was the principal, to leave behind him the Temple of Jupiter, upon the mount Tarpeian, for a monument and memorial of his reign and name. That of two Tarquin, Kings both, it might be said another days, that the father vowed it, and the son fulfilled the same.

And to the end that the floor and plot of ground, freed and exempted from all other kind of religions might wholly be dedicated to Jupiter and his Temple, there to be built: he determined to excavate and to unhallow certain Churches and Chapels, which having been first vowed by King Tarquin in the very extremity of the battle against Romulus, were after him consecrated and hallowed. In the very beginning and founding of which work, it is said, that the divine power and Jove's pre-eminence moved the gods to declare the future mightiness of so great an Empire, For when as the birds by signs out of the Augeus learning, admitted and allowed the exaggeration and unhallowing of all other cells and chapels besides, only in that of Tarpeian, they gave no token to confirm the unhallowing thereof: which was taken for an ominous prefiguration, and thus interpreted, that seeing the seat and honie of Tarpeian was not stirred, and he the god alone that was not dislocated and called forth of the limits to him consecrated: it shewed that all should remain there firm and stable for ever. This divine-token of perpetuity being received for good and certain: there followed another strange and prodigious sign, opposing the greatness also of the Empire. For as they digged for the foundation of the Temple, there appeared, as they say, maps head, face and all whole and found: which sight imported no doubt, and plainly foretold that it should be the chief Capitol of the Empire and the Capitol place of the whole world. To this effect prophesied the wizards, as well they of the City, as the whom they sent out of Tuscany to know their opinion and judgment. Thus was the Kings mind all wholly set upon stupendous building and spared for no cost. So that the pilage taken at Perusis, which was laid by for the accomplishment of the whole work, would hard and wanton for the very foundation. And therefore would rather give credit unto Fabius Pitler (to say nothing that he is the more ancient author of the twain) that there were but 400 talents, and no more, than to Piso, who writeth, that there was 44000 pounds of silver set by for that use. Which sum of money or money could never be looked for to arise out of the fabric of one only City in those days: and mult needs exceed the charges of the foundation of any of the stately and magnificent buildings in this our age. The King being thus wholly minded and bent to the finishing of the Temple, and sending for Carpenters, Masons, and other workmen, out of all parts of Italy, employed not only the Cities money and flock thereabout, but also had the work and labour of the common people withall. Which was no small coll of theirs, considering the travel of warfare besides yet were they less agreed and discontented therewith, so long as they found and reared with their own hands the Temples of the immortal Gods. But afterwards were they employed and set to other works, which as they were laid in store, so they were more painful and of greater trouble, namely the making of folds of standing-places in the Circus of Theater, and to the conveyance of a mighty grand turbine or vault under the ground for to receive and carry away all the filth and corruption of the City. To which two pieces of work, especially is the magnificence of our new modern buildings, in any respect comparable. Having in this wise held his commons in continual labour, because he thought that a multitude of people would but overcharge and pester the City, when they were not employed some way or other, and also minded by erecting Colonies to enlarge the Confines of his Dominions, he hire under part of them to inhabit and people Signa and Circius, two strong forts and frontier towns for the defence of the City by sea and land.

Whilst he was busied in these affairs, there appeared unto him a strange and fearfull sight, namely, a serpent gliding down a pillar of wood, which having put the beholders in great fright, and cast them to fly into the Kings palace did not so much amaze the Kings heart with sudden and momentany fear for the present, as fill his head with perplexed cares what the thing might portend. Whereas therefore the manner was to use the Calanx and vixen men of Tuscan about Nu publike prodigious tokens only: he being much troubled in spirit, and terrified at this fearfull sight, being domesticall, and as it were touching and concerning his own person: purposed to send out as far as Dely to the most famous and renowned Oracle in the world. And for that he durst not put any other in trust with the answers that should be delivered by the fatallists, he addresed two of his sons to take a voyage through unknown lands in those days, and more unknown seas into Greece. This and Aruns were they that went this journey, having to bear them company all the way. L. Junius Brutus. This Brutus was the son of Tarquinia, the Kings sister, a young gentleman of a far other nature and disposition than he seemed in outward shew andsemblance. He having heard say, that certain principali Citizens, and his own brother among had been by his his uncle put to death: to the intent that himself might have nothing left, either in the parts of his mind for the King to fear or in his outward stature for him to covet and desire: resolved under the cloak of base contempt to save himself, since that in right or justice he might repose small or no safeguard at all. And therefore composing and framing himself of purpose to counterfeit a moddy and a very innocent, as suffering himself, and all that he had to fall into the Kings hands as an eichet: he refused not to be misnamed Brutus, a name appropriate to unreasonable creatures: that under the shadow & colour of that surname, the courage of his lying close atid, which A which should one day let free the City of Rome, might abide the full time and appear in due season. This Brute being by the Targus brought to Delphi, as their laughing flock to make them partake by the way, rather than a meet mate to accompany them, carried with him (as men fam) to offer and present unto Apollo a golden rod within a battlecornel wood made hollow for the purpose: the very type and resemblance by easier circumstances, of his natural disposition. Thither being arrived, the young men having done their fathers commission accordingly, were very dearest and earnest to inquire and learn of the Oracle, which of them should be King of Rome. And from the bottom of the deep Vale! this answer, as men say, was delivered in their hearing:

B The Targus then intending that Sextus their brother who was left behind at Rome, might neither know the answer, nor yet obtain the kingdom, wished the matter should by all possible means be carried to secret as might be, and concealed from him. They themselves agreed upon this together, to draw lots as to whether of them twain, when they were returned to Rome, should firstly kill his mother, But Brute supposing the speech of Apollo his Priest, tended to another sense, made as though he turned forward and took a fall, and so touched the ground with his mouth and killed the earth, thinking this with himself; that she was common mother of all mortal men. Then returned they to Rome, where they found great preparation for war against the Rutulians.

The Rutulians then were Lords of Ardea. A people in those times, very rich and wealthy and that was it that gave the very occasion and was the first motive of the war. The

C Roman King was dearest both to enrich himself, as having about the sumptuous building of public-like works emptied his coffers: and also by some spoil, to mollifie and win again the hearts of his natural subjects, being much discontented (besides his general dislike of his pride otherwise) at his manner of government: and disdaining greatly that they were by the King made labourers, to serve carpenters and masons, and held so long to serve toil and painful labour. The Romans affaid at the beginning to suprise and win Ardea by assault: but when that way was found ill, then began they to annoy and disturb the enemies by laying siege, by cutting trenches, raising forts, and fabricks about the town. During this siege, and the standing camp lying there, (as it falleth out commonly, when the war is rather long and late than hot and cruel) there were granted large licenses and palments to and fro between the Camp and Rome, with much liberty: and yet more to the Princes of the Army than to the common SOLDIERS. And the Kings sons had otherwhile good leisure to feast and banquet one with another. Upon a time it hapned whiles they were drinking and making merry with Sextus Targumus in his pavilion, where Callitius Targumus the son of Egerius sat at supper: there arose among other good table-talk, some arguing about their wives: whiles every man highly praised and wondrously commended his own. And growing to some hear and confection thereabout: There need not many words for this matter, Quoth Callitius: for in few hours it may be known how far my Lucretia surpasseth all the rest. And therefore if there be any just gift and courage of youth in us, why mount we not on horse-back, and in our own persons go and see the natures and dispositions of our wives? And as they shall be found and taken of a sudden, and not looking for their husbands coming, let every man judge of them, and let that down for the only trial of all this controversy. They had all taken their drink well, and were prettily with wine: Mary, content say they all, and to horse they go, and away they gallop on the spur to Rome. Thither were they come by the flitting in of the evening when it grew to be dark; and so forward without any stay to Callitius they ride. Where they find dame Lucretia, not as the Kings sons wives, whom they had inflipped and seen afore, palling away in leaping and rioting with their minions and companions: but sitting up far within the night in the midst of her house among her maidens, hard at work by candle-light. Whereupon in this debate about their wives, the entire prate and commoration rested in Lucaetia: Her Husband and the Targus had a loving and courteous welcome at her hands. And again for joy of the victory, invited the Kings sons kindly and made them friendly chere. Thereat that instant Sextus Targumus was bewitched and posseted with wicked wronson light, for to offer violence and villainy unto Lucaetia: her paling beauty and her approved chastity set him on fire and provoked him thereto. But for the present, when they had deftord themselves all night long like lusty and pleasant youths, they returned betimes in the morning to the Camp. A few daies after, Sextus Targumus, unwitting to Callitius attended with one only came to Collius, where he was again in good and friendly fort received by them in the house, that produceth nothing less than that whereas he was come. And being after supper brought up into the great chamber, when he thought all about him fire, and that every body was felt asleep all on fire and burning in love, he leapeth with naked sword in hand to Lucaetia, as the lay sleeping full fondly, and bearing down the womans breast with his left hand, Peace (quoth he) Lucretia: & not a word! I am Sextus Targumus! I have my drawn sword in hand, I thou once speak thou shalt surely die. The illy woman thus starting out of sleep, was sore affright, as seeing no remedy but in a manner present death, in cafe she had cried for help. Then uttered Targumus and disclosed his amorous passion, tell to entert and entertain again, and with his prayers intermedes threats, and went every way about her, not ceasing by all means to fit, to found and tempt the womans heart. But when she saw her obilinore and invincible, and (to die in it) not relenting one jot; then, besides the fear of death, he presented unto her dishonour and shame: pretending that after he had assaulted her, he would lay by her side in naked bed, her own man, servient with his thrust cut; that it might be voiced abroad, that she was taken and killed in filthy adultery. For fear of this reproach and infamy, see how finful lust gat the victory, and conquered constant chastity; and Tarranius in great pride and jollity, that he had by affault won the fort of a woman's honour, departed thence. But wofull Lucretia, all forrowing for so heavy a mischance, dispatched a messenger to her father at Rome, and so forward to her husband at Ardea, with this errand: That she should come unto her, each of them with one faithfull and truely friend, and hereof they must not fail, but make all the speed they could, for there was befallen a grievous chance and horride, So there repaired to her Sp. Lucretius her father, accompanied with P. Valerius the son of Volusius, and Collatia his wife, with L. Junius Brutus, Who both together by chance going back to Rome, encountered in the way his wives meleager, Lucretia they found sitting alone in her bed-chamber, all heavy and sad and she at the coming of these her dearest friends, shed tears and wept suprme. How now my deare (quoth her husband) is all well? No God wot sir, (quoth she again:) For how can ought be well with a woman that is dishonour to her honour and womanhood? The print, Collatia of another man is to be seen in thy own bed, Howbeit, my body only is disreign, and heart remaineth yet unprofaned, that my death shall make good and justifie, but give me first your right hands, and make faithfull promis, that the adulterer shall not escape unpunished. Sex. Tarranius is the man, he it is, who this night pale, entertained as a friend, but indeed a very foe in the highest degree, hath by force and violence taken him from hence with his pleasure, a deadly pleasure, I may lay to, and to himself also no lefs, if ye be men of courage. All of them one after another give them their attoured word, comforted the wofull hearted woman, excused her that was but forced, and laid all the blame upon him that committed the shameful act; laying it, is the mind that fenneth, and not the body and ware where there was no will and content, there could be no fault at all. Well, quoth she, what is his due to have, of thee to that; as for me, howsoever I quit and abjure my self of sin, yet I will not be freed from punishment. And never fail there by example of Lucretia, any unhappy woman or wench hark, a lot live a day: and thus having laid, with a knife which she had clothe hidden under her clothe, she flabbed her self to the heart, and sinking down forward, fell upon the floor ready to yield up the ghost. Out alas! cried her husband and father hereat: and whilest they two were in their plaints and moans, Brutus drew forth the knife out of the wound of Lucretia, & holding it out afore him, L all embraed and dropping with blood, & now I swear (quoth he) by this blood, by this most chaste and pure blood, before the villany wrought by the Kings (on, and here before the gods I protest, whom I call to witness, that I will by fire and sword, and with all my might and main perfeate and drive the country of L. Tarranius the proud, and his ungracious wife, and the whole brood of his children, and suffer neither him nor any else for his sake to reign as King at Rome. Then gave he the knife to Collatia, and so to Lucretius & Valerius, who greatly amazed at this so frightfull incend, and wondering how it came to pass, that Brutus should of a sudden be so changed, and become so front of stomack and courageous, took the same form of oath that he swore afore: and so leaving their wailing and lamentation, and wholly set upon anger and revenge, they followed Brutus as their Captain and Leader to put down and overthrow the government of Kings, and tenderly to root out their race. The dead corps of Lucretia, was had out of doors, brought into the marketplace and there shewed. And thither, what with wondering (as the manner is) at so frightfull a fight, and what with the indignation of so unworthy a fact, they raised much people together. Every man for his part was ready enough to complain of the wickednes and violence done by the Kings blood, The sorrow of Lucetius the father on the one side; the resolution of Brutus on the other side, who rebeded and blamed all vaine weeping and foolish moaning, moved and perfwaded all that were present, that like men of valour, like true hearted Romans, they would take arms against them that demeaned themselves no better, nor worse than ordinary enemies, And presently, the bravest and wildest young men shewed themselves forward, ready in armour, and voluntary. The rest of the youths followed straight after. And having left at Collatia the one half of their forces in N artice, toward the gates, and set certain watches, that no man brought tidings or news unto the King and his lons of this rising and commotion, all the other were appointed in warlike manner, followed their leader Brutus, from thence directly to Rome. At the sudden coming thither of this armed multitude: no marvell if all the way whereas they passed and marched, there aris a fear and trouble among the people. But when they perceived the most substantiell and principall Citizens in the forefront; they judged whatsoever the matter meant, it was not for naught. And very this hainous fact disquieted the minds of men no les at Rome than it had before at Collatia. Therefore from all parts of the City there was flocking and running into the marketplace. And being thither come, the Bedell or common Crier, summoned the people to appear before the Tribune of the Censors or Captain of the guard; which office hapy Brutus bare at that time. Where O he made an Oration not proceeding from that spirit, nor resembing that quality of nature which unto that day he had pretended and made flie of out the world, for he inveighed against the violence and filthy luft of Sex. Tarranius; the flamefull villany and not to be named, done upon the body of Lucretia: he disfounded of her lamentable end and pitious death, and the destrate case of Triespinus, bereft now of all his children; who accounted the occasion of his daughters death a greater indignity, and more pitiful, than her death. Moreover he laid:
The Second Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Second Book.

Brutus took an oath of the people, that they should not suffer any to reign King at Rome. He consulted his fellow Consul Tarquinius Collatinus, a virtuous man to take part with the Tarquins, by reason of the affinity he had with them, to give over the Consultus, and to depart the City. The gods of the King and his sons he commanded to be set on fire and burnt. A field of theirs he consecrated to Mars, which was named afterwards Campus Martius, Mars field. He beheld certain young Gentlemen of the Nobility together with his own and his brothers sons, for conspiring to receive the King and his Companions again into the City. Upon the bond slave Vindicius, that betrayed the conspirators, he gave him freedom, of whom Vindicius took the name. Having led an Army against the King, who had assembled a power of Veientians and Tarquinsians, and made war, he died in battle together with Brutus, the son of Superbus: and for his death the EMperor of Rome mourned one whole year. P. Valerius the Consul professed and made a Law concerning Appealing unto the people. The Capitol was dedicated, Porcia King of the Clans, warping in the quarrel of the Tarquins, and being come to the Janiculum, was by the violence of Coles Horatins, impeached that he passed on the Tyber: who alone, whiles others hanged down the Subliuncul bridge, with falsehood the Tarquins: and when it was broken down, leap armed as he was into the river, and swam over to his fellows. Another example of manhood is reported of Mutius, who being entered the Camp of the enemies with full intent to kill Portia, and having slain his principal Secretary, whom he took for the King, was apprehended: and thrusting his hand into the fire of the Altar, whereupon they had buried justices, suffered it there to fry until it was consumed: and said in Latin, that there were behind him three hundred more besides, that had sworn the death of the King himself: the wounding at their resolution, was driven to offer conditions of peace, and upon taking of hostages over war: amongst whom, one virgo Clelia, beguiled her keepers, made an escape, and swam over the Tyber to her friends: and being rendered again was by Portia sent honorably home, and had her ow will I describe from henceforth, the acts both in war and peace of the people of Rome, free late now from this time forward; their yearly Magnates and Governors, the authority and rule of Laws, more powerfull and mighty than that of men. Which freedom of theirs, the last Kings pride made more acceptable and welcome, As for the other Kings before him, they raged so, as that they might be counted all of them, and that worshipful builders of trusty parts, the City one after another, as they very one by himsell added till one new pillar, or another, for the multitude by them encreased to inhabit, Neither is it to be doubted, but that even the very same Brutus, who deferred to great honor and glory for expelling the proud King Tarquinius, should have done the fame to the exceeding danger of the weak publicke, if other desire of unripe and untimely freedom, he had wrested the royall dignity and government from any of the former Princes. For what would have come of it, if that community consisting of herdsmen and fugitives strangers, returning out of their own countries there to dwell, having under protection of a sanctuariy and privileged place gotten liberty, or at leastwise immiunity; being now freed and stable fear of a royall Majesty, had begun to be troubled and disquieted, with the ruffling storms and eddies tempests of the Tribuns, and in a new and strange City town debate, and entertained variance with the Nobility, before that the most part of women and children, the desert affection of the very place and soil, which requireth long time of liking and loving, had united and knit their hearts together? Certainly, the fate not yet come to full growth and maturity, had by discord faded and come to nought, which a peaceable and gracious government cherished and fostered, and by cherishing and nourishing brought to such a state, that now being come to ripeness and perfection of strength, it might be able to bring forth and bear the good and wholesome fruits of liberty.

The beginning of this freedom you must account in regard herof. That the Consular regiment was annual and from year to year rather than that the royall power and jurisdiction that the Kings had, was any whit abated or diminished. For the first Consuls had the fame absolute authority, held all the former royalties and retained till the regale signs and ornaments of supreme dignity. This only provided that they should not both have the rods born before them, for avoiding a twofold fear and dread of their Majesties. Brutus with the good liking and content of his companion in office, had the preheminence and prerogative of that honour to be done unto him alone; who had not been aforesaid a greater instrument, and more forward to procure and recover the liberty than he was afterward a sure maintainer and protector of the fame. And first above all other things, whilst the people were yet greedy of this new freedom, for fear lest they might any time after be wrought by entreaty or moved by gifts on the Kings part, he caused them to swear that they would never suffer any to be King at Rome. After this, because the Senate might be of more power and greater reputation by the frequent company of that degree and order; he increased their number (which had been impaited much by misfortunes, committed by the said King) to the full complement of three hundred: by chusing the chief and principal of the degree of Knights Knights or Horsemen. And hereof came, as they say, this outcome, to admit into the Senate both them that were before time of the ancient Nobility, and also those that were newly chosen for the supply; naming those that were last enrolled, the new Senate. And a wonder it was to see, how much good this did to the concord of the City, and to the knitting of the hearts of Nobles and Commons together.

This done, they were in hand with Religion and Church matters: and for that there were certain publick sacrifices that had been usually executed by the Kings themselves in their own persons: lest therefore they should not find the mis of Kings in any respect, nor long after them again they create of purpose a King-Priest or Priest: which facer to all dignity they ordained to be under the Arch-Priest, lest that this new addition and title of honour, might prejudice their freedom any jot, whereunto they had then a special regard above all other things. And I wrought well, but I think verily they went beyond all measure, and were over-predic in the maintenance and strengthening thereof every way, even in the smallest trifles, and toises of no moment. For when as nothing else was offensive unto them, the name forsooth of one of their Comitis became displeased and odious unto the City, without any other Randall whatsoever. And thus they muttered and said; That the Targum had raised over-long, and too much already that Princes first began, and when after him succeeded King Servius Tullius, Superbus Targumus, not having in that time and space between, forgot the Kingdom, as seeing another invested therein; by wicked practice and violence claimed and recovered the same again, as the inheritance properly to his house belonging. And now that Superbus is driven out and gone, the rule and government is delivered into the hands of Colatinus, and there resteth. Their Targumus belike (lien they) cannot skill how to live as private men: giving out among, that the very name was dangerous to a free State, and in one word, they could not endure it. These and such like speeches at first were whispered abroad throughout all the City, by them that under-handounded by little and little the hearts and dispositions of men: and when these murmurs & suspicions were once buzzed into the Commons heads, and they thereby disquieted, Brutus called them to a general assembly. Where first and foremost he recited the oath or the people, that they should suffer none to be a King not oughted in Rome, from whence might arise any danger to their liberty. This oath is the thing (quoth he) that "with all diligence, & by all means possible is to be maintained, & nothing thereto appertaining is to be despised and lightly regarded. As for me, I am unwilling to speak, in respect of the person, neither would I speak at all, but that the love and affection to the Commonwealth be observed. The people of Rome is not thoroughly persuaded that they have recovered their entire and perfect liberty. For as yet the Kings bloud-yea, and the Kings name not only remaineth still, but also beareth sovereignty in the City: This is it that hurteth, this is it (say) that hindered their true freedom. Now (quoth he) Lucius Tullius willingly of your own accord rid them of their fear. We remember well, we confesse and acknowledge, you it was that expelled the Kings, Brutus therefore and perfect this great benefit of yours: take away from hence the Kings name alio. As for your goods and substance, your Citizens and Countrymen, if they will be adhered by me, shall not only yeeld unto you again but if ought be short and wanting, shall by my consent supply the same to the full right liberally. Depart I say and friendly take your leave: deliver the City and disburden them of this their fear, that peradventure is but vain and needless: Howbeit, this their minds give them that together with the Rock and home of the Targumus the Kings rule and government will likewise void and depart for ever. The Comital this to strange and hidden a motion first wondered much, and was not able to open his mouth. But afterwards as he addressed himself and began to make a speech, the heads of the City came about him, and with many prayers befought the same at his hands. As for all the rest they prevailed all together with him. But alter that Sp. Lucretius more grave and elderly man than himself, of greater worth a foretime, and his father in Law besides took him in hand and dealt with him kindly wight, one while by way of interdict, otherwise by persuasions and reasons, that he would condescend unto that which the City in one general consent required: then the Comital fearing left hereafter being once out of his place and a private man again he should chance to be forced thitherunto, with the full of his goods and soe disgrace perhaps besides: resigned up the office of the Comitalship, and removing all that he had away to Larsum quit the City and departed. Then Brutus by an act and decrete of the Senate, proposed unto the people, That all the race and lineage of the Targumus should be exiled. And in a general session of the Centuries, he created to be his Colleague in government, P. Paternus, by whose assistance he had driven out the Kings.

No man doubted now that the Targumus were about to take arms: yet that war hapned not to soon as men looked for: but see (a thing that no man feared) they had like by fraud and treasion to have at home to left and foregone their freedom again. There was of the flower of Rome, certain youths & those of no low degree nor base parentage descended, who in the Kings times had lived like young Prin:es more loollie and at pleasure, as companions and philis: with the young Targumus, the Kings sons: who seeking to enjoy the same licentious life fell, in this equality of estate wherein others then lived, made man and complained one to another. That the liberty of others turned to their servitude, (The King say they is a man, at whose hands one might obtain somewhat, as need required were the cause right or were it wrong; where a man might find favour and friendship, as who could both be displeased and angry, and also forgive and remit a "fault, and knew well how to make difference between a friend and a foe. As for laws, they are things deat and inexorable: more wholesome and commodious to the poor than to the rich and mighty affording no releas nor pardon, if one chance to trespad and transgress: And a ticklish point it is and perilous for a man among so many errors where our frailty is subject, to bear himself only upon his innocent lite. Being thus of their own accord already discontent, suddenly unlooked for, there came Embassadors from the Kings, who without any mention at all of return, demanded only their goods again. Upon their meslage being delivered and heard in the Senate-house, this debate and question held them for certain daies in councill, fearing lest that the goods not restored might minuter occasion of quarrel, and being rendred, yield maintenance and nourishment of war. In the mean time the Embassadors dealt and treated with divers perrons diversly: in open sight claiming only their goods, but secretly and under-hand, contriving how to compass the Kingdom for their Masters. And under colour of procuring friends for the accomplishmef of that which they pretended, and was in question, they founden oftentimes the minds of certain noble young Gentlemen, how they froll affected to their defignments. Whole words and reasons were of them gently entertained: and thereupon they delivered unto them letters from the Tar-quinia, and withall conferred together, and practised the receiving of the Kings privy by night into the City. The execution of this plot was principally committed to certain of the Viciellis: and whereunto the were brethren. A sister of the Vicielli was married unto the Consul Benu- tus, by whom he had two sons that were youngmen, Titus and Tiberius, whom his uncles by the mothers side made partners with them likewise of their counsell. Besides, there were divers young Gentlemen (who fame long time hath worn out quite) made acquainted therewith. In this mean feason, their opinion in the Senate-house prevailed, who thought it that the goods should be restored: and the Embassadors upon that occasion made stay in the City, for that they had gone time of the Consul to provide carrage for to have away the Kings stuff, and other movable goods. All that time spent they in consulting with the Conspirators, and to importunately laboured them, until they had procured their letters afore unto the Tar-quinis; for otherwise (say they) how will they believe but that their Embassadors make wrong report of matters so important. The giving of those letters in pledge of their truth and plain meaning, proved to be wray and reveal their purposed enterprise. For the day before the Embassadors were to take their leave, and return to the Tar-quinia, they forgerod to flip with the Vicielli: and whilst the conspirators there, were in sad and close talk together, conferred at large about this new devised practice, and no man by but only themselves (as the manner is:) a certain bondslave chanced to overhear them, one that before had an inclining whereabout they went, but waited the opportunity when the letters should be given unto the Embassadors, which being found upon them, might diretly prove the treason. This slave after he understood the letters were delivered, gave intelligence of all unto the Consuls: who immediately departed from their houses, to take the Embassadors, and the Conspirators in the manner, and without any stir or tumult light upon them unwares, and disaffled all. But of the letters they had a speciall care, that they should be forth-comeing and not mistarry. And committing the traitors forthwith to prison, they made some pate and doubt about the Embassadors, what to do with them. For albeit they seemed to have delivered no lefe M but to be used as enemies and to have no favour at all, yet had they regard to thelaw of Nations. Now concerning the Kings goods, which they thought meet before to be restored, the matter came about who by in question again before the Senators: who being overcome with ire and indignation, denied fully the rendering of them, yea, and forbad they should be confiscate and converted to the common treasy: but they were given away among the Commons to make spoile and havock thereof: to the end, that they having one touched or failed on the Kings goods as a boothy might for ever after be part all hope of any peace or favour with them. The field of the Tar-quinis lying between the City and Tyber, was consecrated unto Mars, and after called Camps Mars-iti, Mars field. It hapned (as men say) that there was at that time standing corn there, now ripe and ready for the harvest: which crop of ground, because they made some scruple of confi- nence otherwise to consume, therefore it was cut down, corn, straw, flubelle and all, and a great number of people fent thither at once to carry it away in baskets and sheps, and pour it down the Tyber, running then but fullflow, as it used to do in the midlat and heat of Summer, and so the heads of corn together with the mud fluck still and refted in the ebb places and floods of the river: and by little and little increasf with one thing or other that came down the stream, till it became an island. Afterwards, I suppose, there were dams and piles made thereunto, and by mans hard it grew so high, and so firm a piece of ground, that it was able to bear even Temples and flately Galleries that stood thereupon.

When the Kings goods were thus spoiled, rifled, and made away, the traitors were condemned and put to death. Which suffering of theirs was the more notable, for that the father bi his place & vertue of his office was bound and charged to see execution done upon his own own children: and he who otherwise ought nor to have been a spectator and looker on, even he if was his fortune) was forced of necessity to be the principal actor in this tragical execution. Then flood those most noble youths bound faft to a stake. But among all, the Consul his children turned up on them the eyes of every man, from all the rest, as unknown perrons and of no reputation; all men pitied them, not so much for being punished, as for deserving by their fact to be punished;
A punished: That they could find in their hearts and once let enter into their thoughts, to betray into the hands of Tarquinus, sometimes a proud Prince, and then a cruel enemy, and banished his native country, late and in that very year lest free from captivity: their natural father who let it free: the Consulship sprung first of the family of the Junius: the Nobles, the Commons, and in one word, all things whatsoever in Rome belonging either to God or man. Then came the Consuls forth took their places and let them down on the tribunal seat. The Li- tors were sent to do their office, who, first stripped them naked and boused them with rods, and then with an axe chop off their heads. All which time, the father himself, his counsele and village was a wonder all spectacle to behold, considering how a father's affection could hold born and abide the performance of this publick and exemplary punishment. When the offenders had once suffered, to the end there might be shewed noble examples on both sides, for to debate wickedness, and stop the course of: the informer and revealer of treason, had for his reward a piece of money out of the common treasury obtained his freedom, and was enfranchised a Citizen of Rome. This was the first man, as they said, that was made free by the rod Prodebas for that the party his name was Vindex, from whence, as some think, the word Vindicate was derived: after whom, this was observed, That whoever in that fort got their freedom, were supposed withall endenized.

stance, he not only grieved that so great hope of his was frustrated and come to nothing, but Callo was set on fire with hatred and indignation: and seeing the way shut up and stopped against all de-ceilful coures, he thought there was no dealing now but by measure force and open war. Whereupon he went up and down, solicited and made humble suit into the Cities of Etruria and befough the Venetians especially, and the Tarquinies: that they would not suffer him, being some of their own blood, a banished man, forlorn, poor, and needy, dispossessed lately of so goodly a Realm and Kingdom, together with his children (forward young men) to perish even before their eyes. Alluding that others had been sent for and sent out of certain parts unto Rome to be Kings and such an one as advanced him the Roman Em-pire by martial prowess, was by the wicked conspiracy of his nearest kinsfolk and friends de- poled from his imperial dignity and expelled: and they now, because there was no one man D thought sufficient and worthy to reign, had parted between them the Kingdom, and given among the people his goods as a spoil: that there might not be any one who had not his finger, and whole hand in his own fact. Saying moreover, that his mind and intention was to seek means to return into his own country, to recover his Crown, yea, and to pericide, and to be revered of those unthankfull subjects: and therefore prayed them, to set to their helping hand, and yield him assistance: and not to set down with so many old wrongs of their own part received, namely, their legions so often heven in pieces, their lands and livings taken from them, but to go with him for revenge. These suggestions moved the Venetians, and every man for himself muttered and gave one in threatening voice, that now at length, having a Roman Captan especially to be their Leader, they were to do away the foul divisions intimated, and win E again what by former war they had lost. As for the Tarquinus, they were soon invited in regard of name and contanguity, and thought it was a godly matter and an honour unto them, to have of their own name and native to be Kings of Rome. Thus two armies of two Cities banded with Tarquinus, for to restore him to his Kingdom again, and to make sharp war upon the Romans: who being entered the Territory of Rome, were met with by the Roman Comills. The footmen marched under the conduct of Valerius, marshall'd in a battailion four square, Brunus with the horse went before to espy and discover the coast: In like fort the men of arms of the enemies rode forth under the leading of Arvus Tarquinus the Kings son, and the King himself in person followed with the Legions, Arvus crying by the Liators, to the Comills as far off, and as he approached nearer, knowing Brunus more certainly by his face, all inflamed with ire:

F This is the Gallant (quoth he) this is he, that hath driven and banished us out of our native Country. Lo, how bravely he seteth forward, all gorgeously to be seen and dight in our round all enligishes and ornaments. Now help ye gods that are revengers of wrongs done to Kings: and therewithall let priests to his horse, and ran amain with full career upon the Comills his own person intending certainly to speed him. Brunus perceived likewise that he made directly toward him.: (Now was it a noble and worthy fight for the Captains themselves to begin the battell.) Whereupon with resolute courage he encountereth him. And so fiercely they charged one another, and so deadly were they bent, that neither of them had regard to save himself: so might wound and mouch his enemy, but were both with a counterpath that quite pierced their targets running to the sides, and thrust through, and so having one another lancelicking in their bodies, G fell from their horses ready to dye. Herewith begin men on both sides the other horsemen to fight, and within a while the footmen also seconded them. And so equally were they matched and the battell so indifferently fought, that it was very doubtful whether side had the better. For on both parts the right wings got the upper hand, and down went the left. The Venetians into whom it was nowes to be overcome of Romans, were discomfited and put to flight. But their new enemies the Tarquinianis, not only held their own and stood to it, but also from their battell put back and forced the Romans to give ground, and gave them the repulse. After this conflict there fell such a fear and terror upon Tarchamus, and the Tufcans, that both Armies as well of the Veii. Heleniani as the Tarchamians, gave over their enterprise with doing just nothing, and by night disdained and departed every man to his own home. This battle was more notable by reason of certain miracles that men report: namely, that in the dead time of the night next following, when all were at rest, there was heard a mighty voice of Syracus (as men thought) out of the wood Ar- sinoe, to utter these words. [That there was flame on the Tuscan part more by one, and that the Romans won the field.] Thus: errily and no otherwise departed they alonder: the Romans as winners, and the Tufcans as having the worde. For the next morrow, so soon as it was day, and that none of the enemies appeared in sight, P. Valerius the Consul gathered up the spoil together, and returned from thence with triumph to Rome, and performed the funeral of his brother Consul, in all triumphious manner and solemn pomp, as possibly at that time he could devise. But, which did him the greatest honour after his death, was the publike sorrow and heavines of the City, in this respect above all singular and memorable, for that the dames and Matrons of Rome mourned a whole year for him, as for their own father, in that he had been so sharp a revenger of violence done to the chality of women.

After this, the Consul that survived, presently upon the great liking and favour that he was in (see how wavering and unconstant the minds are of the common people,) was not only envied, but also suspected, yea, and charged with an odious and horrible crime. The voice went and bruised it was abroad that he aspired to the Crown. And why? because, forsooth, he had not chosen unto him a new fellow Consul in the room of Brutus: and begun to rebuild aloft on the top of Vila, K where (say they) in a high place and strongly situated he might make a Pillar impregnable. These things commonly spoken and credited too; vexed much, and mightily grieved the Consul in his very soul, as a great indignity offered unto him. Whereupon he assembled the people together, and casting the rods to be held downwards to the ground, went up into the pulpit to make an Oration unto them. That light pleased the people passing well, taking it for a plain demonstration, that the marks and eminences of rule and government submitted unto them, was thereby acknowledgment and confection that the people was of greater majesty and power then the Consul. Where after silence made, and commandement to hearken and give ear, the Consul began highly to exalt toll the fortune and good hap of his Colleague deceased, who having with great honour left his Country free, ended his dais, fighting manfully in defence of the Weal publicke, even in the prime, height, and bell time of his glory, ere that he became subject unto envy: but he himself outliving it, remained alive, espoused unto criminal hazards and spightful malice of men, and of a deliverer and redeemer of his Country was now reputed no better than the Aquilus and Vettius. And will you never indeed (quoth he) approve the virtuous and honest conversation of a man so well, but it shall be tainted with unjust suspicion? What? would any man think, that I being so fierce and fell an enemy of the Kings, should ever learnt to incur the jealousy of men, or seeking to be King? What if I dwelt on the top of Tarpeje cliff, even in the very Capitol, thou’d I believe and think it possible, that my countrymen, neighbours, and Citizens, would stand in fear of me? and will so small a matter as this turn the balance of your opinion and conceit of me? Is your affiance and confidence in me grounded to lightly, andIctheth upon so nice terms and ticklish points, that you force more and more greater reckoning of my dwelling place than of the quality of my person. Well, P. Valerius his house hall be no hindrance or impeachment unto your liberty, O Quirites, ye shall not need to fear any harm from Vela for me, I will remove my house not only down into the plain, but even to the valley under the hilltop, that you may dwell above me, and overlook me (as suspected Citizen.) Let them a gods name build in Velia, who may be better truited with the Cities freedom than P. Valerius. Then was immediately the timber and all carried down beneath Velia, and where as now Vicus Publicus is, in the very bottom of the hill, was his house reedificed.

After this were laws enacted, which not only acquit the Consul and cleared him of all suspicion of affecting to the Kingdom, but also contrariwise wrought in effect, that he became exceeding popular again, whereupon, he was surnamed Publicola or Popicola. And first and foremost the Statute passed as touching the appeal unto the people, against the Rulers and Magistrates. Item, concerning the curfing and condemning of him both body and goods, that should intend or plot to usurp Principly dominion over them. These acts the Commons liked well of. Which when he had alone ordained, that all the thanks and praise might be his therefore, then assembled he a general Seccion for the substituting of another Consul unto him, in the room of his Colleague departed. So, Sp. Luceritus was created Consul: who being an aged man and of great years tebe withall, and not able to execute the office and function of a Consul, within few days paid nature her debt and died. And in place of Luceritus was M. Horatius Pulvulus chosen. In some ancient writers I do not find that Luceritus was Consul. For immediately after Brutus they make of mention of Horatius. But I think verily because no act of his made his Consulship memorable, thereupon he was forgotten and left out. Now as yet was not the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitol dedicated. And when Valerius and Horatius the Consuls called lots whether of them twain should perform that duty, the charge fell unto Horatius, and Publicola went forth to the Veientian war. But the kinsfolks and friends of Valerius took it more grievously and impatiently than reason was, that the honor of the dedication of so famous a temple, was given unto Horatius, A Deviating therefore by all means possible they could, to impeach it and killing they had extorted all in vain and nothing took effect: even at the very instant, while the Curiae was holding a poll of the Temple, and in his solemn prayers to the gods, behold they brought upon him heavy and wonderful new, that his son was dead, and that he might not unlawfully, whiles his household mourned and was polluted with a dead corps, consecrate the Temple. Whether it were that he gave no credit to the messengers, or rather was of heart to bear, neither is it for certain reported, nor could it be a man to divine. But for all their tides, neither a jot was he turned from his purpose, nor laid aside the efficacy of the messengers, but willed that he should bid the corps to be had forth to burial, and to hold the pillar or post still laid out his prayer, and dedicated the Temple. These were the acts B done both at home and abroad in the last year after the expulsion of the Kings.

Then were P.P. Valerius the second time, and T. Lauretius created Consuls. By this time were the Tarquines fled for fure to L. Porcius King of Clusium: " where, by many reasons and remonstrances, intermixed with prayer, one while they besought him not to offer them deliverance, which was accepted from the Tarquines, for the name and name, to live needy and in perpetual exile; for evermore they advised and warned him not to put up without revenge this new fashion of expelling Kings; now coming up, saying, that liberty in it fel had sweetness enough: and unsheathed Kings would defend and maintain their Crowns with as great might and main, as Cities, and to enjoy freedom there would be a general concision and all things turned upside down; neither would there be in States and Common-wealths any thing aloft and eminent above o-

C then endured: whereupon to fine a small End of Kingly regiment, a thing with God and man of all other most excellent and beautiful, Porcius supposing it would be an honourable matter unto the Tarquines, both to have a King at Rome, and a king too of the Tarquines line, came with a small army against Rome. Never was the Senate at any time placated in such fear: to mighty in those days was the influence of Clusium, and the name of Porcius so renowned. Moreover, they feared not their enemies only, but also their own subjects, home, lest peradventure the Community of Rome for fear of war should receive the King into the City, and accept of peace though it cost them their liberty. During which time the Commons were entertained of the Nobles with all kindness, and many favours and courtly speeches they had at their hands. And above all things order was taken for provision of grain and victuals. And in to purvey store of corn, some were sent to the Volsci, others to Camæ. Over and besides the licence of selling, because it was sold at an exceeding high price, was taken from private callers, and was undertaken by the City, with all the care and charges thereto belonging by them defrauded, and last delivered out to the people at an easy reckoning. The Commons were also freed of portage, tolls, and tribute: and rich men that were able to bear the burden, were afflicted at all payments and contributions: the poor were thought to be charged enough with the bringing up of their children. This kind dealing and indulgence of the Nobles kept the City afterwards (notwithstanding their hard frights of siege and famine) in such concord and unity, that the meanest as well as the highest abhorred and detested the name of KK. And never after was there any one person, so popular, so devoted to the people by crafty means and indirect counsels tending to their particular designs, as the whole Senate was at that time, by their good government of the Common-wealth. Now when the enemies approached near at hand, every man made shift for himself, forsaking the Country and came into the City, which they fortified with strong guards round about: so that what with wals and bulwarks on the one side, and what with the Tyber on the other side, it seemed so safe, and sufficiently defended. The wooden bridge had like to have given the enemy entrance, had not the valour of one man been, even Hortensius Coelus ('who that day by the good fortune of the Romans was a fortress into the City of Rome.') He as good an hap was, appointed to ward and keep the bridge, seeing the Janicule by a sudden assault won, and that the enemies ran down to furiously from thence upon him, & contrariwise the multitude of his own companies for fear, for to go their weapons, break their arrises, and to be taken in hold of every man, opposed himself against them afront: and calling God and man to witness, protostole, flied and declared unto them, that forsaking and abandoning thus their quarters, all their flying was but in vain: for if they let the bridge upon their backs, to yield passage to the enemies, there would amount more of them in P. Julium and the Capitol than in the Janicule: and therefore he willed and commanded them, yea, and gave them direction to break down the bridge by hewing, by fire, or by what means they could possibly; assuring them for his own part, so much as the body of one only man was able to do, he would receive, and withstand the violence of the enemies. Then advance he himself unto the first entry or foot of the bridge, and all goodly to be seen, amongst those that would in no point fight, but threw their backs, he so bent his sword and target in their very faces, resolute to encounter with them hand to hand, that even with his wonderful hardiness and incredible courage, he astonished and amazed his enemies. Howbeit, two there were that for very shame carried still and stood to him, namely, Sp. Servius and Tit. Hernius, brave men both, as well for noble birth as worthy deeds. Afflicted for a while with these gallants, sustained he the first form of danger and most cumbrous path of the skirmish. But as they were hewing down the bridge called upon them to come back, he constrained those two also to retire and save themselves, whiles some little part of the bridge was left behind free and uncut. Then casting all about him men his fiery and terrible eyes towards the Captains: and and principals of the Tuscans, one while he challenged them one by one to single fight: otherwise he rated them all in general calling them the hirelings and slaves of proud Kings and tyrants; who forgetting and making no reckoning of their own freedom, were come to oppose and impeach the liberty of others. The enemies stood at a bay and in suspense a while, looking about them one upon another who should first begin to fight. At last, vext and made the whole troop to stir and come forward and to letting up a loud cry, from all sides they let fly their javelins at him one man alone and their only enemy. All this while bare he off their shot which light upon his target; and there stuck, and nevertheless with full resolution kept the bridge still, walking his stations and talking like a giant. Then affaid they with all their force to bear the man down and to turn him over into the water: but by this time the crack of the bridge broke I under him, and the shout withall of the Romans, for joy that they had finish'd their work, fild with sudden fear their violent affaut. Then praified Coeetes in this wise: "O father Tiburium, (quoth he) O sacred river, with devout heart I thee beseech, receive with thy gracious and merciful stream this harmless, these weapons, and this thy fooldier. And to all armed as he was he leap'd into the Tyber: and albeit many a dart was flung from aloft and light upon him, yet he swam over and escaped safe to his fellows. A brave adventure for all povertie another day to talk of, rather than to believe. For this so great torridity and resolution of his, the City was thankfull, and in token thereof his Image or Statue was set up in their common Hall, named Comitium, and as much ground given him in compass, as he was able with a plough to break up in one day. Amongst these publique favours and honours done unto him, the kind affections and good wills of private persons also well appeared: for in that extremest want and scarcity that there was, every man out of his house store and provision spared from himself, and for to give him one thing or another, devoured his own belly. Thus Porfena with the repulse of this his first enterprize, changed his mind from assailing to besieging of the City: and after he had placed a garrision in the Textualum, he planted himself and encamp'd on the plain, even upon the banks of the Tyber, And fending for boats and carriages from all parts, both to stop the mouth and passage of the Tyber, that no corn should come in and be conveyed to Rome: and also that the fooldiers, as they saw occasion, might cross the river, and fetch booties in divers and fendry places at their pleasure in short space he brought the whole country about Rome to such frights: that not only other things were brought in, but all their cattle also was fain to be driven out of the fields into the City, and no man durst put any creature forth out of the gates. The Tuscans were permitted to be thus bold, not so much for fear as for a policy: for Valerians the Consul, waiting for some vantage and opportunity, sudden to set upon many of them at once and at unawares, as they itched abroad disorderly, making little regard to revenge small matters kept himself to be revenged of them throughly, and to pay them home one time or other. To the end therefore he might draw forth these forrazers, and toll them abroad, he gave his men in charge, and proclaimed, That the next day in great companies they should put their cattel forth at the gate Esquilino, which was firsthelt from the enemies: supposing that they would have intelligence thereof, by reason that in this extremity of long siege and pinching hunger, some false knives and disloyal rogues would flie unto them, and so fell it out indeed: For they had knowledge thereof by a fugitive slave. Whereupon they in far greater multitudes pass'd M over the river, in hope to make a general spoil and havock once for all. Then Valerians commanded T. Herminius with sufficient company to lie close in ambush at two miles end, in the Sabine high way, and Sp. Longius with a power of lusty tall fellows lightly armed, to keep the gate Collina, until the enemy were gone by and past: with direction, then to put himfelf between the river and them, and so to intercept them in their return. The other Consul T. Lucrècius issued forth with certain kinds of footmen at the gate Naevia: and Valerinius himself in proper person set forth from mount Capito certain ensigns of his belt and choice fooldiers. Thelie first were deftrain'd and discovered by the enemy, Herminius in soon as he heard some noise and fit, arose and ran at once out of the ambush, and whilst the Tuscans turned to set upon Lucrècius, he charged them lustily at their backs: so that on every hand from the gate Collina on the one side, N and from the gate Naevia on the other, the alarm was given. Thus the robbers were slain and cut in pieces in the midst of them: both for that they were overmatch'd in fight and also because all the waies were stopp'd up, that they could not escape by way of flight. And never after duft the Tuscan range about the country and accordingly, Howbeit, the siege continued nevertheless, with great scarcity of corn, and exceeding dearth within the City. And Porfena had good hope by sitting still, to force it in the end, and be master thereof. At what time one C. Mutinius a noble young gentleman, who thought it a dishonour and foul shame, that the people of Rome, who all the while they were in bondage under Kings, were in no war nor by any enemies beleaguer'd, shoud now, being the same still in time of their freedom be of these Tuscan besieged, whole armies they often had defate: and supposing that by some hardy and adventurous piece of service O this reproachful indignity was to be revenged, devin'd at first on his own head to enter into the enemies Camp: but fearing afterwards to go without commission from the Consul and the knowledge of any other person, left that adventure he might be taken by the watch of the Romans, and brought back for a traiterous runnagare, at such a time especially, when the hard estate of the City was enough to bring him into a deep suspicion, and to be reputed for no better: preferred himself before the Counsell into the Senate house: "I am right willing, and I have a purpose A "My LL. (quoth he) to pass over the Tyber, yea, and if I can, to enter the Camp of the enemies, not in quality of a robber, not to be revenged for booties from us taken, with doing the female blamable. A greater exploit with the favour of the gods, I intend to perform. The Senators gave their consent, and approved his designment. Then with a skin, hidden under his garment, he faced forward. Being thither come into the Camp, he prefigured in the thickest throng to stand near the Kings Tribunal. It was fortunate that then and there the soldiers were receiving their pay. And the Chancellor, or Kings principal Secretary, met together with the King in like array, much employed and burdened in many matters; and the soldiers commonly had recourse unto him. Mutius fearing to inquire whether of them two were Porfena but not knowing the King he should be in what way himself who he was happened (see how fortune in her salliness directed his hand) to kill the Secretary instead of the King: then as he passed through the fearful multitude, making himself with his bloody blade there was a present outcry, and thereat the Kings guard came running in, laid hold of him, and brought him back before the King his royal Throne: and albeit he was now tower and without all the command the threats of troubling fortune, yet as a man much feared still held fearing: "I am (quoth he) a Citizen of Rome, and Caes. Mutius is my name, a servant of the Allies, an enemy among them; and an enemy would I have lain: as ready and willing am I to dye my own, as I was to kill another. For, both to do, and to suffer valiantly is the part of a noble Roman. And it is not I alone that carry this mind and resolution against thee, O King there is a long train and true behind of them that seek to win the fame praise and honour: make thee ready therefore, and arm thy self, if thou think good, against this danger, and resolve every hour to be in hazard of thy life; and to have always at the very Court gates thy enemies word. This kind of war do we youths of Rome! Denounce openly unto thee: no bated, no right cleft shall thou need to fear. With thee alone will we all. one by one have to do, and with none other. Hereat the King incensed with wrath, and for the danger that he stood in affliction withal, commanded in menacing wise that he should be fled at a flake, unless he would presently unmask in plain terms what secret and dangerous practices he meant and threatened under this covert circuit of words and intricate circumstancies. "Lo, (quoth he again) how little they set by this ca kais the aipire to great glory and aim at honour; and with that thrust his right hand into the hearth on fire. It was made for the justice and when he endured the rolling thereof, as if he had been riles, and felt no pain, the King well near astounded at this wonderfull and miraculous right that up and leapt from his royal seat and chair of estate, commanding the young man to be had from the ater. "Go, thy traitor (quoth he) in peace, thou that hast done thy own well more mischief than thou hast attempted against my person, I would say God bless thee, and worthy hallowed be of honor for thy prowess. If it were in my service, and in the behalf and defence of mine own Country: and now by the law of arms I discharge thee freely, and give thee leave to dep. it without any hurt or abuse offered unto thee. Then Mutius, as it were to requite again his celerity and detec, "Forasmuch as (quoth he) thou settest to great fare by valor and honour and honorableness to holy end it may be seen that thou shalt get at my hands by celerity that whil. by ruel threats thou couldst not: these are therefore to let thee understand.

E And that there are three hundred of us noble youths, even the very flower and knighthood of Rome, that have composed and sworn thy death, and in this manner to assail thee. My lord it was to be the first the rest as it should fall out, will be here shortly, and wait every man his turn and time, until they hit right upon thee. Mutius, named afterwards Scipio, by reason of the main of his right hand, was no sooner dismissed and gone, but there followed right after him to Rome. Ambassadors from Porfenas and so much troubled in spirit was he, both for the danger part of the first attack, from which nothing preserved him but a small hour and oversight of the assailant and also for the hazard to come. (for look how many conspirators remained behind to give the like attempts; to often flood he in jeopardy of his life) that of his own accord he offered the Romans conditions of peace. And among other capitulations, he stood hard upon this article (but was all in vain of retorting the Trojans into their Kingdom. This point the King urged instantly, rather because he could not well himself deny the Trojans so much, than for that he was ignorant, that the Romans would never yield there. But another article he got granted, namely, the restitution of the Veientians lands again; and the Romans were driven of necessity to give him hostages, in case they would have the Kings garrisons to quit the samianism. Upon these conditions peace was concluded, and Porfena withdrew his forces from the samianism; dislodged and departed out of the territory of Rome. The Senators bestowed frankly upon Mutius as a testimonial of his valiantness, a piece of ground lying beyond Tyber, which was afterwards called, Mutius prata, i.e. Mutius meadows.

Upon this honourable regard and reward of virtue, women were likewise provoked and engin to enterprise worthy proper acts in the service of the Common-weal. For a young damosel and Virgin named Cladia, one of those hostages beforeaid, whiles the Tufcans were encamped (as it fell out) not far from the banks of Tyber, deceiving her keeper; and leading a company of other maidens after her, even within the hot and darts of the enemies, took the river, upon other with them, brought them all to Rome late, and delivered them to their parents, kindfolk and friends, which being reported to the King, he at the first blemished at it, and was all in a rage, and sent unto Rome certain Orators to demand again his hostage Cladia by name: as for all the other.

The sec­ond Book of T. Livius.

I

H

He made no great ac­count of them; but after­wards, un­der fu­mer con­sid­er­a­tion he ad­mired the enter­prise, and plainly said, it sur­passed far all the ad­ven­tures of the Ca­licies and the An­nies; as he pre­tended that if the maid were not ren­dered again, he would take­the league as bro­ken, and be­ing vi­ol­ent, he would send her back to her friends, un­de­filed, and with­out any abuse or vi­olence done un­to her. On both parts was prom­ise faith­ful­ly kept: For both the Romans re­tiled the pledge of peace ac­cord­ing to co­venant, and sen­ce also it was, that vi­r­u­te was not only se­cured safe, but also highly re­garded and hon­oured with the Tuf­can King. For after he had com­mitted and pro­nounced the dam­no­ble, he pro­mised to give her part of the ho­tages, which was not only most be­fit­ing her vir­gi­nity, but also by the ac­cord of them the ho­tages them­selves be­st ap­proved; namely, that that age es­pe­cially should be de­livered out of the ene­mies hands, which was most sub­ject to in­jury and tak­ing wrong. The peace thus re­newed and con­firmed, the Romans re­warded this rare valour in that lea, with as new and tri­an­gen­t an hon­our, for, in remembrance of her, in the top of Via sacra there was er­ected their man­na, [A ma­i­den fit­ting on horse­back.

There remaineth yet even unto our daies amongst oth­er so­lemn cer­e­monies, this one cul­tume re­ceived from our an­ces­tors, far differ­ing and dis­agreement from this pe­ace­able and friend­ly de­par­ture of the Tuf­can King from be­fore the City of Ro­me, and this is: In the por­tage of goods they use to pro­claim first aloud. The sale of King Por­fena his gods. This cer­e­monial cul­tume must needs either begin in time of war, and so was not after­wards for­got­tan in peace; or else arose from some more gra­tions and gen­tle oc­ca­sion at the first, then this title or out­ward form pretenden­th, of del­leng­ing goods by way of ho­lit­ty and after the man­ner of ene­mies. But the like­li­est con­jecture and nearest to the truth of all those that are given out is this: that Por­fena a dis­lodg­ing from the Jun­ta, gave freely unto the Romans, (? the City at that time being after long siege dis­tri­bu­t and in great freights) his rich Camp furnished with vi­tal and provi­sion, con­veyed thither out of the plen­til­ful countries of Her­ma­ea near ad­joy­mg: which goods, for fear there should have been some havock and spoil made thereof in warlike wise, in cafe the peo­ple had been let loose to the ri­fing of the tents, we were after­fled, and called Por­fena his goods: which title sign­fled rather their thank­ful ac­cep­tion of the gift, and remembrance of the giver, than any open and overt sale of the Kings goods, which were not so much as in the Roman power nor at their dis­posi­tion.

Thus Por­fena having given over the Ro­man war, be­cause he would not seem to have brought an­tho­l of men into those parts, and per­formed no ex­ploit, sent his son Ar­nu­ with part of his for­ces to sur­prise and affult Ar­icia. At the first this sud­den and un­expect­ed en­ter­prise much tro­ubled the Ar­icins, but after­ward when the had get­ten aid both from the Late­ine na­tion & also from Cu­mers, they took such heart again, that they durst enter into the field & bid the ene­my battle. In the be­ginn­ing of the con­flict, the Tuf­can charged them so hotly that at the first en­counter they brake the ar­tails of the Ar­icins. But the tro­ops of the Cumans let­ting po­ly­ against force, went a little aside, made way and gave some ground, and when the ene­mies had out­stripped them & were ra­fly and di­orderly pas­sed be­yond them, they turned their en­gins, and let upon their back; to were the Tuf­cans, being in the very train of their vic­tory, be­sides round about, and slan in the mid­dle of them. Only a small rem­nant of them after the loss of their Captains, be­cause they had no other place of re­lief nearer, were in­clined to trudg to Ro­me without wea­pons and dis­armed, like rap­pi­ans both in deed and shew. Where they were kindly en­tained and be­tolled in sev­eral lodg­ings. Some of them when they were cu­rled of their wounds re­paired home, re­port­ing the hospi­tality & court­eous u­age they have found. Many re­mained still at Ro­me for love of their holts and the City: whom who had a place allotted them to dwell in, which after they called Thousian vicus, the Tuf­can street.

After this were P. Lu­cre­tius and P. Valer­ius the third time created Coif. In that year, for a small end, there came Emba­llads from Po­fena, to treat about the re­tor­ning of the Ta­rgu­ins into their Realm: to whom this an­swer was returned: that the Senate would send Emba­llads to the King him­self; where­upon there were im­me­di­ately ad­dress’d unto him in Emba­llas the most hon­ourable per­sonages of all the Nobilit y, who in the name of the people of Ro­me deli­vered this speech: That the chief of their Nobles were fent, rather than any dispatch given by word of mouth per­sonal per­sonal­ly to his Emba­llads at Ro­me: for that they could not have hap­pen them this short an­swer, 4 They would no Kings have: But to this end that for ever after there should be no fut­ure re­newed of that mater, nor in so great mu­tual ben­efits, and favours pas­sed be­­tween them, some dis­con­tent arise on either side, whiles he might be thought to re­quest that which was repugnant and prejudi­cial to the liberty of Ro­me, and the Ro­mans again, un­less they would be execu­tors of their own wom­en, and seek their own mi­che­val­tie, to make denial unto him, whom by their good wills they would not seem to de­ny ought for any thing in the world. But as to the sub­stance of the matter, this was the point: namely, that the peo­ple of Ro­me were not under the regi­ment of a King: but were a free State: and fully set­ted in this pur­pose. To let open their gates to the ene­mies sooner than to Kings: and were all gen­erally of this mind and res­olution. That look­ing when the freedom of that City had an end, then should the City come to an end al­so. To con­clude there­fore they were to entreat him that if he tended the well and sa­fety of Ro­me, he would per­mit them to be free still and at their own lib­erty.
A The King overcome with very modesty, and much abashed in himself, answered thus again:

"Since you are to fully minded and liftly bent (quoth he) neither will I importune you, nor dull your ears with harping (lll upon this unpleasant singing, and do no good: nor bear the Tarquins any longer in hand, and deceive them of that hope of aid, which nothing at all is in my power to perform. Let them from henceforth seek some other place of exile, either for peace or war, as they shall think more expedient, that there may be nothing to let and hinder the free course of amity, and all between me and you. To the good and kind words he joyed better and more friendly deeds. For all the hostages that remained in his hand he sent home: and the Venetians lands which by the covenants denounced at Tusculum, were taken away, he relented to the Romans again. Thus Tarquin seeing all hope of return cut off, removed unto Tusculum to his son in law Mamilian Olivarius, there to live and spend the rest of his days in banishment. So there continued faithful peace between the Romans and King Porsea.

Then were Coll, M. Valerius and P. Posthumius. In that year the Romans fought with the Sabins fortunately, and the Confuls triumphed. But after wards the Sabins made greater preparation of war: to withstand whom, as also for fear of some sudden danger that might arise from Tusculum, from whence they suspected war, although none was openly seen, were P. Valerius the fourth time, and T. Lucerinus the second time elected Coll. But among the Sabins there grew some civil discord between that part that would have war, and the contrary that fought peace; which gained the Romans some strength even from thence. For Appius Claudius (who afterwards at Rome was named Appius Claudinus) a pervertor himself of quietness and repose, being overmatched and not able to make his part good with the adverse faction that minded and stirred troubles, accompanied with a great power of friends and followers, from Romulus fled to Rome, who were enfranchised Citizens, and poftifled of those lands that lie beyond the river " Anio. And from thence came the name of the old trade Appias after that other new Citizens were put unto them. Those I mean, that desir'd of that race and of the same territory. This Appius was admitted into the number of the Senators; and nor long after advanced to be one of the chief men and heads of the City. The Coll went with a strong power into the Sabins land, where after they had Brit wifhed the Country, and after in battle abated the strength and paifhine of the enemy's, so as for a long time after they needed not to fear any rebellion from thence, they returned.

D to Rome in triumph.

The year following, when Agrippa Menenius and P. Posthumius were Coll, P. Valerius ended his days in great glory, reaped the only singular man in those times, by all mens judgment, for skill and knowledge as well in martiall affairs, as in civil affairs: but so poor was his estate, that he had not wherewith to defray his inntrall expenses, and was therefore at the Cities charge right honourably entered. And the Dames of Rome mouned for him as they did for Brutus.

The fame year two Colonies of the Latines, Pomertia and Cora. revolted to the Aurunci, The Romans first began to war upon the Aurunci, and after they had discomfited a greechol of them, who met with the Confuls as they entered the borders, and fiercely made head against them, then all the Aurunci war was driven and translated wholly to Pomertia. The laughter and execution was no less after the conflict, than during the fight: for whereas there were many more of them slain outright in the place than taken prisoners, thoole also that were prisoners they spared not, but murdered everywhere as they went: neither laid the furious rage of war therewith, but even the very hostages whom they had received, to the number of 300, they put to the sword, in this year also was a triumph at Rome.

The Confuls Optio Virginius, and Sp. Caffius, that followed the next year, affailed Pomertia, first by meer force to scale the walls, after with poviories, mantelets, platforms, and other fabrics, raised against it. Upon whom the Aurunci fell not forth; rather of a handred and malicious hatred than for any hope or vantage given them of good exploit: the greater part of them furnished better with fire-works than armed with sword and spear, killed and burned all afore them: and having fired their fabrics afore laid, hurt and slaine a great number of their enemies, one of the Confuls also (but his name precisely is not by any author set down) was fore wounded, thrakken down from his horse and well-near slain. Whereupon the Romans returned back to Rome thus unhappily defeated, leaving the Conful behind them amongst many that were hurt, like to dye. Soon after, and no longer than whilst their wounds might be healed, and a new supply of soldiers made, they came again to Pomertia, in more furious manner than before, and aflao with a stronger power. And when by making of new mantelets and other warlike instruments of assaile, they were proceeded thus forward that the soldiers were ready to scale and get up the wall; then they within yielded; and notwithstanding, the Town was thus surrendered up, yet there was no more mercy bestowed on it, than if it had been forced by assaile. The chief and principal Citizens shamefully lost their heads, the rest of the inhabitants were sold at the spear in open market like slaves. The Town flacks and rated to the ground yet and money made of the lands belonging to it. The Confuls for that they had to wreaked their anger, and sharply revenged themselves, more than for any great war they had finished, obtained triumph.

The year following were Posthumius Caminius and T. Largius Confolis. In this year, during the games and jollities at Rome, certain wackers of the Sabins, went about in a wanton jollity to carry away and savish the Curtexans and common Strumpets of the City. Whereupon the people ran together...

At this day

Tirbe Appia.
After them were T. Eburnius and C. Varus. In their time * Fidex * was besieged, * Crostumeria * won and * Pro Severa * recoiled from the Latines unto the Romans. And the Latine war, which had been a breeding and budding for certain years, was no longer delayed, but brake forth. A. Pethonius the Dictator and T. Eburnius General of the Cavalry, with great power of foot and horse, set forward and advanced as far as the Lake * Reptus *, in the Territory of * Tuscus * and there encountered the Army of the enemies in their march. And because they heard say that the * Tarsei were in the holt of the Latines, they could not for anger forbear any longer, but presently fell to it, and began battell. This field was fought right fiercely, and could more bloudishe a good deal, than others usually before: because the Generals and chief Commanders were there present, not only to give direction by their counsell and advice, but also in person themselves hazed their own bodies, and fought bravely in the medley, and not one of the principal leaders escaped out of the skirme, either of one side or of the other, save and found, save only the Roman Dictator, for as Pethonius was encouraging his men, and letting them in array in the vanguard, * Tarcus Dominicus * (albeit he was now very aged and unwieldy, and not able to bear himself) let ipse to his horse, and ran full hurt against him. But having caught a thrust from aside, was rescued by his men that came upon him, and retired to a place of safety. And in the other wing, Eburnius General of the horsemen, set upon * Ob. Memmius: * but he, the Captain I mean of the Tuclanians, was well ware of him, and espied him coming, and ran his horse with full career likewise upon him, and so desparately they bear their Lances one against the other, that Eburnius was run quite through the arm, and Memmius wounded in the breast, whom the Latines succored and received into the middle ward. As for Eburnius not any longer to bear his staff, with his arm fore hurt, withdrew himself out of the battell. The Leader of the Latines nothing dissatisfied for all his hurt, maintained fight still: and seeing his soldiers somewhat disstreis, he tendeth for the Regiment of the Roman exuls, that were under the leading of L. Tarcus his son: who sticking more courageously unto it, for anger that their goods were spoile, and they driven out of their own country, renewed the compote alreadie for awhile. And as the Romans from that quarter began to recule and give ground, M. Varus, the brother of Publius, espying young Tarcus vaunting himself gloriously in the fore-front of the exuls, inflamed also with a desire of domestical glory of his house: that the same family which had the praise of expelling the Kings, might likewise win the honour of killing them, spurred his horse, and with deadly beat ran against Tarcusius, who giving way to his mortal enemy, retired back to his own Regiment. But Varus by this time was disbande from his company, and rashly ridden into the battell of the gales, and

A and there a common foudlier happen’d to charge upon him a flank, and run him through. The horse flaid not a jot for all the rider was wounded, and fo the Roman Knight ready to die, fell to the ground with his armour upon his body, and paid nature her debt, Pofhbusius the Dictator, after he perceived the valiant man fall, and the banished man advancing lustily forward with full trot, and his own foudliers disordered, and at point to turn their backs gave express commandment unto his own hand, which he had about him of chosen tall men for to guard his person that as many of his fellows as they saw live should take them for enemies, and kill them in the place. Thus by reason of a counter-fear the Romans made head again and renewed the battle. Then began the Dictators cohort to fight, and coming with fresh bodies and courageous romacks, charged upon the weary exiles, and killed them on every side. Wherupon began another confusion also between the Colonels and Captains of quality and mark. The General of the Latines seeing the battalion of the banished well near environed round by the Roman Dictators, speedily took with him into the forefront of the certain squadrons of those that were appointed in the rear-guard to succour and aid: whom T. Hermius, a lieutenant, eipied to come marching in good order, and knowing amongst them Manlius by his handsome horses, and goodly coat-armour, with far greater violence than the General of the horsemen a little before encountered the Colonel of his enemies so hotly, that both he ran Manlius through his sides, and flie him outright, and also whilst he was disarming and rifling his body, he was wounded himself with a short javelin, and being brought back with victory into the Camp, and at first drafing yielded to nature and died. Then rode the Dictator apace to the horsemens, and earnestly cried unto them, that seeing the footmen were toiled out and wearied, they would alight from their horses, and take the matter into their hands: The horsemens soon obeyed, leapt from horseback, and set forward, as if they had flown, to the forefront, where they exposed their targets in defence of them that fought before the enigns. Whereat presently the infantry began again to take heart, seeing the principal men of arms, and noble young gentlemen in the like kind of service, exposed to the same danger, and ready to take part with them. Then at the last were the Latines put back, and their whole battle began to shrink. The gentlemen had their horses brought to them again, and they mounted on horseback to pursue their enemies. The footmen likewise followed after, There the Dictator omitting no help of God and man, vowed, as men say, a Temple to Cæsars, and openly promis’d and proposed rewards to that foudier that made either first or second entry into the enemies’ Camp. Wherupon they betterd themselves courageously, that the Romans at one brunt both vanquished their enemies, and also were professed of their tents. This was the noble field fought at the Lake Regillus. The Dictator and the General of horsemens returned into the city with triumph. For three years after, there was neither affluence peace between them, nor yet professed war.

Conjulius were Q. Clodius, and T. Larrius. After them A. Sempronius, and M. Municius. While these two were Conjulius, the Temple to Saturn was dedicated, and the feast called Saturnalia instituted. After them succeeded A. Pofihusius, and T. Virginius. And in this year and not before, I find in some authors, that the said battle was striken near the Lake Regillus, and that A. Pofihusius suspecting the fidelity of his brother Conjul gave over his place, and so was made Dictator. The account of times doth do vary, and is so intricate and confused, whilst writers diversely set down the chief Magistrates, that in so great antiquity, not of acts only, but also of authors, a man cannot orderly and directly distinguish, according to some writers, who were Conjulius, and what was done in every year. Afterwards were Ap. Claudius, and P. Serullius created Conjulius. This year was famous for the news of Tarquin’s death. He died at Cumes, to which place after the defeature of the Latines power, he went to Ariobarzes the Tyrant, At which tidinges the hearts of the Nobles were well lighted. The Commons also began to look up. But the joy in the Nobility was above measure too excessive and licentious. For why? the great men began now to wrong and wring the communality, untille that day they had favoured and pleased to their full power. In the same year the F Colony Signian, which King Tarquin had created, was now stored again the second time, and the number supplied with new inhabitants. And the tribes or wards at Rome were now made up 21. The temple of Mercury was dedicated in the Ides of May. With the Nation of the Volcians in the time of the Latine war, neither was there peace nor war: for both the Volcians had levied a power for aid to send unto the Latines, if the Roman Dictators had not made good speed: and also the Roman Dictators had the more for feare he should in one battall have to deal with Latines and Volcians both at once. Upon this quarrel, the Conjuls led forth their Legions into the Volcians Country. The Volcians fearing no revenge for their disengagement (that was intended only, and never came in action) were much troubled with this sudden and unlooked for occurrent. Not minding therefore to make resistance and forgetfull of warlike prowess, they delivered too of their Noblemens children out of Corea and Pomitian hostages. Whereupon the Roman Legions from thence without any fight were withdrawn. But not long after the Volcians being somewhat eated and delivered of their fear, came again to their old place restored to their woned nature, and secretly under-hand made preparation anew for war, joyning with them as confederates in this quarrel the Hernikes. They send also their Embassadors all about to move and solicite Latins. But the Latines, for their late overthrow at the Lake Regillus, sought such a spleen and hatred against him whatsoever, that he had once put into their heads and persuade them to take arms, arms, that they could not forbear the very Embassadors, but offer them abuse. They apprehended therefore the Volscians, carried them to Rome and delivered them to the Consuls: where they revealed and gave intelligence, that the Volscians and Hereticks were out in arms, ready to war against the Romans. Which being reported unto the Senators, they were so well pleased and contented withal, that they set at liberty 6000 Latines, prisoners, and sent them home. And concerning a league to be concluded with them, which was like before to have been denied for ever: they referred the consultation thereof, unto the new Magistrates that should next enter. And in good faith, pleasure & glad were the Latins then; for that they had done, and the authors of peace were magnified and had in great reputation. They send moreover a Crown of gold into the Capitol, for a present to Jupiter. With their Emassadors and the present those prisoners which before were fet free, came in greater number. Who repaired straight ways to every man his house, where they had been prisoners, yielding them great thanks for their kind usage and friendly entertainment in time of their calamities and miseries, and promised them therewith the like countesse and mutual hospitality. Never were the Latines at any time afore, both publiquely and privately, united more nearly to the Roman Empire.

But as the Volscian war was now at hand, so the City was at disfond among themselves. The Senators and Commons hated one another at the heart, and all this arose by occasion especially of certain persons that were indebted, and in danger of their creditors: who muttered and gave out in murmuring voice, how that abroad they advertised themselves and fought for the liberty and dominion of the City, and at home by their own neighbours were held prisoners and oppressed; saying that the freedom of the Commons was more safe in time of war than of peace, among the enemies rather than their own fellow Citizens. This inward grudge and heart-burning, which of itself did kindle more and more, the notable calamity of one man above all others, set on a light fire. A certain aged person chance to break prison, and with the arms, badges, and ornaments of all his ancestors, ran into the market place. His apparel was all to tattered, foul, and loathsome, but the habit or plight of his body much more hilly: so pale, so wan, so lean within, as if he had been over-pined and starved, his tongue bare and hair of his head so overgrown, that they made his viage and countenance wild and gaitly. Howbeit, for all he was thus disfigured by this deformity, he was a man well known and as some said, he had done good service in the wars, had been a chief Centurion, and had the charge and leading of bands in the field: and the common people, as pitying his estate, and to move compassion, recounted many worthy exploits of his, to his great credit and singular commendation. Himself likewise showed the tears of wounds, which in his breast and on part of his body in divers places he had received that might testifie his valiant service. The people flocking about him as it were in a common assemblie to hear a solemn Oration, enquired of him, how he came to be in that taking, so poor to disfigured and deformed? He answered, that whiles he served in the Sabine war, he by reason of the continuall forging, and waiting of the Territory, not only lost the revenews and encrease of his lands, but a to his Manor-house was burnt, all his goods ranfackled and spoile, his cattle driven away: and when a levy and tribute was exacted in a time when he fell might, he was driven to take up money and run in debt; which growing more and more by payment of interest, he was constrained to sell his land, that his father and grandfather had left him, and to turn himself out of all by making a clean hand of the rest of his goods: until at length his body also began to winder away in a consumption. Complaining moreover how by his creditor he was not only brought into bondage and thralldom, but also imprisoned, and whipped and taunted in most cruel and brutish manner. With that he shewed before them all, his back lately scorched, with the fresh wales of the lashes newly given him. At the fight and hearing hereof, there arose a great outcry of the people, so that anon the uprore kept not within the compass of the market place, but spread over all the City: in such sort, that as well they were bound, as they that were loose, came forth from all parts into the open streets calling the Quiris and the people pitifully to help. In no corner wanted any companions to take part willingly in this sedicious rout, and everywhere in all the streets they run by companies into the common place. Those Senators who chance to be abroad, at their no small peril light upon this multitude: and had not the Conuls P.Servilius and App Claudius made the better speed, and come upon them to appease the commotion, there would have been some knocks, for hardly could they have held their hands. At whose comming the multitude turned unto them, shewing their irons and all their other frameful misage and misery, saying, This is all the good we have gotten for our warfare: upbraiding every man in the services they had performed, some in one place, some in another, requiring them in threatening voice; rather than by way of supplication, to call the Senate together: and they the while stood about the Curie, as if they would be judges and moderators of their public counsell. Very few of the Senators, such only as by chance came that way, could be brought to repair to the Conuls: as for the rest, they were afraid not only to come into the Cown ill-house, but alfo to venture abroad into the market place, so that by reason of their small assembly there could be nothing done or determined. Then thought the people indeed they were mocked and dallied withall, and driven off with delies, surmising that the Senators which were away, abigned themselves not by chance, nor for fear but only to hinder the proceeding of their cause: and that the Conuls themselves did dissemble and shrink, and without all question made made but a corn and game at their milicries. This broil so increased, that hardly could the reverence and Majesty of the Consuls restrain the peole's rage. But the Senators standing in doubltfull bands, whether to stay behind or to come forward would be more danegerous, at length they resolved to repair into the Senate, and being now at last a full and inithent house gathered, neither the Lords there assembled, no nor yet the Consuls, could well agree amongst themselves what to do in this case. Appius a man of a hot spirit, was of opinion to order the matter by Consular authority and commandment, laying, That if one or two of them were laid hold on the rest would be quiet. But Servundus more inclined to medd and gentle remedies, thought it a more safe and easy course too, rather to bend than to break their angry and ill homick. But amidst these troubles there hapned a greater and more terrorfull occurrence: For certain Lucins nor horseback rode in wept. and brought news in hasty and tumultuous manner, that the Volscians were coming with a mighty and cruel army against the City to avenge the same. Whih having been heard (see how discord had of one City made twain) wrought far other eft in the Nobles, than in the Commons. The commonalty for joy, and said the gods were now come down from Heaven to be revenged of the Senators pride, and encouraged one another not to take preiimony, or to enter their names in the Muller-matters book, laying that they had rather dye at once with all, than perish alone and none but they: Let the Nobles (quoth they) serve as fouldiers; let them take weapon in hand, and abide the brunts and hazards of war, who receive the profts, the prices and rewards thereof. But contrary-wise the Senate put out and afruched with the twoold fear, as well from citizen as enemy, befoth the Consil Servudus (a man by nature more affable and popular) That he would provide for the safety of the Common-wealth, beft as it were round with terrorfull perils. Then the Consil defimified the Senate, and came into the house of the people, where he shewed what care the LL. of the Senate had for the good of the common: But whiles they were (quoth he) busy in conuination for the greateft part of the courts of the City, and yet in truth no more but a part, it fell out so in the mean while. that of necessity they must see to the whole body of the Common-wealth, whereof they fland in exceeding fear. Seeing therefore the enemies were almost hard at the gates, they could not possibly do or intend any thing before war. Neither (if there should be any recipt and feature granted) were it either for the common credit and honesty, not to fight for their Country, but that the nobles had their pay before hand; nor well becomening the Nobles and for their reputations. On, to look unto and take order hastily, to redres the milicries and calamities of their citizens upon fear, rather than afterwards with good deliberation, for love and of willing mind. This speech of his he conformed with an edict, by vertue whereof, he gave strait commandment: *Imprimis, that no man should keep bond of or in prision, any citizen of Rome, but that he might be enrolled before the Consil, Item, that no perion shold hold in possession, or sell the goods of any fouldier, so long as he abide in the camp, nor arrest his children or childrens children. This edict being once published and proclaimed, not only the enthralld debtors there present, were immediately by name enrolled, but also from all parts of the City, they leapt quickly out of their houses, seeing that now their creditors had no right nor power to detain and arrest them, and ran into the market place for to take a military oath of allegiance, to be true fouldiers and faithful to the State. A number there was of these: neither was there any that more manfully behaved and quit themselves or took more pains in the Volscian war. Then the Consil led forth his power against the enemies, and within a little of them incamped himself. The night following, the Volscians presuming upon the variance and discord of the Romans, affailed the tents, if haply in the night season any of them might have been wrought to abandon the camp and come to them, or to practishe any treason. But the Sentinels defpaired them, and upon alarming the whole army arose, and every man made haft to his weapons, Thus came that enterprise of the Volscians to nothing. The reit of the night both parts retired, and were quiet. On the morrow by break of day, the Volscians having filled up the trenches, assailed the bulwarke and rampiers, and by that time they had on every side flaked up the fences, palliades, and other fortifications, the Consil, who for likewise was called unto infantly on every hand, but of the debtors abord, said especially above the rest, to give the signal, and to found the baterie, made some stay on purpose to try the courage of his men: and seeing well now their forwards and their homacks, at length gave them a token to rush forth, and to let them loose, as eager to fight as might be. So at the very first onlet the enemies were presently discomfited and put to flight: the footmen followed hard upon them in chase; and as they could reach, wounded them behind on their backs, and killed them: the horsemen likewise pursued them even to their pavilions, who still feared exceedingly what might becomme of them: and within a while their very campallio, environed about with the legions, and abandoned of the Volscians themselves for fear, were forced and taken. The next day following, the legions marchd to Suefla Pometia, for thither the enemies were fled: and within few daies the Town was won, and put to the sack, and the spoil and pillage given away: whereby the needy fouldiers were somewhat refreshd. The Consil in great glory and honour brought back his victorious army to Rome. In his way homeward the Ambassadors of the Enervius Volscions disfurnishing their own State, upon the loaf or Pometia, came unto him. To whom after consultation had with the Senate and a decree passt peace was granted: but they were fined to part with their Lands. Immediately upon this, the Sabins also put the Romans Romans in a fright, and in every deed it might be called a tumult, rather than a war. For word was brought in the night season that an army of the Sabins were come in a rode, as far as the river Arno, robbing, spilling and burning all the villages and hamlets as they went. Forthwith was sent thither the whole power of horses under the conduct of A. Postumius, who in the Latin war had been Dictator. After him followed the Consul Servilius with a chosen regiment of footmen. Most of the enemies as they ranged abroad foraging in scattering wise were by the horsemen surprised and inclosed. And when the Infantry besides marched against the Sabins legion, they were not able to retfitt for being tired out, partly with their long journey, and partly with plunging all night long, and many of them having overcharged themselves with meat and wine within the villages, had hardly strength enough to run away. Thus the Sabin war in one night was heard of and ended.

The day following, when as now the Romans were in good hope that they had peace on every side, behold the Aurelian Embassadors came into the Senate proclaiming war, and lefs they would force the Volscian lands, and restore them to their rightfuil owners. And even at one time with the Embassadors was the army also of the Aurecians abroad, and had taken the field. The news whereof, and namely, that they were now in light not far from Aricia, roused up the Romans into great a broil and hurlelyly, that the Senators could neither be confinued with, and deliver their opinions in order, nor yet give a peaceable answer to those that came as it were with weapon in hand, being thus forced to take arms themselves, so to Aricia direct in warlike manner they march, and not far from thence they joined battle with the Aurecians. And in one day that war had also an end.

Thus when the Roman soldiers had gotten victory within a few days in so many places, and had now defeated the Aurecians, they looked for the promulc of the Conful, and the faithful performance of it by the Senate. At what time Appius both upon a proud tomack, and arrogant spirit of his own by nature, and also to discred and discount the word of his fellow Conful, in all actions of debt proceeded, and gave judgement with rigor against the debtors. Whereupon both they that had been before imprisoned, were delivered again into their creditors hands, and other also became prisoners anew. Whereat when as a soldier, whole cafe it was thus hardly to be dealt withal, called upon the Conful his fellow for help, they ran at once to Servilius, at his hands they claimed a promulc: every one uprising and reproached him with their service in war, with their fears there gotten, requiring that he would propose the matter again unto the Senate, and as a Conful, succour and protect his Citizens; or like a General, maintain his soldiery. These matters no doubt, moved the Conful: but to foddle the case that he could neither will nor chuse, but difsemble, deal double, and temporize with them: so fully bent, and wholly wedded to the other part, was not only his colleague, but also the whole faction of the Nobility. This by hearing himself as a Neuter, and going as they say, between the bark and the tree, he neither avoided the hatred of the Commons, nor yet won favour with the Nobles; whiles the Nobles took him for a soft and base minded Conful, seeking to please all parties, and the Commons for as crafty and false dispenser: in a short time it appeared he was as much hated of the people as Appius. For, the Conuls hapned on a time to determine, whether of them twain should dedicate the Temple of Mercury. The Senate put over the deciding of this matter from them themselves unto the people: and decreed withal, that to whether of them the dedication of the Temple was by the peo, les election granted, he should over and besides have the charge to purvey corn and victuals he should erect and institute a Collegue or fellowship of Merchants, and he in stead of the high Priest, should undertake the solemn fealtis or festival days. Then the people gave the dedication of the Temple to M. Feelorius, a principal Centuries of the vanguard: which as it early appeared, was done not so much to grace the man, as who had an higher office bestowed upon him, then was fit for one of his degree and calling: as to disgrace and deface the Conuls. Herest, one of the Conuls, yes, and the Punctil formed and tunned exceedingly against the Commons, But the Commons took heart unto them more and more, and began to proceed far otherwise, and to take another course, then they purposed at the beginning: for defending of the Conuls and Senats help, when they saw a debtor fled and brought to the bar, they would run flocking from all parts together, so that the Conuls stamine and decree could not be heard for the noise and clamour. And de. reer judge what he would, no man would ebeby. And to violently they went to work that in presence of the Conful, the creditors were singled out evil treated, and mikned of the Commons being many together. So the whole tear and hazard of the main chance even of liberty it felle, was now altogether translated from the debtors to the creditors. In the very neck of their troubles, there arose a fear of the Sabin war, and when it was determined there should be a matter of soldiers, no man would arrow to his name and be enrolled. All this while Appius raging and took on, insinuating bitterly against the needy and popula city of his brother Conful, who with his keeping silence for defpacing the people, by his soft carriage of himself, had betrayed the Wel-publick, and over and besides that, he had not minis tered justice for the loan of money, nor dealt according to law in that behalf, he had brought the matter to pass that he could take no matters by virtue of the decree of the Senate. Howbeit (faith he) the Common-wealth is not wholly forlorn and forborne, nor yet the Confular authority utterly cut down and trodden under foot: for he would himself alone, if there were no more he, defend and maintain both his own place, and the Senators dignity. Wheras the multitude A multitude therefor stood thus malapertly, as their daily manner was about the bar; he commanded one principal captain of sedition to be attached and had away and as he was led to prison by the sergeant and lieutenant, he appealed. Neither would the consuls have given place to the appeal (for all he knew the people how they were bent, and what their doom would be) had not his obstinate stiffness with which he been overwayed more through the different advice of authority of the chief nobles and lords of the senate, than by the clamorous noise and menaces of the multitude: to refuse was he, and his heart so courageous to undergo their ill will and heavy displeasure. Thus grew the mischief more and more daily, ratified not with open mouth and broad speech, but which was more pernicious and dangerous by convenicles secret meetings, and conversation and the like. At length these consuls, being in their offices, did this Appius Claudius was odious unto the commons, went out of their offices, to wit, Appius Claudius was wondrously well affected of the nobles, Servilius liked neither of them nor the commons.

After whom A. Virginins and T. Pansa entered their consulship. But then the commons not knowing what manner of consuls they should have, began to assemble together by nights; in some in town others in the countryside; and at the end, they might not be unprovided and to seek upon some demand, what to do in the common place; nor manage their business, hand over head, and at a venture, which the consuls supposing (as it was indeed) a pernicious example and of ill consequence, pronounced the matter before the senators: but when they had proposed it, they could not orderly ask their advice, what was to be done; they took it on, and kept such outcry and clamour at it, on all hands, fretting and fuming, that the consuls should lay upon the senate the burden and heavy load of that, which properly they by virtue of their authority and office should execute and perform themselves and that if there were any magistrates in the city (as they) there would not be thus suffered in Rome any other counsel but publickly whereas now the state is divided into a thousand counsels and convenicles; whereas, some have their meetings and assemblies in the countryside, others in the countryside. Affixed only one man indeed (for that is more than a consuls) such a one as Appius Claudius was, were soon dispatched, and in one minute of an hour scatter the unlawful assemblies of the commons upon this rebuke and check, replied again and demurred in this manner: and what would you have us to do (unto them) for we are resolved to do nothing flaccly and coldly, but with great courage and diligence as shall be well liked of the senators, Whereupon an order passed, that they should take matter and levy soldiers with all manner and severity and strength, and moreover, that the commons with idleness and ease were grown over malapert and too licentious, and when the senate was dismissed, the consuls went into the tribune and took their places, and summoned by name all the younger sort to appear: and none making answer to his name, the multitude standing about as it had been to hear some publick oration, said plainly, that the commons from thenceforth would be no longer deluded, and that the consuls should never get as much as one soldier unless they would stand to their word, and make good the promise that publicly before was made, and reprove to every man again his liberty, before they carried them to take weapon in hand: to the end they might fight for their country in country-men, and not for their lordly matters. The consuls law well what they had in commision from the senate that of all those who within the counsel house; walls, ipso facto and given out great words, there was not one present to take part of this odious mantle of the people. And like they were to have a bitter and cruel broil with the commons. They thought good therefore they tried the worst, and dealt by extremity, once again to ask advice of the senates and to confer with them. But then all the younger sort of the senators, approached by multitudes, hard almost to the consuls feared, willing them to give over their consulsship, and to resign up their rule and authority, to the maintenance whereof they lacked courage. Now when the consuls had sufficiently weighed and tried both ways thus at length began they laid. A great sedition and commotion is toward my lord. To the end therefore that ye pretend not ignorance, and lay another day ye were not there told of it. There is a great sedition and commotion toward. We require therefore that they who find greatest fault with our remissness and lack of courage, affit us and us with us while we take the multitudes: and since you will needs have it, we will execute it according to their minds that are most earnest and fierce. Then come they back again upon the tribune, and commanded on foot purpose, one of them that were there in sight to be cited and called by name. But he stood still and he did his peace, with a company of men gathered round about to guard him, for fear he should have done harm or violence done unto him. The consuls then sent a sergeant to attack him, who being repulsed off, then those nobles which sat there on the bench to affit the consuls, cried out upon the shameful indignity, and said it was intolerable, and so ran down in haste from the consuls' seat to aid the sergeant. But the violent rage of the multitude, who let the lieutenant alone, and only stayed him from laying hold on the man, turned upon the patriots. So that the consuls were far to keep between, and then the fray was appeased. In which, there being no hopes flying about their ears, nor weapon drawn, there was more clamor, bawling and challenging than any hurt done. Then was the senate house called in a great hurry: and with more confusion, they there in conseil: whereas they theretofore how they were beaten and illused, required that commissioners should sit upon this riot and make due inquisition; and the boulett of them gave their determination, as much by clamor and noise, as by sentence and opinion grounded upon reason. At last, when the tumult was overblown and their hear allayed; and that the consuls, hit them in the teeth, and reproved them, laying there was a little discretion and gravity in their Court and Council-house, as in the common Hall, they began in the end to confer cordially, and three opinions there were amongst them, P. Virginius would not have a common and general cause (to wit, that all debtors should be released from their creditors) but his advice was, that they should only be considered, who relying upon P. Servilus the Consul his word and faithful promise, had served in the wars of the Volcians, Auruncans and Sabins, T. Largus, he supposed and thought this, that it was not a time then to make amends only for good defects, and to respect them alone that had done well, and to recompense good service: but for as much as the whole commonsalty was deeply engaged and plunged in debt, unless they were all provided for, and good order taken for them every one, there would be no quietness nor end of troubles: yea, and (that which more is) in case they be not all alike regarded, but some debtors in better condition than others, the discord would rather be more kindled than quenched, Appius Claudius a man both of natural disposition fierce and cruel, and also by occasion made more outrageous, needed with the Commons hatred against him on the one side, and tickled with the praise and commendations of the Nobles on the other side, who ever magnified him and lift him up to the skies, spake to this effect: *'Their is a great stir and tumultuous hurthilities: my Masters (quoth he) is not long of the miliey and calamity, but only of too much liberty of the Commons: who rather upon fastness are grown warren and unruly than for any want unpatient and discontent: and all this mischief and no doubt is sprung of this, that they have liberty to appeal. For to long as it is in their power to fly for help into those that have erred as well as they, well may the Consul threaten and give out menacing words: as for any rule else or command they shall have none among them.' Come on therefore, let us create a Dictator from whom they cannot make their appeal. Then shall this furious rage, which now leteth all on a light fire, be soon husht and quite extinguished. Let me fee then, who dare beat a Lictor, when he shall well know, that he alone whole honor and Majesty he shall offend and abuse, hath power to scourge him and take away his life. Many men thought this sentence of Appius to be very hard and cruel; yea, and dangerous, withal, in regard of the late precedent of Virginius and Servilus. That other likewise of Largus was thought inconvenient, if it taking away all keeping of credit with the creditors. The opinion and advice of Virginius was supposed as well in one respect as in another most indifferent and mean between both. But by reason of the faction and regard of private benefit, which always hath done hurt and ever will, to publick Council, Appius prevailed, and he missed very little but he himself had been made Dictator. Which if it had come to pass, it would surely have estranged and alienated quite the hearts of the Commons, in that most busy and dangerous time: when it happened that the Volcians, Equians, and Sabins, were all up at once in arms. But the Consuls and elder Senators, had great care and consideration to chuse such a one, as might by mildness of his own nature allay and qualify the succeeding rigour and tempests incident to Soveraign and absolute authority. They elect therefore to be Dictator, Marcus Valerius the son of Ludus. The Commons albeit they law well enough this Dictator created not to curbe them, yet having got by his brothers law, the benefit of Appeal, they feared no severe and insolent proceeding from that house and name. The Edict besides, that the Dictator let forth, which was welsner all one with that of the other of the Consul Servilus, much confirmed and settled their minds. For supposing now, they had more hold both of the man, and also of his authority, and that they might with more confidence rely themselves on the one and the other, they gave over all debate, and entered their names into the muster book: so there were enrolled full ten legions. The like army for number was never levied afore. Of which legions, the Consuls had the conduct of three a piece, and the Dictator commanded the other four: and high time, it was: for the war might not be deferred any longer. The Equians had already invaded the territory of the Latins, and their Embassadors were petitioners to the Senate, either to lend succour, or to give them leave to put on armor themselves for the defence of their confines, and frontiers. It was thought the fater and fatter way, that the Latins without arming themselves should be defended, than to permit them again to take weapon in hand. So the Consul Femidus was sent thither, and he played them from their northering and wafting. For the Equians were departed out of the plains, and trufting rather in the range of the ground, than in their weapons, stood upon their guard, kept themselves safe from danger, upon the high tops of the Hills and Mountains.

The other Consul who was gone against the Volcians, because he would not alfo doe any time draw the enemy forth (by wafting the country especially) to encamp himself nearer, and so at length to fight a field. Now was there a plain in the middle between both camps: where each army stood before their rampiers, embattled, and ranged in array, with banners displayed ready to fight. The Volcians were somewhat more in number, wherein upon they began battle dilated and as if they let light by the enemy. But the Roman Consul neither advanced forward, nor suffered his men once to shoute and answer ever again, but charged them to stand still with their javelins full in the ground, until the enemies were come within the reach of hand fight, and then to lay about them lustily with their swords, all that ever they could. The Volcians out of breath with running and shouting, charged the Romans, who seemed for fear to stand still: but after they once perceived that they were hotly encountred by them again, and saw their swords glittering in their eyes, they were troubled therewith, as if they had been entrapped and fallen into some trains laid for them, and so turned their backs. And by reason they came running before to A to battles, their strength would not hold out now to run clear away: The Romans contarily, because at the beginning of the fight they had food quiet, were treath of body, and soon overtook them thus overruled, won their camp by force, and after they had driven the enemies out from thence, chased them into Velitrae, and entered the Town pelmen one with another in a medley the Victor together with them that were vanquished. More bloodshed there was by execution of one them with another, of all ages and sexes, as they came in their way than in the very battle. A very few, even such as without weapon yielded themselves were spared and pardoned.

Whiles these things were doing amongst the Volcians, the Dictator dissected and put to flight the Sabins, with whom he had much cruel war: yes, and forced them to abandon and quit their camp. For having lent his horsemen into the main battle of the enemies, which they had but slightly strengthened within, and betided the ranks there very thin, and all to stretch out the wings on both sides more at large, he brake their arrates: and when they were once disorder'd, the footmen came in upon them: and in the same brunt were they Masters of their camp, and so the war ended. There was not in those days a braver battle fought and more renowned, setting aside that only at the lake Regillus. The Dictator rode in triumph unto the City. Over and above the accustomed honors, both he and his posterity after him were allowed a certain place in the great Race or Theater, called Circus; for to behold at ease the solemn games, and there was set the ivory chair of efface, called Sella curulis. The Volcians thus vanquished, loit the territory about Velitrae, and new inhabitants were tenchit from the City to people and to till the grounds, so that it became a Colony.

Somewhat after this, there was a field fought with the Equians, but in truth, full against the Conns his will: for they that were to climb up a steep Hill (to their disadvantage) for to meet with the enemy. But the Souldiers blaming him for tillring out, and making delays, to the end that the Dictator might be out of Office before they made return to the City, and so his word and promise, like the Conns before him, should come to nothing, drove him perforce to lead up his army, rashly and at adventure against the Hills. This being an enterprize ill ordered, and an error escaped, tell out notwithstanding very well through the cowardice of the enemy: who before they were come within shot and the darts cast, amazed at the venturolus of the Romans, forsook their holds which they had in most defensible places, and leapt down into the valleys over against them. There was booty & pillage good enough, and a bloudles victory.

Having iPed thus fortunately abroad in three several wars, the Senators and Commons were not careless of home-affairs, what would be the issue thereof. The Bankers and Tiuers, what with favor, and what with subtle and cautious policy, had devised beforehand and wrought such means, as might frustrate and disappoint not only the Commons, but also the Dictator, and put them by their expectation. For Velitian, after the retreat of Venusius the Conns, dealt first and above all other matters and causes at the Council table, in the behalf of the people that had achieved such victories, and proposed to know their minds, What should be done with those enebted, endangered, and imprisoned persons. "Which motion of his being disliked and rejected: I see well (quoth he) that I cannot please you, so long as I persuade to concord and unity: wish ye will (trust me truly) ere it belong, that the commonalty of Rome had more Patrons and Advocates like myself. As for me, I will neither bear my citizens any longer in hand to deceive them, nor be a Dictator in vain to effect nothing. Civil discord at home, and foreign war abroad, cauad the State to have need of this office. Now, when peace is gotten without, behold it is crossed and hindered within; yet had I rather be present at the light of a mutiny and insurrection when I am a private person, than whiles I am a Dictator. Thus went he out of the Council-house, and yeilded up his Dictatorship withal. The Commons saw plainly what the matter was, and how upon a difficulty and grief that he took in their behalf, for very pitty and compassion of them, he gave over the place: and therefore, as if he had fully discharged himself of his faithful word to them given, (for that there was no default in him, but it had been performed indeed) they accompanied him along home to his house with hearty affection, praising and commending him all the way they went. The Lords of the Senate began then to fear, lest if the army were broken up and discharged, there would be some secret conventions, and new conspiracies contrived: therefore, albeit the sufferers were taken by the Dictator: yet because the soldiers had sworn allegiance to the Conns, supposing they were still bound to warfare by virtue of that oath, and pretending a colony that the Equians tenued war, they commanded the legions to be led forth of the City. This happened the funeral the sooner and set it forward. At first as men said, they comploted and laid their heads together about murdering and making way the Conns, to the end they might be acquit of their oath unto them: but afterwards being better schooled and advised, that no man's confidence can be cleard of treble, and discharged of an oath once taken, by committing a famil ak and working mischief, they withdrew themselves out of the way by the petition of one Sicinius, and without couage of the Conns, departed as far as Mount Sacre, on the farther side of the River Ama, three miles from the City. This is the more common report, and goeth more certain, than that whereof Piso is the Author (namely, that the commons retired themselves to Arretine.) There, without any head or Captain, they encamped and fortified themselves within a trench and rampier, and kept quiet for certain dayes, neither taking nor doing harm; harm; as having carried with them such things only as were necessary for the sustenance of their life. Great fear there was in the City, and in this mutual and reciprocal fear, all men were perplexed and to know what to do. The Commons fortnight after the yellow fever had broken out in the City, they were in such straits whether it was better they abode still among them, or followed after their fellows. For long they sought, and a multitude once disbanded; still in quiet? Again, in case any foreign war should arise in the mean time, what might ensue thereupon in the end? In conclusion, there was no hope behind to be looked for, but in the concord of citizens: and therefore the Commons man way or other, either by reasonable conditions or unreasonable, were to be reconciled again and reduced into the City, there was no remedy. So it was thought good and agreed upon, that a Senate of Senators (a fair open and eloquent man) grasped, withal and well-beloved among the Commons, for that he was from them descended) should be sent as an Orator to treat with them. Who being received into the camp, after that old and harlot kind of eloquence in those days, spake as men faith to this effect, and told this tale and parable: "Upon a time (quoth he), when as in man's body all the parts thereof did agree, as now they do in one but each member had a severally intent and meaning; yea, and a speech by it self: so it befell, that all other parts besides the belly, thought much and repined that by their careless-ness, labor and ministrer, all was gotten, and yet all little enough to serve it: and the belly it self lied full in the mids of them, did nothing else but enjoy the delight some pleasures brought unto her. Whereupon they mutined and conspired altogether in this wife. That neither the hands of K should reach and convey food into the mouth, nor the mouth receive it as it came, not yet the teeth grind and chew the same. In this mood and fit, whiles they were minded to famish the poor belly, beheld the other limbs, yea, and the whole body besides, pined, wafted, & fell into an extreme consumption. Then was it well seen, that even the very belly also did do small service, but served the other parts, as it received food it self: seeing that by working and concocting the meat throughly, it digested and distributed by the veins into all parts, that refreshed and perfect blood whereby we live, we like, and have our full strength. Comparing herewith, and making his application to wit, how like this intestile and inward digestion of the body, was to the fell stomack of the Commons, which they had taken and born against the Senators, he turned quite the peoples hearts. Then began some treaty of union and concord: and among other arts, it was conditioned and granted, that the Commonalty should have certain safe and inviolable Magistrates of their own among themselves, such as might have power to affit the Commons against the Commons: Item, that it might not be lawful for any Senator to bear that office. So there were created two Tribunes of the Commons, C. Tacitus, and L. Albinius. And these elect three other fellow officers unto them, Of whom Secundus, the Author of the sedition or insurrection was one, who were the other two was not for certain known. Some say there were but two Tribunes created and no more in the mount Sacer, and that the sacred law was there made concerning their immunity. During this insurrection and revolt of the commons, Sp. Cossius and Posthumius Comitus entered their: Comitia. In whose place a league was made with the people of Latium. For the establishing whereof, one of the Comitia stayed behind at Rome: the other was sent unto the Volscian war, who discomfited and put to flight the Volscians of Antium, chasing and driving them into the City Longula, which he won. And immediately he took Mucaneus a Town of the Volscians, and after that with great force assaulted Corioli. There was in camp then among the flower of gallant youths, one Caius Martius, a Noble young Gentleman, right politic of advice, active before, and tall of his hands, who afterwards wasurnamned Corioli. While the Roman army lay at siege before Corioli, and were amzned wholly upon the Towns-men within, whom they kept fast shut up, and feared no present danger at all from any forrain war without: behold, all on a sudden the Volscian legions that came from Antium, affiaied them: at which very instant the enemy also fell out of the Town. Which Martius seeing, who by good hop quartered and warded there, with a lawful band of elect men, not only repressed and stopped the violence of those that imputed and brake upon him, but also whilsts the gate fully opened, fiercely rushed in himself; and having made a foul slaughter of people thereby, at his first entrance into the City, and caught up fire at a venture, flung it upon the houses that stood upon and about the walls. Whereupon arose a great outcry of the folk within the Town,却又 together with lamentable weeping and wailing of women and children, as commonly is seen in such a fright. Which at the very first, both hardened the Romans, and also troubled the Volscians: and no marvel, seeing the City taken before their face, for which they were come to rescue. Thus were the Volscians of Antium defeated, and the Town Corioli won. And Martius through his praiseworthy, so much obscured and stopped the light of the Comitia his fame, that it had not been ingraven in brass for a remembrance and monument. That there was a league with the Latines, and the fame made by Sp. Cossius alone (for that his companion was absent) there had been no record of all, but forgotten quite it had been, that ever Sp. Cossius warred with the Volscians. The same year died Meneius Agrrippa, a man all his life time before beloved indifferentely of the Senators and the Commons: but after the insurrection, much more dear unto the Commons than before. This truce-maker, this mediator for civil attonement, this Embassador and Messenger from the Senators to the Commons, this reconciler and reducer of the Commons
A home again into the City, had not at his death sufficient to defray the charges of his funerals: the Commons therefore made a puritie and a contribution of a Sextant by the poll, and were at the coif to inter and bury him worthily.

After this were made Consuls, T. Gracchus, and P. M. A. Montanius, In which year when all was quiet abroad for any war, and the dilution at home healed up clean, and skinned: another calamity at more grievous entered the City. First, a dearth of corn, and all manner of victuals, by reason that the grounds upon the departure of the Commons were neglected and untended. Here-upon infested famine, even such as usually is incident to men beggad, and very the houhold of bondervants, ye, and the commons too, had utterly perished for hunger if the Consuls had not in time made the better provision: by sending pursuivants all abroad to buy corn, not only into Hesperia, by passing along the river on the right hand from Hostia, and on the left hand by Sea, (passing through the Volckian Country) even as far as Cumae: but also into Sicily, there to lay for grain. Such was the hatred of the borderers: that Rome was enforced to have need of succor and relief from afar. Now when they had bought certain corn at Cumae, it was no sooner embarked, but the ships were stayed and arrested there, by Aristeodamus the tyrant for the goods of the Tarquin, whose heir in remained he was. In the Volckian Country and Pomponius, they could buy none for mony. There, the very Pursuivants themselves were in danger of violence, by the men of the Country. Out of Tuscan there came corn up the Tyber, whereas the Commons were satisfied and refreshed. And considering the frights they were in for want of victuals, they had been fore disposed and vexed with wars besides, and that in a very ill time, and unfeeliong for them: but that the Volckians, who now were in readines, and upon the point to make war, had a penitence that raigned hot among them. Which heavy croes and affliction, the enemies were so discouraged with, that when the plague began to lay, even then they continued ill afraid.

The Romans both at Miltiae augmented the number of the inhabitants and also at Norba, finding a new Colony into the Mountains: to be a Fortrefs and strength for all the territory of Pomponius. Moreover, when M. Montanius & A. Sempionius were Consuls, great store of corn was brought out of Sicily: and it was debated in the Senate-house, at what price the Commons should be therewith. Many thought the time was now come to wire the Commons, and keep them under, and to recover again their royalties, which by their departure were forcibly wrested and dismembered from the nobility. But above all others Martinus Coriolanus, an utter and cap- nental enemys against the Tribuns. Why see I (as one brought under the yoke of servitude, and put as it were unto my raimone, by Robbers and Thieves) these Magistrates of the Commons? why see I Sestius mighty? Shall ever one of their indignities longer than I needs must, I that could not bear Tar- grumius to be King, Shall I brook and suffer Sestius?. Let him depart aside now, and take his Commons with him: the way is open to Mount Sucea and other Hills: Let them carry away with them the corn out of our possesions and Lordships, as they did three years ago: let them enjoy, take for their use, and spend the store, which they in their foolery and fury have provided. I dare be bold to say, that when they are by this calamity once tamed, they will rather till and husband the ground themselves, than with weapon in hand, and by way of im- fretion, forbid and hinder the tillage thereof. I cannot to soon lay, whether it had been as meet, as I suppose it was possible and easy to effect, that the Senators by offering more gentle conditions in the prices of corn and victuals, might have eased themselves of the Tribuns authority over them, and also have been disburdened of those impositions which will they, till they were laid upon them. Well, this seemed to the Senate a sharp centurie and severe sentence of Coriolanus, and for very anger also it had like to have caused the Commons to rise up in arms. For they muttered and gave it out in their teams, 'That now they were laid at and

E aliated with famine like enemies, deprived and bereft of their meat and pithe: that the outlandish corn, the only sustenance and food which fortune had furnished unto them beyond all hope, was snatched and plucked from their mouths, unless the Tribuns be delivered and yeelded Prisoners hand and foot bound to C. M. Mart. unless he might have his pennys worth of the back and shoulders of the Commons of Rome. For he was now start up and become their tormentor and hangman, to command them either to death, or to servitude. As he went out of the Council house, they had run upon him with violence, but that the Tribuns, as good luck was, served him with procis in time, to appear at a day, and come to his answer. Here-with their furious anger was appeased. For now every man knew, that he was him self to be the judge and Lord of his enemies life and death. Mart. at the first scorned the Tribuns thundering threats, and gave the hearing, as though he made in all reckoning thereof, saying: That their authority had power granted by limition, only to aid, and not to punish: that the Tribuns were Tribuns to the Commons, and not to the Senators. But to slightously were the Commons bent, and to let upon mischief, that there was no other remedy, but one man must pay for it to spare & excuse the rest of the Nobles, Howbeit: the Senators did what they could to with them: by opposing hatred and displeasure again, and making all means, what either privately they were able of themselves, or jointly by their whole Order and degree to procure. And fitt, this confron they attayed. affayed to slay and overthrow the suit commenced; namely, by setting their followers and retainers in sundry places to deal with the Commons severally one by one, & what they could to affright them from meetings and assemblies together. Afterwards, they came all forth at once into the Forum or common place. A man that had seen them would have said they had been the parties themselves in trouble and accused, ready to hold up their hand at the bar: such praying, such a beseeching they made of the Commons, in the behalf of this one citizen, this only Senator; that if they would not in their love acquit him for their sakes, as innocent and unguilty, yet they would give him unto them as an offender and faulty person. In conclusion, when his day came, he made default and appeared not, yet continued they still in their angry mood against him. And being condemned in his absence, for contumacy, departed into banishment to the Volscians, I menacing his own country as he went, and carrying even then with him the revenging flock of an enemy.

The Volscians at his coming received him courteously, and friendly intreated him every day more than other, as they perceived his anger more and more toward his countrymen, by many complaints he made of them, and threats withal that he oftentimes gave out against them in their hearing. He made his abode and sojourned in the house of Accius Tullius, who at that time was a mighty great man among the Volscians, and one that ever bare mortal malice unto the Romans. And whiles the one of them was provoked with an oldranked grudge, and the other set on and pricked forward upon a fresh quarrel and occasion of anger, they both laid their heads together and complotted to make war upon the Romans. This only thing flood in their way to crofs their designs: They thought verily their Commons would hardly or scarcely at all be brought, to riie and take arms again, which they had so often unhappily attempted: And besides, their courages were well cooled, and theirflammakd abated by the los of their youth in many and sundry wars, often times afore, and now at last, by the late pestilence and mortality. They were therefore to go cunningly to work; that for scarce as the old hatred against the Romans was grown out and worn away, their hearts upon some new anger might be chafed and galled again. There were by chance at that time in Rome, the great Games and Plays in hand, to be set out anew the second time, the occasion whereof was this. A certain householder one morning betimes before the shows and games began, had beaten with rods a poor slave of his under the fork which he carried on his shoulders, and driven him along through the mids of the Circus or Theatre: and with that began the plays, as if there had been no matter therein of scripture or Religion. But not long after. one T. Latinus a mean Commoner had a dream or vision: In which he thought that Jupiter complained and said, that the Dancer before the plays pleased him never a whit: and unless those games were newly exhibited again, and that very stately and sumptuously, some great danger should befall the City: willing him withall, to make relation hereunto of the Comit's. The man albeit in truth he was not without some sene and feeling of Religion and the fear of God: yet made he no such great scruple at the matter, but that the reverence he had of the Majesty and countenance of the Magistrates unmounted and dashed it clean: for ever haply he should become a talking rock in mens mouths, and be mocked for his labour. But this delay and sleeping of the matter, he bought full dear. For within few days his ten hapled to dye. And because he should be out of doubt what was the cause of this his losse and great misfortune, whiles he was troubled in spirit, with anguish and sorrow, behold, the same vision appeared to him again in his sleep, and seemed to ask him whether he had not yet sufficiently paid for this disobedience and contempt of God? threatening moreover, that in case he made no greater hast to certify the Comit's thereof, there was a greater judgment and plague toward, and that very near. Now was the thing more evident than before, and paid all paradventure. Howbeit he neglected and dave it off still, until he was himself overtaken with a grievous disease, and brought to great weakness in all his joints, then verified the wrath of the Gods taught him to be wiser, and being overwearied with harms past, and in fear of more presently to enlive, he conferred with his kinsfolk and friends to be advised by them. When he had declared unto them what he had seen and heard: namely, how Jupiter had so often appeared unto him in his sleep, and that the fearful displeasures and threatenings of the heavenly Gods were shewed plainly by sundry mishappenings fallen upon him: by the full content of all them that were about him, he was brought in a litter to the Comit's, into the Forum or common place, from whence by the Comit's commandment he was carried into the Concele of house. Where, when he had made report unto the Senators of the same things, to the exceeding wonder and admiration of them all, see another strange miracle: He that was brought into the Senate house a lame crippe of all his limbs, after he had once delivered his errand, returned home to his house (as it is recorded) found upon his feet. Hereupon the Senate decreed, that the Games should be set out as magnificently as could be devised.

To these solemnities referred, by the motion and persetting of Accius Tullius, a great number of Volscians. But before they were begun, Tullius according to the compolt between him and Martius at home, made a step or errand into the Concele of Rome, laying that he would willingly commit and treat with them apart, of important affairs concerning the State. When the room was clear, and every man gone, he began in this wise: "Loth I am (quoth he) if other wife I could chuse, to speak out but well of my country-men and fellow citizens. Yet come I" A. "not to complain of any action of theirs already past, but to give a caveat, and provide that "nothing be practised hereafter, th.e nature and disposition (I may tell you) of our people, is "too too inconsistent and unlayed, more I know than I would they were, a great deal: that have "we found and left to our great cost and manifold image, we lay who verify at this day by your "long inaction, and not by good desert of ours, do find in good terms and peace of war, to "There is now here a great multitude of Volsci, the Plays and Games ready to be represented "and celebrate, Your City will be wholly amused in the beholding thereof: I remember upon "the like occasion, what was sometimest enterprised and wrought in this City by the youth of the "Sabins: and my heart doth tremble and quake for fear, let them not as before, rash and foolish "part be played by ours: thus much, O ye Confils, I thought good in our behalf and yours both, "to give you notice of beforehand. As for me, I am minded presently to go from hence home, "left I being here seen, might be thought in some word or deed accasy into them, and incormable. Having made this speech he departed. When the Confils had declared in the Senate this thing so doubtful, and yet proceeding from the mouth of honour and certain an Author, beheld, the credit of the man (as commonly it is seen) rather than the likelihood of the matter, caused them to be weary and circumpect, yea, although there was no such need or caule at all. Whereupon the Senate made an Act, that the Volsci should be jogging out of the City. And divers cryers or Bedels were sent out: legy wayes, to command them to avoid and be packing before night. At the first, the Volsci were only much affrighted, and ran every man to and fro into his Inne to fetch away his things. But afterwards in the way homeward, they began to think more and more of it, and to grow melancholy: thinking it a great indignity, that like polluted and prosen persons, they should be driven from the Games, on festival holydays, discar'd (as a man would say) and excommunicate out of the company both of God and man. Thus as they went along all on, as it were in one continued and joynt train. Tullius (who was gone afore as far as the Frontine head,) received the formolt and chief of them, as every one came, and entertained them with complaints and words of indignation, and drew both them who willingly gave ear to his words of folly framed and tending to stir more coles, and also by their means the rest of the multitude into a plain field, lying hard under the high way fide. Unto whom assembled together as it were to hear a sermon, he thus began to speak: "Admit (quoth he) you could forget the old wrongs and abuses offered you by the people of Rome, the loaves and overthrow'er of the Volscian Nation: yea, and all the other quarrels whatsoever: how can ye put up this days spightful reproach and dishonor received at their hands? who to our great disgrace and shame, have begun their solemn Games? Perceived you not how they have triumphed over you to day? how as ye departed ye were a spectacle and pageant to all men, citizens and strangers, and to so many neighbour nations adjoyning? how your wives and children were brought as it were in a flock to see them sport and to laugh at: what conceit was in their heads (think ye) that heard the voice of the Bedel? what thought they that beheld you as you didslid: what imagined they that happened to meet this ignominious troop as they marched? Even this & no other, that there was some wicked design among us, not to be named, whereby we shoul'd be made captives, have E. stayed and polluted their games if we had been present at the fight of them, & have committed some haunous act, that would require by some satisfaction of justice to be purged? and for that cause we were disenfranchised having any conversation, fellowship, and society of good and godly men; and by that means how can ye chuse but think of this. That we enjoy our lives still, only because we hathen our removes, (if this may be called a remove, and not rather a plain taking of a flight and running away,) And yet ye reckon this no enemy City, where, if ye had stayed but one day longer, ye had dyed for it every one. Defiance is given already and yet denounced as a gainsay; but if ye be men indeed of courage, to their great cost and mischief, that have denounced it, Thus being of themselves kindled enough with indignation, and by these words enflamed and set on fire, they went every man his way from thence home: and so effectually solicited F. Each one the people where he dwelt that in fine the whole nation of the Volscians revolted and rebelled. To manage this war, were chosen General commanders by one consent of all the cities, Accius Tullius and Cr. Martius the banished Roman: in whom of the twain they reposeed greater hope and this their hope failed them not. So that it soon appeared that the puissance of the late of Rome confin'd more in the dexterity of good Captains, than in strong armies of foilliers. For first he went to Circius, from whence he espell'd the Roman Colonies, and delivered the City clear: and free unto the Volsci. Then by crois wayes he passed into the Latin fcrest, called Pidcello, Latins, and regain'd from the Romans, thine their Towns newly gotten afore, Saturnicis, Lepus-a, Petilia and Coritli. After this he went Lornovium again, and in forward he forc'd Cr. ho, C 20

Vetelia, Tribus Labiens, and Padanam. And left of all from Padanam, he march'd on toward the City of Rome, and at Cloanes, five miles off, he encamp'd and forrag'd the territory about, pressing with the forrarers certain guides, to keep them from loypling and doing harm in the Nolenners Landes. were it that he were more spightful to the Commons or that thereby some differnd might arise between the Commonalty and the Senators: which doubtles had done grown for mightly had the Tribus already by their complaints and accusations, provoked the Commons forward (who of themselves were flieth enough) against the heads and Magni-fates of the City, but that the fear of forrainers dangers, the greaet bond of civil concord that can be, held them in and knit their hearts together, were they never so jealous, suspected, H and hateful afore one to the other. Herein only was all their difference, that the Senate and Conuls, repose hope in nothing else save only in war: the Commons on the other side were desirous of any thing whatsoever, but war.

Now were S. Nautius, and Sex. Furius Conuls: who as they were farreying and murthering the legions, and disposing of a good Corporis de guard upon the walls, and other places wherein they thought it expedient to keep a standing watch and ward: behold a mighty number called and cried hard for peace, and with their detidious clamours put them in exceeding fear: yea, and afterwards forced them to assemble the Senate-house together, and to propone concerning the sending of certain Embassadors to Cn. Martius. The Lords of the Senate seeing evidently the commons I hearts to fail them, accepted and granted the motion propounded. Whereupon were Oratorious sent unto Martius to treat for peace. At whole hands they received this heavy and fruit answer:
"If so be the Volsciian had their Lands restored to them again, then there might be some parle and treaty of peace: but if they will needs at their pleasure still enjoy that bootie which by war they have gotten, then would he in remembrance of private wrongs done unto him by his country-men, as also of the friendship and courteasily shew him by strangers that had given him entertainment, do his best to make it known unto the World, that his courage and fame is incensed, and not abated or quailed by his banishment. Then were the same Embassadors sent again the second time but they might not be admitted once to feel foot within the camp. It is reported moreover that the very Priests in their Pontificilium, in their rich vestiments and goodly K ornaments, went with supplication to the tents of the enemies, and turned his heart no more than the Embassadors had done before them. Then the dames of the City came flocking all about Vetoria the Mother, and Volumnia the wife of Coriolanus. Whether this proceeded from any publick Counsel and was done in Policy, or came only of womens fear, I find but little in any records.
But howsoever it came about, this one thing is certain, they periowed so effectually with them, that both Victoria an aged woman, and also Volumnia with her two little sons that she had by Martius, went toward the enemies camp, to see if women by their prayers and tears, might move the City, which men with speare and shield could not defend. When they were come into the camp, and word brought to Coriolanus that there was an exceeding great train of women thisher arrived at the first, he as one that had relented, neither for that publick Majesty in the Embassa-dors, nor yet at the religious reverence, which he both conceived in mind, and saw with his eyes in the clergy, stood much more fittily bent against the tears of fifty women. But afterward one of his familiar friends, who had seen and known Victoria there, mourning and bewailing exceedingly above the rest, as the floor betwixt her daughter in law and her little Nephews: "If mine eyes be not matches (quoth he) and deceive me not, here is your mother, your wife, and children. Where-cat, Coriolanus, turning like a man well near beside himself, arose from his seat, and ran to meet his mother, and to embrace her. But the woman falling in heed of prayers into a fit of choler:
"Let me know (quoth she) before I suffer thee to embrace me, whether I am come to an enemy or to a son, whether I be in thy camp as a captiue prisoner, or as a natural mother. And have I lived indeed so long, and rubbed off still in this miserable old age of mine for this, to see thee first M a banished man, and after that to become an enemy? Couldst thou find in thine heart to waite and poilt that country which bred thee, which fostered thee, and brought thee up? And be it that thou hither marched with a cruel intent and full of threats, would not thine anger and fell wrath flake, when thou didst set foot within the borders and marches thereof? And being come within the sight of Rome, were not this in thy mind and thought. Within those walls yoner is my house, there are my house-gods, my mother, my wife, my children? Why then, beliefe I had never been a mother, and born a child, Rome had not been assaulted, and If I had no son at all. I might have died wel enough in my native countrey, while it remained free. But as for me, neither can I suffer ought, more for thy dishonesty and shame, nor more to mine own calamity and misery than this: and most wretched cattle though I be, yet long time to I N cannot continue, But for thee here, look thou well to it, I advise thee and have pity of them, who if thou go on as thou beginnest, are like to feel untimely death, or endure long captivity.
Then his wife and children hung about him, and clipped him: whereas the women fell a weeping on all sides, bewailing their own cafe and the state of their country. So as at length the man was overcome. And atter he had taken them in his arms likewise, he let them go; and himself d'fledged and removed his camp backward from the City. When he had withdrawn the legions out of the territorie of Rome, he gat him self, men said, such hared and displeasure for this action, that it colt him his life: and murdered him, was some report one way, some another. But I find in Furius a most ancient writer, that he lived untill he was an old man: who reporteth this of him: That oftentimes in his latter dayes he used to utter this speech: A heavy cafe and most O wrested for an aged man to live banished. The men of Rome enviied not these women their due deserved praies. So free was the world in those dayes, from depraving and detracting the glory of others. For in memorial hereof to all posterity, there was a Temple built and dedicated to Fortuna Matrelbris, i. Wemens fornune.
After all this, the Volsciians joyned the Aequians unto them, and returned into the territorie of Rome. But the Aequians would no longer abide Asina to be their Commander. And upon this A this title between the Volsci ans and Equins, whether of them should appoin t a General over the army raised joy ntly of them both; if it they grew to a mutiny and afterwards to a real battle. Such was the good fortune of the people of Rome, that two armies of their enemies, were thus by civil discord and contention, no less mortal than obstinate, overthrown and brought to naught. Confii then were C. Seminius and Q. Fabius. To Seminius were allotted the Volsci ans, and to Q. Fabius the Hernicks (who also were out and up in arms) for their federative Province. That year were the Hernicks: sma rt, but with the Volsci ans they fought to, as they departed on even hand, gaining and taking the like.

After them were C. Caesius, and Procclus Virginus made Consils. Then was there a league B concluded with the Hernicks, and two third parts of their Lands were taken from them. Whereof the one moiety, C. Seminius the Consil was minded to distribute among the Latins, the other among the Commoners. To this donation he laid too alter a good portion of ground, which being Commons by right, he found much fault, that it was in the tenure and possession of private persons. This act of his made divers of the Latins, namely, in h. h. as great landed men and interested therein, to flame for fear of hazarding their estate. Over and besides, the Senators all in general were in great perplexity, lest that the Consil by this largess should give rise by popular favour to such greatness, as might prejudice their tree hold yet and endanger the very main chance of public liberty. And this was the first time that the law Agraria was published: and so forward unto this present hour, it was never debated of, but with exceeding great airs and troubles of the State. The other Consil within and those largesses, with the general consent of the Senators, and without contradiction of any Commons: who at the very first began to militic, and utterly abo t that the donation was to common and from the natural citizens, extended to their allies and confederates. Moreover, they might oonetimes hear even the Consil himself Virginus, openly in his house on Orations before the people, to deliver by way of prophecy, and as it were to prognosticate, "That this was a great largess of his brother Consil, and that those grounds would in the end etruide the richer thereof, and that it was a very high way to set up a Kingdom again. For to make other inen (I pray you) were their allies, and the nation of the Latins affect to the same? To what people either, was a third part of the Lands won by conquest; again to the Hernicks effect d enemies but a while for, but that these nations might have..."

CQ. Ca si us to be such another Caesar of them, as Coriolanus was. And thus by dissing and crossing the law Agraria, he became now to be popular and gratifying the people. Then both Consils dri ven much, who might please and gratify the Commons most. Virginus, by giving out that he would maintain and infer the Lands to be divided, so they were assigned to none but to the citizens of Rome: Caesius again, who in the largesses of the Lands, seemed to Court and inflame himself with the allies and thereby was of the citizens left regarded and reputed to the end, that by some other benefit he might regain the hearts of his country men was of opinion, and made a motive, that the mony which was received for the Sicilian corn, should be repay ed unto the people. But the Commons refuted and abhorred that, as a very brute and ready bit for a Scepter and a Kingdom. So greatly were all his gifts, for the deep rooted suspicion and jealousy of his aspiring to a Kingdom, lost in the counsels of men, as if they had flowed in wealth, and been rich enough. And for certain it is recorded, that so soon as he left his Office, he was condemned and put to death. Some report, that his own father did the execution; and that upon examination privately had at home within his house, he finding him faulty, whipped him in, and so killed him, and conscripted the goods and chattels of his son, as a Deeds of Tower, whereof a Statue or Image was made, with this Inscription or Title, Giv en out of the house of Caesius. I find in some records (which founder nearer to the truth) that he was by the Quirites of Cai s Fabius, and L. Vedius, enatom of treatment, and being convicted, was by a verdict of the people condemned, and his house by order from the whole City, railed and pulled down. And at this day, it is the vovv yard that lieth before the Temple of Set. But how sooner he had his trial and judgement, privately or openly condemned he was when Sir. Cornelius and Q. Fabius were Consil. Long continued not the peoples angry and fight against Caesius. So sweet was the law Agraria in it fell, when the Mntor and Upho desirous of being out of the World, they long ed to have it on foot again. Which desire of theirs was the rather set on fire, through the pinching nigardie of the Senators, who having that year indulged the Volsci ans and Equins, kept the lojdards fasting, and defrauded them of the pool. For what prizes sooner were gotten from the enemies, the Consil E this told and brought into the Exchequer or Chamber of the City.

Now was the name of F his already adored to the Commonality, for the late Consil's take, yet obtained the Senators so much, and he'd their own son, as Cai Fabius was created Consil with L. æmilius. This made the Commone good the most and bent to mischief. And election at

C home caused war abroad, To rain war return'd it. Difficult for a whole. Both Senators and Commons with one accord, under the conduct of æmilius fought fortunately with the rebellious Volsci ans and Equins, and defeated them. Thus by more enemies perished in the chase, than were slain in the battle: to hourly the horsemans pursued them when they were once dis or- rinated and gave not over. The name was the Temple of Caesar consecrated in the Idea of Qua r iis. It had been voted also come in the Latin war by Pufhiumus the Dictator. Hision was created Dianum, for that purpose, and dedicated it, Temple of Cale-

C. The law Agraria last publish for the divil of waft lands among the Commons, St. Virginia z against the law Agraria.
This year also the Commons hearts were set upon the law Agraria, and longed after the H sweats thereunto. The Tribuns of the Commonalty and crediting their popular authority, with propounding a law as popular and acceptable to the people. But the senators supposing verily that the multitude was furious and outrageous enough, and too much of themselves, without any hire and reward, stood in dread and horror of these last efforts, as the very allurements and provocations, of thievery and heady threats, &c. The foremost champions of their side to withstand the law, were the consults. That part therefor and State of the City had the better hand, not only this present year, but for the next ensuing. For they chose M, Fabius Cæsus his brother, for the one consul, and L. V. Livius for the other, a man of the raven more odious in the eyes of the Commons, in regard of his late accalumation of Sp. Cæfius, in which year also there was strife and much ado with the Tribuns. But both law and law-makers with their gloriuous bragging and vaunting of their goodly donative, which they could not effect, proved vain and came to nothing. Upon this, the name of Fabius, who after three consulships together one after another, by them born continually without intemination, were inured and tried in the broils and contentions of tribuns, was in great regret and reputation: and in his honour and family remained till for a good while after, that dignity, as an honor well and worthily bestowed upon them, Then began the Veientian war, and the Volscians likewise rebelled. But for any wars abroad whatsoever, they had strength enough and to spare, if by jars at home among their own selves they had not abused the same.

Besides this disquietness and afflication of all men's minds, occasioned by these diffusions, there happened (to amend the matter well) prodigious, and strange tokens from Heaven, daily in a manner threatening both in City and Country the heavy hand of God. And when as the footthieves and wizards were sent out unto, to teach forth the cause of Gods wrath and indignation both in public and private, as well by inspection of the inwards of sacrificed beasts, as by aspect of birds and souls, they could assign it to nothing else but this, that there was some error committed in their sacrifices and divine libations. I hope fearful and prodigious signs proceeded till to far, that one Opitius a retailed Nun convicted and condemned of incest, suffered death.

After this, followed Q. Fabius and C. Tullius consuls, In which year the discord at home was nothing les and the war abroad far greater. For the Equians rose up in arms: the Veientians also entered the confines, and made much toil. And whiles they were more and more careful about these wars what order to take, Cæs Fabius and Sp. Furius, were made consuls. By this time the Equians assailed Artona a City in Latium. And the Veientians having sped themselves with prizes and booties, made great cracks that they would gi: an assault upon the very City of Rome. These fearful news, which ought to have abated and taken down the flames of the Commons, made them much more fierce and tell, and they returned of themselves unto their old bias of refusing war: but Sp. Licinius their tribune, thinking now the time was come to enforce upon the senators the law Agraria. upon this exigent and extreme point of necessity, had taken upon him to stop the levying and getting out of an army. But he drew upon his own head the whole hatred and displeasure of the Tribuns themselves and their authority. For the consuls opposed themselves against him no more bitterly than his own companions in office: by whose M affilation the consults went through with the Murder. And for two wars at once, there were enrolled two armies. The one under the leading of Fabius, against the Equians, the other, against the Veientians commanded by Furius. Against whom there was nothing done worthy of remembrance. As for Fabius, he had somewhat more to do with his own men than with his enemies. That man himself alone was he, that being consul upheld the Common-wealth, which his army for hatred of their Consul, had as much as in them lay, utterly betrayed. For when as he (above many other warlike feats and parts of a worthy General, whereof he shewed singular proof, both in preparation, and also in marching of the war) had so marshalled and ranged his battall, that with ending out the horsemen only, he disordered and brake the ranks of his enemies hotly: behold, the footmen would not follow on after that disarray: neither, when the exhortation of their leader whom they hated, prevailed not, could their own shame at least wise, and the public dishonor for the present; nor yet the imminent danger like to ensue (in case the enemy had taken heart again and made head) force them to amend their pace one jot, and make more speed. Neither could be possibly make them (if to do nothing else) in all march till in battery array: but still against his commandment they retire with their ensigns: and as men forsooth in their hearts and ill raptus, (that he had seen them would have said they had lost the field) cursing their General one while, and the valiant service of the horsemen another while, they return to their tents. Neither wilt the General what way to remedy this to pestilence an example and dangerous precedent. Thus we may see, that brave men, of singular and excellent wits, have been more to seek and fail in their skill, how to govern a subject than to vanquish an enemy. The Consul returneth to Rome, having purchased more hatred of his froward and stubborn foillers, than won honor by his martial prowess. Nevertheless, the Senatores prevailed so much that the Consulship kept residence till in the name of the Fabius. So, they created M. Fabius Consul, and join with him Cn. Markus for his colleague.

This year likewise, had one patro e and maintainer of the law Agraria, to wit. Tiberius Poustificins a Tribune. He taking the same course, and following the steps of Sp. Licinius, hindered the
A the mutters for a while. And when the Senators were herewith disquieted again, then Ap. Clodius rose up and said, "That the year before, the Tribunes power was overmastered, and the neck of it broken in proof, only for that precedent, but in example for ever hereafter: for such as it was well seen then by experience, that of it fell even among their own selves it fell spicies; and never will there want at any time one good Tribune or other, that would be glad to get the hurt and victory of his fellow, and, the favour also of the better part for to purchase the good of the publick. And that there would be more Tribunes, if more were needful, ready to afflit the Consuls: and if there were but one, even that one were sufficient to find against all the rest, So that the Consuls and LL of the Council; would but do their endeavour, to B win unto the State and Senate, some certain of the Tribunes, if they might not compacts all, The Senators being thus schooled and taught their lessons by Appius, both all ingeners would courteously fail and friendly intreat the Tribunes, and also in particular as many of them as had been Consuls, according to that interest that each man had in any one of them privately, partly by favour and friendship, and partly by countenance and authority, prevailed so with them, that they were willing and well consent to employ the Tribunes authority to the good and safety of the Common-wealth. So by the help of four Tribunes, against one that hindered the good of all, the Consuls took muster of the fouldiers. Then let they forward on their voyage to war with the Veientians: unto whom from all parts of Histria, they came to aid and succour; not so much for any love that they bare to the Veientians, as in hope that the punifhament of Rome C through intellence and civil disaffection, would decay and come to nought. For in all the Dics and Assemblies of the States of Histria, the Princes and Peers gave it out and said, That the power and greatness of the Romans was ever-lasting, if through mutual discord they were not in among them selves: which had been found the only base or weathy and flourishing Cities, where mghty Empires became mortall and subject to a small end. "Which micht hie (by "they) this long time hath been prevented and delayed, partly through the fadge and prudent government of the Senate, partly by the patience and long humour of the Commons: but now they are come to a great extremity. Divided they are, and of one City become twain; each part have their severall Magistrates and laws by themselves. At the first, however they were went to be at odds, and to fall out at the mulling of foulards; yet in war they would hold together and obey their Captains. Howsoever they fared at home in the City, were the D State nether so far out of order, yet so long as martiall discipline was on foot and took place, they might be reformed, and all troubles laid. But now, the former use and customes of disobeiyng Magistrates within the City, is taken up by the Roman foulards in the very Camp. For no longer since the last war of all, in the time of battle and conflict, their whole Army agreed of their own accord, nor forced by any extremity that they were put unto, for to give the Veien sians, as much as in them lay, even after they had lost the field, the entire victory and honour of the day. For they abandoned their enimies, left their Generals alone in the skirmish, and against his will retired themselves into the Camp. And furthermore, if they hold on still this course, Rome may be won by means of her own fouldiers: there needs no more to do, but to proclaim E and make them over war: For even the very defeated and gods themselves would perform all the rest. Upon these hopes and deep perditions, the Tuscanians, who afore were wont other whiles to have the better and sometimes to take the worse in their wars put themselves in arms.
The Roman Consuls likewise were in fear of nothing else so much, as of their own power; their own force and weapons: being affrighted at the remembrance of that foul and shame-full example, and that few part paid in the last war: lest peradventure they should put upon this point of hazard, as to be in danger of two battall at once. And therefore into doubtfull and perilous a case, they held off fight, and kept themselves within their Camp, till haply time and space would effluve their anger, bring them into the right way again, and reclame them to good and reasonable order. The enemies hereat, as well VEientians as the other Tuscanians, made F the greater haufe, and were more sharp let, and provoked them to the field: fir'd by riding up and down before their Camp, hard at the gates thereof, bravely and challenging them forth, at the lait, seeing they could not prevail, they fell to eating and taking one while upon the Consuls themselves: another while upon the whole Army. in these and such like terms: "A gay matter indeed, and a proper device to save their cowardice, and under a colour of civil dissention to cloak their fearingness and the Consuls forsooth militrily more the faithfulness and loyalty of their fouldi ers in service, than they doubted their valour and sufficiency of service. Mary, here is indeed a new kind of mutiny. What? Armed men to hold their peace, and sit still? Hitting them in their feet besides, with their new start-up rising and late springe battle beginning letting fly against them lies and truths one with another, and spared not. For all this foule flir they kept, stuffing and G reviling them under their very trench, and hard at their gates, the Consuls themselves were not one jot troubled, but the foolish and ignorant multitude what with anger, and what for theme of these reproachfull terms, was much discomposed. and one whiles wholly gave over to reg and think upon home troubles and dissensions, and had rather their lives be revenged of their en emies: Anon again they would not in any case prurge the Nobles and Consuls, nor with them good fouldiers. Thus the hatred both against the enemies without, and the Consuls within drove in together in their hearts: until a length forraine occasions got the malady over them: so proudly,

to insolently the enemy scorned and made a game of them. Whereupon they came thick by troops to the General pavilion, calling upon them to fight, requiring to put forth the banner and signal of battle. The Consuls laid their heads together and as taking good advice, conferred on the matter a great while. To fight they were most willing and desirous: but this desire was to be kept back and dissuaded and thereby augmented: to the end that by holding off, by opposing themselves, and making some play, they might let the foanders on and being once set on it, they might make them follow more eagerly at once. In conclusion, this answer was returned unto them: That they made too much haste: it was not yet full ripe, nor the time come, to give battle: they must hold themselves contented and keep within their tents: proclaiming moreover, that no man be so hardy as to fight: and whosoever attempted it without their warrant of commission, they would proceed against him with all rigor as a professed enemy. Thus were they dissuaded. And the less willing they thought the Consuls were, the more eager were they, and set upon a battle. The enemies besides, when they had intelligence that the Consuls were not disposed to fight, and had taken order to the contrary, were kindled and inflamed to much the more. For now they supposed they might brace it, and inflit upon them falsely without danger. For why? The Consuls durst not trust the foanders with weapon in hand: now were their mutinies come to the height and to break forth in extremities: now and never before the Roman Empire and Dominion was at an end. Prentending confidently upon this ground they ran together into the gates, redoubling a thousand villanous and opprobrious terms, and much ado they had to forbear at first faulting the camp. Now could the Romans on the other side hold no longer & endure this contumely and indignity but came running from all parts of the camp unto the Consuls. And now not leisurely as before, make they request, and by mediation of their chief centurions but all at once on every side pour them with pite and clamours. Now was the matter come to ripeness, yet how were the Consuls and hold off. Then Fabius, seeing the tumult in reality & that for fear of a mutiny his brother Consul had yielded already, said: let us to be made by sound of trumpet and thus he spake: I know full well O Mucius, that these fellows are able to win the victory: but that they will do I know not, and they themselves have asked me to doubt. I have therefore let down my regard & firmly resolved not to give the signal of battle, let us swear to retake out of the field with victory. Once did the soanders in battle decree a Coll. of Rome: but the gods in heaven shall not decide. Then M. Flamininus a Centurion, one of the foremost that called for battle to instantly, Return will I (quoth he) O M. En ans. A victor out of the field: and if I fail then I beheve father Jupiter Mars & all other gods to make me a full example and shew their wrath full displeasure upon me. The same oath after him took the whole army, even very man against himself. Thus when they had sworn in the trumpet sounded. Then buckled they themselves toward battle, full of anger full of hope. Now they bid the Tuscan revile and rail their fill: now being at all points armed, they wished they had afore them men to man their enemies, those that were so lively and lusty with their tongues. Right valiantly bare themselves that day as well the Commons as the Nobles, but the name of the Fabius the Fabius lay past all the rest and won the spurs. Who in this piece of service purposed to gain again the hearts of the Commons, with whom in many civil contentions were set against them, and to do them embattled themselves. The enemies likewise both the Venetians and also the Tuscan legions were nothing behind, as making almost fire reckoning that they should be fought within no more than the Aquilans had been. Nay they were in hope of some greater disorder amongst them, and that considering that they were no content and the occasion of ought they would play a more shameful part, and shew them their leaders a base and not. But it fell out for otherwise. For never in any other war before, gave the Romans a hotter charge upon the enemies: so much had they of the one side with spitful tails and reproaches nestled them, and the Consuls on the other side with their long delays when they were, Scare had the Tuscan any time to put themselves in battle array but at the very first encounter and the casting their javelins carefully from them (I know not how) rather than levelling and charging them against the enemy, they came presently pell-mell to hand-strokes, and to deal with their swords, which is the cruellest fight of all other. The Fabius among the foremost in the forefront fought valiantly, shewing their companions a brave fight, and a noble example to follow. Where Q. Fabius who had been Consul the third year before, the leader and foremost of them all while he advanced himself and rushed amongst the thick of the Venetians and stultified with many of them together was not aware of his deadly enemy so near: but beheld a certain Tuscan, a mighty man of strength and skillfull at his weapon, ran him through the breast with his sword, which was not so soon drawn forth of his body, but Fabius fell down headlong upon his wound and died. Both armies felt the fall of that one man: and therewith the Romans retired. With that M. Fabius the Consul leaped over his body as it lay along, and holding forth his target between: Why, foanders (quoth he) is the oath ye took to march away and retire thus into the Camp? And are ye more afraid indeed, of these most dastardly enemies, than of justice and Mars, by whom ye swore? But I, who was not sworn at all, will either make return with victory, or else O Q. Fabius, fighting here by thee I will live and die by thy side. To whom, Cæs Fabius, who the year before was Consul replied again: Think ye brother, with those words to make them to fight? Nay, the gods are they that must do it, by whom they have sworn, And let us like noble Knights, and for the honour of the Fabian house...
The Second Book of T. Livius.

A. "Till up and animate our soldiery by fighting rather than by exhorting. Thus rode the two Fabii with lance in left into the forefront, and drew the whole battalion with them. The fight of one side being thus renewed, Cn. Marullus the Consil in the other wing betirrled himself, and did for his part as valiantly: Where heaped almost the like fortune. For as in the one wing the soldiery followed Q. Fabius, so in this they cheerfully went with the Consil himsell\footnote{S hunts the Consil himself, and so were they that he had defeated the other point, was ready with victory to affist them, and so upheld the middle of the Army, that now began to shrink.}, changing the enemies arose there as sitcombted. And when he was sore wounded, and therupon gone out of the battel, his men opposing him to be slain, drew back, and had indeed lost ground and given way to the enemy, but that the other Consil with certain Cornets of horsemen, sallied again into that quarter, and cried aloud that his fellow Consil was living: and that he had before defeated the other point, was ready with victory to assist them, and so upheld the middle of the Army, that now began to shrink.

B. "Thus knowledge and presence of the two Consils made the soldiery take heart after. Here withall besides, were the enemies battalions the thinner and weaker, because they trailing upon their exceeding number, had drawn out those that were to serve for succour and supply, and lent them way to affist the Camp. In the suripping whereof, finding no great ado and small resistance, whilsts they had more mind to ride for pallage, than to fight for the victory, they lost time. In the mean time the Roman Tufcans, who were notable to hold out the first allait and entrance, having dispatched to the Consils certain messengers, to give knowledge in what terms they stood, call themselves round in a ring, and retired themselves to the Praetorium or Generals lodging, and of themselves alone, made head and renewed the fight. Likewise Marullus the Consil being ridden back to the Camp, at every gate for certain soldiery in guard: and so enclosed them within, that they could not get forth. The Tufcans being in this desperate case, lared more like mad men than orderly soldiery. For when as they ran here and there every way, according as they had any hope to find out line and to escape, and had made fundy offers and attempts in vain: behold one troup of tall fellows in a body, made no more ado, but knowing the Consil, who by reason of brave and goodly armure was a fair mark charged upon his own person. The first volley of their shot was received by those that stood about him, but their violence afterwards could not be endured. The Consil himself was wounded to death, and fell down in the place, and all the rest were decommited. Whereupon the Tufcans took more heart unto them, but the Romans were so dishearted that they ran all about the Camp in great fear. And in extremity jeopardy had they been but that the Lieutenants caught up the Consil body, and made pallage at one gate for the enemy. Through which they rushed forth, and dismarched disorderly, until they light upon the other Consil, and then the Consil himself: Where they either fell again upon the edge of the sword, or were scattered and put to flight. This brave Victory thus atchieved, was heavy yet and forsworn for the death of two noble personages. And therefore when the Senate had decreed a Triumph, the Consil returned this answer: 'That willingly he allowed thereof in regard of the pilling good service performed in that war, in case an Army might triumph without a General. But as for himself, seeing that his house grieved and mourned for the death of his brother Q. Fabius, and that the".

C. "Common-wealth was half fatherless as it were, for the loss of a Consil, he would not accept the Lawrel to deformed and fouily blemished both with publicke and private forrow. This Triumph thus by him related, was more honourable than all the Triumphs in the world, by which we may see that glory defiled in due time returneth otherwheres in greater measure. Then legemized he with great honour the obelques one after another, first of his fellow Consil, and then of his own brother. And he himself made the funeral Orations for them both. But so as in yielding unto them their due commendations, he went himself away with the greater part, and not unmindfull of that rule which he had learned in the beginning of the Consilship, to win again the hearts and love of the Commons, he divided the care of his hurt and wounded soldiery among the Senators. With most of them the Fabii were charged, and of".

D. "None were they better tended and looked unto than of them. Whereupon the Fabii now waxed popular, and that, for no other policy and intent, but only to do the Common-wealth good: and therefore with the favour and good will of the Commons, as well as of the Nobles, Cn. Fabius was created Consil with T. Volumnius: Who principal care above all was this even before war, before mullers, before all things else, that seeing now in some measure there was good hope of concord begun already, the hearts of the Commons might be perfectly linked and united together with the Nobles and that, with all speed possible. In the beginning therefore of this year, before that any Tribune of the Commons should prefer the law Agrimenius, he thought good and gave his advice, that the Nobles should prevent all, and go in hand first themselves to perform their part, and drew their bounty namely, in purging the lands gotten by conquest, and freely bestowing the fame as equally as might be among the Commons. For it was meet and requisite that they should be possessed thereof, whose spirit of bowes, ray, whose blood had paid for the purchase. But the Senators could not hear of that ear, but milkified of the motion: ye, and some of them complied and said, that the lively spirit and couragious disposition of Cnus, which sometimes he had, was now by reason of excessive glory, grown to be toyfull and full of vanities. And there an end of civil faction for a time.

was Cæsars with an Army in their, who invaded and overran the very country of the Equians, forra-£ ging and spoiling as he went. The Equians thereupon retired, & put themselves into their towns, and kept close within the walls, whereby there was no memorable field fought. But at their enemies the Veientians, they received an overthow, and that through the rashness of the other Comitii: and had not Cæsars Fabius come to the rescue in good time, the whole Army had been utterly lost. From that time there was neither war nor peace with the Veientians: but their dealing was such what after the manner of robbing. For when the Roman Legions were abroad, they would leave the field: & take to their Cities; when they perceived the Legions were removed and gone, they would make excursions and waste the country. Thus they paid them mock-holiday, and dallied with them, shifting off war with quietness, and quietness again with war, by turns. So as the Romans could neither all wholly ret reft careless & secure for them, nor yet go through-fitch, & make an end once for all with them. Besides, other wars were either presently at hand, or war, from the Equians and the Volsci, who could no longer fit still, than until their fresh grief, and pain of the last defeat was over-pall'd or else the Sabins, never other but enemies, yea, and all Haurisci, were all like all shortly to rise and take arms. But the Veientian a continual enemy, rather than dangerous provoked them to anger with reproachful taunts, other than with any great peril or hurt. And yet as little as it was, it might not time be neglected, nor gave them leave to be employed in the mean while elsewhere. Then came the whole house and kindred of the Fabii unto the Senat, in whose name all alike the Conflui in this wise: "My Lords of the Senate, the Veientian war had need rather of a resident garrison, as ye know well enough, to keep the territories, than great forces for expedition. As for ye see to other wars. Let the Fabii alone to deal with private enemies with the Veientians. We dare undertake and warrant, that the State of Rome shall receive no dishonour nor danger there. We are fully minded and resolved at our own proper cost and charges, to maintain and managethat war, as appropriate and peculiar to our name and family: the City shall be charged neither with men nor money there. Great thanks were given them for this their forwardness. The Comitii being come out of the Senate house, was attended home with the whole generation of the Fabii who stood at the porches of the Council Court, expecting the Senat's decree. And being commanded to be ready in armor well appointed the next day, and to give attendance at the Comitii's door, they departed from thence home to their own houses. The brut heerof spread all over the City, All men extoll the Fabii up to the skie, saying, That one family had taken upon them the whole burden of the City. The Veientian war now is become (say they) a private charge, and requirith the power and force onely that private persons could make. O that there were such families more in Rome of that stomack and valour: that one of them might take the Volsci in hand, and another the Equians, Surely all the nations bordering hereabout might soon be subdued, and the people of Rome first fill the whie and rest in peace. The day following, the Fabii armed themselves, mounted on horseback, and repaired to the Rondium aloof the wall, as they were commanded. Then came the Conflui forth, clad in rich coat of arms, and standing in his porches, beheld his whole blood and lineage armed and marshalled in order, and being received in the midst of them, confed the guidons and Cornets to be advanced. Never marched three along the City an Army either less in number or more renowned for their fame and the admiration of men. Three hundred men of arms they were; and six all nobly defended, of one flock, of one race and name all. And of all them there was not one that a lige and prudent Senate would have relented at any time as insufficient to be a Leader and Commander in the field. Thus furnished with the force and strength that one only Family could make, they advanced forward, threatening and menacing the ruin and destruction of the Veientians. There followed a number and multitude of Citizens: one private company by themselves of kinsfolk, allies, friends, and fellows, calling in their minds no mean matters, neither of hope nor fear, but all exceeding measure and surpassing another of the common people, moved with a careful regard, and anonied again in a favourable applause and admiration of their enterprize, crying with one voice, Hold on right valiant Knights, March on a Gods name in happy hours: God grant lucky speed, answerable to your magnificent attempts and declensions: and look for, at our hands from henceforth, Comitii, triumphs all rewards and honourable dignities whatsoever. And all the way as they passed along the Capitol, the Capitol, and other Temples there they behoght the gods, as many as were present to their eye, as many as they could conceiue in their minds, to vouchsafe that equadron to be attended upon with good successe and fortunate felicity, and soon to return home again in faety to their native country and loving parents. But alas the while, in vain were all these prayers made. Then set they forward on their journey leaving Jus Church on their right hand, taking the ingrations and unlucky way, from the gate Carmentalis, until at length they came to the rivet Cremera, That was thought a convenient place to forctifie in, and there to plant a garri-

Felia or Voice.
A power out of Hecatricia, and assaulted the fort of Cremora, and also the Roman Legions, under the conduct of L. Aemilius, encountered the Tuscanians in open field. And yet the Tuscanians had hardly time enough to put their files in order of battle: so suddenly at the very first skirmish, whiles the files were entering into array under their colours in the vanguard, and the inco-cours and dressing a paling and disposing in the rearward, a Comet of Roman horse charged them to body on the flank, that they had not room and space either to begin fight, or to keep their landing lute. Thus were they discomfited, and chased back as far as Sacrambra, i.e. Red rocks (for there they were encamped) where they humbly craved peace. Which when they had obtained (see their inbred inconstancy to naturally engraved) they were weary of it, and repented thereof,

But after the Roman garrison could be withdrawn from Cremora. And to the Fabii once again skirmished with the Venetian Nation, without preparation of greater war. Neither made they inroads only, and sudden violent invasions into the Territories but sundry times they encountered with banners displayed, and joined battle in plain field. And that one house and kindred of the Roman people carried oftentimes the victory away from that most mighty and rich City (in those dales) of all the Tuscanians. This took the Venetians at the first for a foul disgrace and indignity, but after wards they devised to lay trains, as occasion should serve, and entrap their fierce and hardy enemy: and well apace they were and rejoiced, that the Fabii upon the good success that still followed them, were become more bold and venturous. And therefore divers times when the Romans were abroad a plundering, they would drive carrel in their way but yet so, as they might seem to light upon them by chance. The rustic peasants made flee as if they fled out of the Country, and left the fields waste: yeas and the companies of soldiers went out to restrain and fly their spoilage, made shew of running away, pretending oftener they were afraid than they had cast indeed. So as now the Fabii by this time set to light by their enemies, and thought so well of themselves, that they believed verily their power was invincible, and might not be withstood in any ground, or at any time what soever. This conceit and hope of theirs let them so aloof, and made them so bold, that espying upon a time carrel far from Cremora (for there was a large plain between) although here and there they might desry armed londiers of their enemies, yet from their fort they ran down with bridge in their horse neck. And when unadvisedly without forethought, they were past the ambusc, which was laid covertly about the very way that they were to pafs, and were strafing here and there disorderly, driving the carrel away, which gadded in and out, and as their manner is when they becast and affrighted, then suddenly start the enemies all at one once out of the ambuscment: so as both before and behind and on every side they were beleal and enworned with enemies. At the first the very houting and outcry they made round about terrified them: afterwards flew their shof from all sides. And as the Tuscanians gathered themselves together, the Fabii were soon hemmed within a round battallion of enemies, hasting armed thick and close one to another: and the nearer the enemies approached about them, in so much less room were they enforced also to cast themselves into a ring, Which, considering their arrayes were thrust to thick together in so straight a compas, made their small number appear the less, and the multitude of the Tuscanians to carry a greater shew. Then forbearing to fight as they first intendent, on every hand alike, and with all at once, they made head to one only place. Thereto they endeavoured with might and main, body and armours; and with a pointed pavelt wedgewise pierced through and made themselves paffage. And they took the way that led to a little hill, riising up with an easy ascent. From whence at first they made resistance only and kept their ground: but soon after, when by reason of the vantage of the hill, they had some time to breath themselves, and to take heart again after to great a fright, they forced the enemies also to give back that were mounting up the hill. And as few in number as they were yet by the benefit of the ground they had gotten the better if the Venetians had not for a compas about the hill side, and gained the very top and pitch thereof. Thus became the enemy again to have the upper hand. And fo were the Fabii slain every man, and not one of them escaped, yea, and their fort overthrown and rated. Three hundred and fix there were that died, as all writers doe agree. One only of the name was left behind at home, well near fourteen years after to renew and enreafce, as out of the Rock, the name of the Fabii, and to prove in time to come the greatest prop and pillar that the people of Rome should have in their dangers and extremities many a time both at home and abroad.

But ere this heavy loss and overthrow happened, C. Horatius and T. Mencius were Confuls. Mencius was sent forthwith against the Tuscanians puffing now up with pride for this their vicitory: with whom then also he forgot unfortunately and sped but ill. For the enemies surprized and got the Municulum, and the City and sorely were besieged, (considering that besides war they were greatly distressed for want of victuals, for the Tuscanians were passed over the Tyber but that Horatius the Confus was called home from the Volscians. And so near approached the enemies in this war and press'd to the very walls, that first there was a skirmish on even hand at the Temple of Spes: and another again at the gate Collina. Where albeit the Romans got but very small profit of the enemy, yet did that conflict upon a little recovery of wounded courage prepare the found driers to better service in the battles ensuing.

Now were A. Virginius and Sp. Serviliius created Confuls. The Venetians after this late defeat, came no more into the field, yet they robbed and waffled still, and from the Janiculum as from
from a fortress and place of safe retreat, they would make excursions out into the Territory of Rome, all about, and neither cartel nor country people could any where be in safety for them. But afterwards, they were overtaken themselves in the same vile that they had caught the Fabii with, for as they followed after certain cartel, which were driven forth here and there of purpose to draw and train them abroad, they were plunged themselves headlong into an Ambuscado laid for them, and the more they were, the greater was their slaughter. Upon this foil, their cruel and fell anger gave the occasion and overture of a greater overthrow. For having crossed the Tyber in the night season, they gave the attempt to make an assault upon the Camp of the Consul Servilius, but being discomfited, and many of them slain the rest retired themselves from thence, and with much ado recovered the jniucle. Straight after this, the Consul also passed over Tyber, and encamped himself strongly under the Janiculum. The morrow morning by sun rising, to venous, he was by reason of his fortunate flight the day before, and more for the scarcity of corn and victuals, which drove him to take heed not how rash and dangerous courses, so they tended to more quick and speedy expedition; full fondly he advanced forward, and marched up the steep hill of the jniucle, and charged the enemies bold; but being set back himself from thence more shamefully than he had the day before repelled the enemies; yet by occasion that his fellow Consul came in the while to refuce, he and his Army both were faced: and the Tuscan encloseted between both holts, were forced to turn their backs both to one and the other, and were killed every mothers son. Thus by a rash enterprise (which as good luck was) sped well, the Veientian war came to an end; the City then, as it enjoyed peace, so it came again to be better stored of corn and victual; both for that there was some grain brought out of Campus, and also because the old store that was hoarded up came abroad, by reason that no man now stood in fear of death to eneine.

Afterwards upon plenty and ease they began to be bold again, and their heads to work, seeking to broach old troubles at home, since they had none to occupy them abroad. The Tribunes they fell to solicitate and infect the Commons, with their venome and payson, the Law Agraria; inciting them against the Nobles that gain sd it: not in general terms only, but also by touching particular persons. For Q. Confidius and T. Geminius, who were for the Law Agraria, framed an indenture, and sued T. Memnius. And this was laid to his charge, to wit, the loss of the fort and garrison at Cremera; for that, he being Consul lay encamped not far from thence. But of this danger he soon stopped the course, both because the Nobles laboured and took his part, no less than they had done afore for Coriolanus: and also the affection and favour that men bare to his father Agrippa, was not worn out, and cleared. The Tribunes sued moderation therefore in the penalty, or having commenced a capital action against him, and convicted him thereof, they set a fine on his head of 10000 Aes. Howbeit this cost him: he: for he grew, men say, in to such a melancholy fit for shame of this disgrace, that he fell thenceupon from grief of heart upon a pining sickness which followed him to his dying day. Then was there another accused and brought into trouble to wit, S. Servil ius. So soon as he was out of his Consulship at what time as C. Numius, and P. Valerius were Consuls. In the beginning of whose year the Tribunes L. Catulus and T. Statius, called him straightway to his answer. Who assigned the violence of the M. Memnius to Memnius did, by his own intreaty and the prayers of the Nobles. But bare himself confidently upon his own innocency, and the good grace wherein his flood, Blamed he was likewise, and charged for the battel with the Tuscan at Janiculum. But being a man of an hot spirit and stout courage, as he carried himself before in the publice danger, so now in his own private peril, by resorting in a bold and stout speech that he made, not only the Tribunes, but also the Commonalty, and calling in their teeth and reproving them, for the condemnation and death of T. Memnius, by whose fathers means the Consul being in times past restored, had obtained first those very Magistrates and Laws, whereby at this day they execute such rigour: he went through all his troubles, and with much boldness avoided the present jeopardy he flood in. The testimony of his Colleague Verginius blood him in great head, who produced forth as a witness, N. Memnius himself, to him with himself in all his worthy acts. But that process of judgment which passed against Memnius (so altered were they now, and repented therefore) did him much more good, and struck it dead sure.

When this broil and contention was ended at home, the Veientians began abroad: to whom the Sabins also had joined their power. Whereupon the Consul P. Valerius, with the aid of the Latins and Hernicks, was sent out with an Army to Visii: and incessantly he set upon the tents of the Sabins, as they lay encamped under the walls of their confederates, and put such a terror among them, that while they ran forth scattering by bands and companies, some at one gate, some at another, to repel the violent assault of the enemies, he happened that the gare which he first advanced his signs against, was won. And within the tent small fire there was, but much man-slaughter. The tumult and noise hereof was heard from out of the Camp into the City, and the Veientians in great fear ran hasty to their weapons, as if Visii had been surprised. Some make speed to succour the Sabins; others do what they can to affright the Romans, who were wholly troubled about the pilage of the Camp. For a pretty while they were put to some trouble, disordered, and withdrawn from their purpose: but afterwards they themselves advanced their banners, and made head against the one side and the other. The horsemen withall, set in by the Coff A brake the Tuscans array, and put them to flight. And thus in one hour two armies were disabled, two most puissant nations, and nearest neighbours to the Romans vanquished.

While these exploits were performed about Veii, the Volscians and Equians had encamped themselves in the Country of Latium, and harassed the marches thereof. When the Latins of themselves, with the help only of the Hernikes, and without any Lictor or aid at all from the Romans, forced to abandon their tents; and besides the recovery of their own goods again, atchieved a great and rich booty. Notwithstanding all this, the Consul Naevius was sent from Rome against the Volscians. They were not well pleased; I believe, with the manner of it, that their allies should wage war at all with their own power and direction, without the Army and conduct of the Romans. He spared not to work all the mischief he could, all abuse and spite possible against the Volscians; yet could not they be brought to fight a set field. Then succeeded L. Furius and C. Marcius, Conuls. To Marcius fell the charge of the Veientian Province, howbeit, there was none at all. But at their own suit, a truce was granted unto them of forty years. And they were enabled to find corn and victualers pay. Peace was not so soon procured abroad, but presently enuied difcord at home. For at the imitigation of the Tribunes, by occasion of the Law Agricola, the Commons were set a madding. But the Consuls shared neither with the condemnation of Marcus, nor yet with the peril wherein Servilius stood, relit all they could. And when the Consuls were once out of their Office, Servilius a Tribune laid hold upon them, and arrested them: and L. Eumius with Opiter Virginins enter their Conulship. In some Annals or yearly records I find Pop Scure Julius Conul instead of Virginins. But in this year, whatsoever they were Conuls, Furius and Marcius being indicted before the people, were thrown in jail at a very and most cruel weed to the younger sort of Senators, as well as the Commons perceiving, despairing, and warning them to forbear and refuse all dignities and offices of state, yea, and all charge of the Common-wealth. And as for the Commons they rose some them, their purified robes with purple, and chair of state, they shewd no otherwise of them than of the pagans carried in a funeral pomp. And that with these gorgeous ornaments and signes they were but defined to death: much like to beasts adorned with sacred white ribbons and labels, appointed to sacrifice, but if the sweetnefs of a Conulship were such, let them consider now what, and persuade themselves, that it is become private and overwrought with the power of the Tribunes: and that the Conul, as it were the Tribunes serjeant; must do all on his beck and command. For if he quetted neuer so little, if he seemed to regard the Senators, or make account of anything else in the whole State but of the Commonality, let him set before his eyes the exile of Conuls, the judgement and death of Marcus. The Nobles incensed with their speeches, from thenceforth began to consult and confer together, not openly and in publicke council, but privately, and apart from the privity of many. And when they were resolved once upon this point, that those accused parties now in trouble should be enlarged one way or other, by hook or crook: then the cruellest advice, and harddest course that could be delivered but pleased them and for to put in execution the most audacious defignations whatsoever, there wanted not one or other to give counsel. Well the law day of trial came, and when as the Commons gave attendance devoutly in the Forum, in great expectations of the sequel and issue, they began at first to marvel much, that the Tribunus Servilius came not down in place: and suspecting somewhat because of his long carrying & delay, they imagined that he durst not for the great men and chief Magistrates of the City: and so they complained that the common cause was forlorn and betrayed. At the last, they that kept about the door & porch of the Tribune his house, brought word that he was found at home feckerd, which news being once notifed through the assembly, mark how an Army is dispersed and scattered when their General is slaine, even so, in all the world the Commons fled and every one some one way some other. But above all others the Tribunes were in body near being thus by their fellow taught how little help or none at all, their lacred and redoubted Laws afforded. The Nobles could not dissimile his their joy, nor use it with moderation but threw it excellingly and so little reported any one of them of the last committed, that they avowed it, and took it upon them, and would not seem culpable in the action; but gave it out in plain terms, that the Tribunes by foul means were to be tamed & their wings clipped in a trice. Upon this their victory, so shameful a precedent in times to come there went out an edict for the publishing of a muste: and whiles the Tribunes were in this scare danced the Conuls: without any contradiction, went through with it clear. But then were the Commons much more offended at their Tribunes: first and last, till then at the Conuls rule and imperious government lying. Farewell freedom now, farewell libertories and all: now is the old world come again, and the Tribunes authority is both dead and buried together with Servilius. Now they were to go in hand and back themselves, of other cause, how they might withstand the Senators proceedings: and seeing they were destitute of all other help to rely themselves upon. the only way was for the Commons to trull to themselves, & stand upon their own guard. Whereas therefore, there gave attendance upon the Conuls Lucius Furius and Vergines, Commons all and no better, none more contemptible and base minded, if they met with those that would set them at naught: they might thank themselves only, and their own timorous conceits & imaginations, that such things were so dread and terrible, thus having animated & provoked another with these speeches there was a Sergeant lent from the Commons to one Publius a Comonner, who because he had been been a Leader in the field of certain bands; pleaded his immunity for being a common foudier. A gain, Volero calletth for help to the Tribunes: but there being no man to refute him, the Consuls commanded the man to be left out of his cloaths, and the rods to be made ready to scourge him. Then quoth Volero, "I appeal unto the people, seeing the Tribunes had rather have a Citizen and freeman of Rome beaten with rods in their presence, than be murdered themselves by you in their beds. But the more fiercely he cried on, the more cruelly fell the Lictor to cut and flie his apperell for to uncaine him. Then Volero being himself the stronger man, and affifted with all by some whom he called unto him, thrust the Sergeant from him: and where he perceived the maines out-cry and loudest noise of his adherents, that turned and chas'd in his behalf, thither retired he, to shroud himself among the thickest, crying: "I appeal and beseech the I Commons of their protection and succour. Help Citizens, help fellow-soudiers. Never lay and wait for the Tribunes until they come, who have themselves need of your assistance. Here-at folk were raised and gathered together, and addressed themselves as to a Battel. A foul piece of work was toward, full of exceeding danger, and like it was, that no man would have had regard either of common law or private honesty. When the Consuls in this so great a broil and form of outrage came in, to prevent further mischief, they knew soon by experience how flenderly guarded against danger, the Majesty of Rulers is, where force is wanting. For their Lictors were beaten, mangled, and ill increas'd, their rods broken all a pieces, themselves driven out of the Common place, and forced to take the Senate house, doubting how far forth Volero would proceed in the train of his victory. But when the riot was well appeas'd, they assembled the Senators together, and complained there of their injuries received, the violence of the Commons, and the audacious presumption of Volero. After many opinions and sharpe cures delivered among them, the Ancients and Elders prevailed at length, who thought it not good to let the anger of the Nobles against the head-strong rathnes of the Commons, and the Commons so highly favoured and embraced Volero, that in their next election they made him their Tribune for that year, wherein L. Pinarius and P. Furius were Consuls. Who contrary to all mens expectation, that thought verily he would have exercis'd his Tribuneship in molesteing and vexing the Consuls of the former year, preferred the publice cause before his own private grievances, and gave not the Consuls so much as one foul word. Only he preferred a Law unto the people. That the Magistrates of the Commonwealth might be created in a ward-Lect, or Assembly of the Tribes L and Wards. Thus under a title, which at the first sight seem'd nothing hainous, pass'd a matter of no small consequence, but such as abridge the Nobles of all power and authority, to create tribunes whom they would, by the sueftiges and voices of their vaials and favorites. But when the Senators resolv'd with all their might, the going forward of this Act most pleasing and plausible to the Commons, and yet none might be found of the brotherhood of Tribunes, that by the authority either of Consuls or of Senators could be brought to joyne in his way by their negative voice, which was indeed the only means to coerc it: the insinuate, notwithstanding in telle fo weighty to wield, and fo hard to be compassed, held out with much debating the year through. The Commons then made Volero Tribune again. The Senators on the other side, suppposing the matter would now come to a final trall once for all, creat'd for their Consul Ap. Claumus, the son of Appius; who even for the old contentions maintaine'd by his father, who was both hated of the Commons, and also hated them again: and he had for his companion in government T. Quittance. At the very beginning no matter was treat'd of before that Law. But as Vol-ero was the first deviler and broacher of it, to his fellow Letterius was the more enmity and hot maintainer thereof, as he came more fresh unto it. The house he was besides, by reason of his great military glory, for that in thole dais there was not a tallerman of hands, nor more active than he. Now, when as Volero went to the substance of the Law in hand, without any circumstance of words, and forbears to inveigh against the Consuls perion, Letterius began his spech with challenging Appius and his house, as most proud, and cruelly affected to the Commonalty of Rome: avouching earnefully, "That the Nobles had made, nor a Consul, but a battyctor of N mentor, to afflict and mangle the Commons: but being a rough-hewn soudier, and counselled 'to make Orations, his tongue could not frame to express his mind as freely as he would: and
'to his utterance failing him: Since that (quoth he) O Quittance, I cannot so readily deliver the 'my in speech, as I can make that good indeed which I have spoken: Be you here to morrow and
'me in this very place I will either get this Law enacted, or I will lie in the dust and die before 'we you all. The next day the Tribunes were gotten into the Temple or h. l. h. [in the Commons and Nobility abode still in the assembly of the people, for to hinder the passing of the Law. Then commanded letterius all the rest to avoid and depart, but those only that were to give their voices. The young Gentlemen of the Nobility stood still, and gave no place to the Tribunes Of-. Then will'd Letterius some of them to be attache'd. But the Consul Appius spake again, O
'Not that a Tribune had authority over none but Commoners: forasmuch as he was a Magistrate, 'not of the people, but of the Commons. Neither could himself of his absolute power (Consul 'though he was) oblerve the custom of his ancillors: command any man to avoid: for that the 'minor form of words ran thus: May it please you, Masters, O Queries if you think good to depart.
 Soon was he able, thus laying the Law unto him, by way of form and contempt, to outhe Letterius, and put him down. Whereupon the Tribune chaf'd, and set into an heat, fende's an Office Officer to the Conful: the Conful likewise, a Lictor to the Tribune, crying often aloud, that he was but a private person without command, without Magistracy, And doth the Tribune had been hardly used, but that both the assembly rose up in a rage, and took part with the Tribune against the Conful: and also there was a concourse of the multitude, routed out of all parts of the City into the Common Hall. Appius not withstanding stood stilly to it still, and abide the burst of this tempestuous storm: neither had this brooke fluid without some bloudshed, in case Qvinus the other Conful, had not left some of the Aldermen that had been Conuls, to get his brother Conul by force (if other wise it might not be) out of the Hall, whiles himself was in hand, one while with the Commons, to appeale their try, by way of intreaty and with fair words, other whiles behoght the Tribunes to break up the assembly, persuading with them to take more leisure in this their heat and anger: for that time and place would abridge nothing of their power, but would joynt counsel and advice there to concludind withall that both Nobles should be ruled by the people, and the Conul ordered by the Nobles, Hardly and with much ado were the Commons queated by Qvinus, but far more trouble had the Nobles to still the other Conulf.
At the length, when the assembly of the people was dissimified, the Conuls called the Senate gether, Where after much variety of opinions, proceeding from fear and anger, according as the one or the other swayed among them: look how much longer time they had to reclame their mind from violent courtes, and legally with deliberation to consider of the matter: so much the more their hearts went against all concension, and farther strife: insuch, as they yeelded Qvinus hearty thanks by that his travel by parties, the discord was well alliaed. And to Appius they were petitioners, 'That he would be contend, that the majesty of the Conulf might be no great more than would (and with the unity and concord of the Citizens. For whiles the Tribunes for their part would needs have all and the Conul on the other side draw all to them: between this this pucking and hating there was no strengt left in the midst: and to conclude, the Commonning was sent, torn and dismembered between the rulers thereof: who strove rather for the manning and rule, than for the safety and preservation of the State. Against whom Appius replied with a solemn protestation before God and man, and said, 'That the weal publique was abandoned, destroyed, and betrayed by none else but foolish fear: that the Senate wanted not a Con-but the Conul wanted Senators: who now yeelded to harder conditions than they had before time in mount: Sacer, Howbeit overweighed at length by the general consent and accord of the Nobles, he was content: and to the law passd quietly, was by royall consent authorized. Then and never before were the Tribunes created in a congregation of the tribes, and by their voices Peto writeth that there were three more made to the other as if there had been but twain before: be named also the Tribunes, to wit C.Scinius, L.Nuncius, M.Duellus, Sp.Iulius L.M.
Then had the Volscians and Equians, between the civil sedition of the Romans, & the begining of war, harried & wafted the country: that in case the Commons had made an infreret-tion, they might have retired to them as to a lure place of retreat & refuge. But when all was hufte & matters compounded between the Nobles and Commons, they removed their camp backward.
Appius Claudius was sent against the Volscians: and to Qvinus fell the Province of the Equians. The fame rigorous severity continued Appius still in warlike, that he used at home in the City but to much more freely, for that he was not curbed nor held in by the Tribunes. The Commons he hatred more than his father had done aforetime: he was overweighed, and had taken the foil in their hands: and being the only Conul, oppoied against the Tribunes power yet managhe his head, the law passd clear away, which the former Conuls his predecessors, with les ado, nor with so great hope and expectation of the Nobility, had ever hundred and fluid. This his anger and indignation gave an edge to that fell formack of his by kind, for to plaque and punis his foiddiers with impomous and lordly command. But lo they were to learn again and disobey, that by no forcible means they could be tamed doing all things that they did lillye flowrwardly, and sillyboomy. Neither bafted they for shame, nor mould in awe for fear. If his will was they should march on space, they would on act purpose go far and softly: If he encouraged them in proper person to intend their busines, they woule all of them flack their former service, wherein they were enter'd of themselves: whiles he was in place, they would hang down their heads and look on the ground, as he pass'd by they would soo curtly curse him in their hearts. So as that invincible formack of his against all hatred of the Commons, woule now and then grieve here-At. And wen he say that all the threewef and rigour that he used was in vain, and that now he could do no good with his soldiery, he fell to the king, the Captains and Centurions, saying, They had spoilt and marred the Army, terming them Tribunes of the Commons, and other-whiles in taunting-wife nicknaming them Vol-racs. All these doings were the Volscians aware of, and therefore were they more eager and forward, hoping that Appius should find the Roman Army as inrowd and disobedienc of the soldiery to Appius Claudius in their Generall,

The curtly formack and disobedienc of the soldiery to Appius Claudius in their General,
that the enemy thus far forth Victor, might be kept from the Wall and Trench: and yet so, as it was very apparent, that the soldiers paffed for nothing else, but only to save the Camp for being won: for some of them rejoiced at their own losR and detraction. Whereas, the touft flamock of Appius was nothing daunted nor his heart broken: but he minded to deal cruely with them; and therefore fummoned a general assemblq. Then the Lieutenants, Marshals, and Colonels, came running unto him, advertising him in no cafe to try matterie, and to enforce his authority. The very ground and strength whereof RESTED wholly in the accord of obedient people: adding moreover, that the soldiers commonly gave out, that they would not go to the assemblq: but rather they might be heard every where, calling upon them aloud, to dislodge and remove out of the territory of the Volscians: moreover, that the enemy now Master of the field, was but a while fnidly advanced to the gates and ramparts, and well near possessed of them: whereby, they were not only to suspect, but might evidently see before their eyes some great matter toward of dangerous consequence. Whereupon at first he was over-rulled, and (forasmuch as his soldiers thereby should gain nothing but delay of their punishment) remitted the assemblq for that time: and after proclamation made to let forward in their journey the next day, and to depart in the morning very early, he caused the trumpet to sound the remoue, and to march away, The Army being gone out of the Camp, and ready to be let in order of a march: at length, the Volscians who were gotten up by the shame of the trumpet, plaid upon the tail of the rewurad: the noise whereby paffed from thence to the vanguard, & so disordered the enigns, so troubled the ranks by reason of that fright, that neither could the direction and commandment of the Captains be heard, nor the Army be brought into bateal array. No man minded any thing at all but to run away and disorderly in great numbers, they fled back over the dead carcasses and armors that lay on heaps, and to escape; and never fray they their flight, untill the enemy gave over the chase. At the last, the Conful having called his soldiers together, that were run away so scattering, (for with all the speed that he made after to call them back, he could not reclaim them;) encamped without his enemies ground in a place of security. Then he called them all together to an assemblq, and inveighed bitterly, and not without just cause, against the whole Army, as having betrayed the discipline of war, and forsaken their colours: asking every one of them what was become of their banners? And what they had done with their weapons? And as many soldiers as were unarmed as many enemies as had not their ensigns, the Centurions also, and those that received double allowance, and forsook their lands and companies, he caused to be charged with rods & to lose their heads. The whole number besides, were by lot touted, and every tenth man as it fell out, executed. But contrariwise, in the expedition against the Equians, the Conful and his soldiers, strove to exceed one another in courage and kindneff. Quintus was by nature mild and cheerful, and the cruelty of his brother Conful, that never sped well, made him take more joy in that hie gentle disposition. While the General and his Conful comKred thus together, the Equians durst not confront them, but suffered their enemies to range all abroad and desrize the country: so as in no former was got they greater booties from thence, and all was beloves among the soldiers. Over and besides these gratitudes, they had their due prizes and solemn commendations, wherein soldiers take no less delight than in rewards and gius. So, that Army returned home better affected to their General, and also to the Nobles for their Generals sake: reporting that the Senate had given them a loving father, but to the other Army a lordly matter. This year thus spent with variable fortune abroad in war; with grievous discord as well at home as abroad, was above all most memorable and famous for the Tribe-Leeft. A matter of more note, in respect of their victory that entred into the action, than of consequence, in regard of commodity that grew thereof. For the very Leet it fell less credit by excluding the Nobles out of that assemblq, than either the Commons got strength, or the Nobles did forgo thereof. But more troublesome was the year following, whiles L. Valerius & T. Aemilius were Conuls, both for the variance of the three States about the law Agrarian, and also for the arrangement of Appius Claudius, Whom, being a most bitter adversary of that law, and a great maintainer and Upholder of those that possessed and held the common N land, as if he had been ever a third Conful, M. Dileius, and C. Secius arrested and excluded. Never before that day came to the bar, a person to be tried before the people, so odious unto the Commons: charged with so many wrongs done of his own, so many of his fathers afore him, in regard whereof they were highly displeased and offended with him. The Nobles likewise had not lightly laboured to earnestly nor strained themselves so much for any one as for him. Who being the patron and protector of the Senat the maintainer and Upholder of their post and dignity; a man ever opposed against all the troublesome broils of Tribunes & Commons, was now delivered as a prey to the Commons in their anger and only for that he had over-shot, and paffed himself in heat of contention. But of all the Senators that ever were, Appius Claudius of him self alone was he, that cared not a ruth either for Tribune or Commoner nor yet for his own arrangement. No men-o-erring threats of the Commons no earnest prayers of the Senators could one make him, I say, not to change his apparel, and in humble manner to seek and crouch unto men for to be good unto him: no nor so much, as when he came to answer for himself before the people, one whit to mo life and let fall (as it were) that rough and sharp kind of temp that he was wont ordinarily to use. He kept the same fierce countenance still, the very same frowardneas and crabbedness of vilage, the same spirit of boldness in his apology and defence, Infomuch as many of the Com-

A Commons were no less afraid of Apries standing prisoner, there arraigned at the bar, than they had been of him, sitting as Conful in his office chair of state. In pleading of his cause, he spake briefly and at one to the point, with the same accusatory spirit that he had evinced in all his pleas and actions. With his boldness and resolute cunff, he so amazed both Tribunes and Commons, that they themselves deferred the day of giving sentence, and inferred afterward the time to hang and depend still undetermined. But not long after, even before the Law day appointed was come, he flunk and died. Whole funeral prayers when as the Tribunes went about to hinder, the Commons would not inter, that the death of so worthy a man, should be defrauded of the due honour and solemn obsequies, and gave audience as quietly and attentively to the commendation of the man now dead, as they did afore to his accusation while he was alive: and with a goodly train attended his corps to the grave.

The same year Fiors the Conful made a voyage with an army against the Equians, and seeing he could not train the enemy forth to fight, he made a bravado to affright the Camp: but there fell such a terrible form and tempest from heaven, with hail and thunder-claps that he was dispointed of his enterprise. And thus he was made more strange and wonderful: he had no foster founded the retreat, but the weather proved to be fair and calm again, that he made some truce and matter ol convenience, to give a second assaunt unto the enimy, as if it had been defended by the special power and providence of God. So all the heat of war turned to the waiting on of the Conful. The other Conful fortus warred with the Sabins. And even there also, because his enemies were within their walled towns, the Territories were spoiled. But afterwards, the Sabins being taken, not only of their villages and hamlets, but also of the good towns and fortresses whereof, in those parts there were many and those well peopled, encountered the foragers and after a doubtful skirmish, they departed about; and after the morrow after raised their Camp and retired themselves back into a place of more security, which the Conful taking for a sufficient argument and proof, that the enemies were defeated, left them to, and dislodged likewise without any end of the war.

During these wars and whiles discord continued in the City at home, were T. Numittus Priscus and A. Verginius created Consuls. Now it seemed that the Commons would no longer abide the deferring of the Law Ascription. And as they were about to put it to a venture and to try the utmost by extremity they took knowledge partly by the smoke and flame of the villages on fire, and partly by the running away of the villagers, that the Volscians were near at hand. Which occurred reproved and kept down the sedition which was now come to ripping, and ready to break forth. For the Consuls forced by the Senate immediately to the war, by taking the senecile youth with them out of the City, reduced the rest of the Commons to more quiescence. And the enemies verily made no further attempt, but after they had given a false alarm, and let the Romans in a foolish fear diminished away as speedily as they could. Then Numittus went to Asculum against the Volscians, and Verginius against the Equians; where having well-near received a great loss and defeat by a train laid for him: such was the prowess and manhood of the soldiery, that they recovered all again, which by the negligence of the Conful had like to be lost. But better was the conduct and government of the Army against the Volscians. For there, at the first skirmish the enemies were disordered, put to flight, and chased as far as to Asculum, a City f. that time i. of right great dilution and importance, The Conful durst not assail it, but went from the Antares Cense another town, but nothing so wealthy. Whiles the Equians and Volsci thus amased the Roman Armies and kept them occupied, the Sabins were come robbing and spoiling to the gates of the City of Rome. But within few days after, they themselves received more damage than they brought, by occasion that both Consuls with two armies were entered in great anger into their Confinis. In the end of the year Rome there was, but disquieted, as at all times before, with the variance between the Nobles and Commons. The Romans in a peevish and angry fit would not be at the Hecution of the Consuls. So by the Senators only and their followers.

F there were elected Consuls, T. Quininius et Q. Servilius. The like year to the former these Consuls had seditions and troublesome in the beginning: but afterwards upon a fraught was quiet and still. For the Sabins with a running Camp having pulled over the plains of Ceregnosum, and put all to fire and word about the ther Abis, were chased back, well near from the gate Galba and the walls: howbeit they decayed away with them exceeding great booties both of people and cattle. Whom the Conul Servilius followed hard with a power ready to bid battle, but could not overtake their main army in any even ground meet to pitch a field in, Howbeit he forsook and wast the Confini all about so as he left no corner clear that felt not his fingers, and returned with purchase of many rich prizes of all sorts. Likewise among the Volscians they iped well and had lucky hand by the good demeanour both of captan and foldier, First they joyed battle upon a plain and fought with very great slaughter, and exceeding much bloodshed on both sides. And the Romans (who for their small number were more apt to feel the los) had lost ground and disordered: if that the Conful by making a fish for a vantage, and crying that the enemies fled from the other wing, had not encouragethem and renewed the battle again. And so by giving a new charge, whiles they thought they had the better, they got the better in very deed. The Conful fearing again, by pressing too hard upon the Army, to enforce them to turn and make head, founded the retreat.
between wherein they rested quiet, as though there had been a secret truce agreed between them. In which mean space, a great sort of people from all parts of the Volscians and Equians repaired to the Camp; thinking verily, that if the Romans were aware of them, they would depart in the night season. Whereupon, at the third watch they came to make an assault upon their Camp. Quintus after he had quieted the tumult, which upon this sudden alarm arose, and given commandment that the soldiers should keep themselves within their pavilions, brought forth a company of Horsemen to guard the gates, and caused certain couriers and trumpeters on horseback to wind and sound before the trench and counter-trench, and so to hold the enemy in suspense and expectation until day-light. The rest of the night was so quiet within the Camp, that the Romans had time enough and good opportunity to take their repose and sleep. This I show of footmen in their harness, whom the Volsciens imagined to be more than they were, and all Romans: the neighing beside, and noise that the horses made by reason of their strange riders that they were not used unto, and the round aloof of their trumpets and horns that made them to set up their ears, and to flamp and lime outrageous, amased the enemies waiting when they would charge upon them. When it was day, the Romans being in heart and breath, as having slept their fill, came forth and embattled themselves, and at the first shock discomfited the Volsciens, armed with long flanding and overwatched with all. And yet the enemies rather gave ground and retire themselves, then tempted to be driven from their strong-hold, because they had at their backs certain hils, whereunto they might retire behind the Principals, and not break their ranks, and lose themselves. The Consul seeing he was come to a place of disadvantage, made a stand. The footmen hardly would be stayed, calling and crying to the Consul to go low upon them seeing they were discomfited. The horsemen were more eager, riding all about the Consul, and with open mouth cried out, that they would advance before the enemies. While the Consul held off, in a mummering what to do, as he was assailed of the valour of his horsemen, so he little troubled the ground; they all at once let up a shout, that they would fight forward, come what would; and as they cried, so did they in good earnest. And pitching their javelins in the ground, that they might more firmly get up the steep place, they took their full carres, and ran up the hill. The Volsciens having in their first burst spent all their darts, and other shot which they had ther before, and made no haste to take up foones that lay under their feet, let drive at the Romans as they climbed up, and so thick and threefold they belted them that they annoyed them before, and beat them down the hill. Thus the left wing of the Romans was well-near overcharged had not the Consul at the point, when as they were ready to retreat, blamed them first for their nathless, and then for their cowardice, and made them for very shame to flake off all fear. First, they go to it stoutly, and kept the ground, and after, as their strength served them, considering the ventage of the place which the enemies had gotten, they adventures to set foot forward, and won ground with a fresh shout and outcry. And taking their carre again the second time, they fir in all they can, and at length overcame the disadvantage of the place. Now when they were almost at the point to win the very pitch and ridge of the hill, the enemies turned back. While they ran on heaps in dismay, both they that fled, and they that followed, happened both at once in one company into the enemies Camp, which in that fright was won. The Volsciens, as many of them as could escape, ran as fast as their legs would carry them to Amiens. And to Amiens likewise was the Roman army conducted: and after a few days siege, was surrendered upon no fresh, and new force of assault but for that presently upon their unfortunate conflict, and loss of the Camp, their heart were done, and utterly failed.

The Third Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the third Book.
A year after the foundation of Rome. And as the Government of the State was translated from King to Conuls: so was it now from the Conuls to the Decemvirs. They having possessed tables of laws, and borne themselves modestly in that holy dignity, were therefore by the consent of the people permitted to remain in office the second year: but after they had committed many infelicitous parts, they would not give over their voice of Magistracy, but held it till the third year: until such time as their obstinacy and intolerable rule came to an end, occasioned by the sordity of Appius Claudius: who being detained upon a voyage, suborned one to make claim upon him, as his blood-covenant upon her father. Virginians was driven of necessity to catch up a wife from a butcher's stall next by, and to kill his daughter; as having no other means to save her from the bands of him that prepared to abuse her body indecently. The Commons

The third Book of T. Livius.

After the winning of Aesivus, T. Cæcilius and Q. Fabius were created Conuls. This was that Fabius, which only remained alive of all the name that perished at Censora. Now had Cæcilius in his former Conulship perused to distribute certain Lands among the Commons, and therefore in this second like-wise, both the fatucers of the law Agraria were ingred hope of the foresaid law: and also the Tribuns supposing verily that now by the help of a Conul, that might be brought about and obtained, which oftentimes had been enterprised against the pleasure of the Conuls: took the matter in hand and gave the attempt: and withal, the Conul still continued in the same mind. But the great minded men and many of the Nobles, finding themselves grieved, and complaining that the chief head Magnific of the City butted himself, with the Tribuns suits, and was by large giving away of other men's possessions, become popular and gracious with the people, turned the whole burthen and tedious heavy load of this action, from the Tribuns upon the Conul his head, and a cruel broil was toward, had not Fabius, by a device and policy to neither party offensive, made an end of the matter with expedition. For whereas there were certain Lands gotten by conquest from the Volscians the year before, under the conduct of T. Quinctius: there might (said he) a colony be brought to Aesivus, a City near adjoyning, very commodious, and seated by the Sea side: to show the Commons without any grudging or complaints of the possessors of Land-lords, be seized of Land, and the City rest in quiet and Unity. This opinion of his was accepted of all hands. And they created three special officers or Triumvirs, for the division of the said lands, to wit, T. Quinctius, Att, Virginius, and E. F. Ennius. Then proclamation was made. That whatsoever would hold any of the Land, should give up their names in writing. But plenty, as the manner is, soon cau'd loathing: for there were so few that presented themselves, that to make up the full number of the inhabitants, they were fain to adjoin unto them certain Volscians. The rest of the multitude had rather (as it seemed) to keep a calling for Land at Rome, than be possessed of Land elsewhere. The Eæquians craved peace of Q. Fabius, who was come against them with an army: and they themselves by making a fadain introde into the territories of Latium, cancelled the same and made it void. But the year next following, Q. Servius (for he was Conul with Sp. Posthumius) being sent against the Eæquians, kept a standing camp in the Country about Latium, but by the reason of a contagious diseaze or a plague, that raged in his army, they were of necessity forced to keep quiet within their tents. So their war was deferred unto the third year, when as Q. Fabius and T. Quinctius were Conuls, and for almost as much as Q. Fabius, had upon his victory before granted peace to the Eæquians, he had an extraordinary commision directed unto him for the rule of that Province. Who being thither went, with full assurances, with the very fame of him, and name of his army, would quiet the Eæquians, but Embassadors to the Council of that Nation, with this message: "Q. Fabius the Conul, saith, that as he came before peace from the Eæquians unto Rome, so he bringeth now war to the Eæquians from Rome; having now his sword in the very fame hand, which he gave unto them before in friendly manner unarmed. Whole treachery he is and perjury, that is the cause of this; the Gods can witness now, and in some measure will revenge hereafter. Nevertheless, he for his part, however the case standeth, desirith that the Eæquians would yet befriend themselves of their own accord and repent rather than stand to the extremity and abide those calamities and miseries that follow war. If they would come in therefore and be forry for that they have done, their submission should be received: and they taken into the safe protection of his clemency, whereof already they had experience. But in case they persist still in their disloyalty, and take pleasure in being foriwomen: be they well assured, that they should have the ire and wrath of the Gods more than their enemies to fight against them. These words little or nothing at all moved any men there; that the very Embassadors did like to have been very hardly used and evil entreated, yet, and an army withal was sent forth as far as Algidum against the Romans. When these tidings were brought to Rome, the indignity of the thing and the shameful manner thereof, rather than any fearful peril otherwise, roused the other Confil out of the City. So two Confils or royal armies approached the enemy in order of battle, ready to try it out presently by the din of sword, but the day being (as it fell out) wetter, spent there some snow from out of the place where the enemy kept ward. This is to make a show of war only (ye Romans) and not to war indeed.

"Let your battalions in array against night forsooth, that now drawn with hard on: we had need of more daylight I wis, for the biffines in hand, and to try this quarrel. To morrow therefore at Suntiing, see you come again into the field; ye shall have fighting near or, your hands full. The followers nerved and galled at these words, retired back into the camp until the next day. I thinking the night was long, that kept them from battle land; so for that time they relieved their bodies with food and sleep. On the morrow to soon as it was day, the Roman host being stirring somewhat more early, and ready in array, and length the Equians likewise shewed themselves in field. A sharp fight there was on both sides, by reason that both the Roman soldiers fought in anger and deadly hatred; and also the Equians upon private confidence, that bare them witness how they embarked themselves into this danger, and were out of all hope ever to be trusted again, were forced to hazard all upon a cast, and venture the utmost. Yet were not the Equians able to endure long, the violent fight of the Romans, but were discomfited and put to flight. And being returned within their own Frontiers, the unrelent multitude for all this, were never the more inclined to peace but reproved and blamed their Captains: 'That they put the trial of the issue to a let field, in which kind of fight the Romans had singular skill, and surpaßed them. As for the Equians, they were better at robbing, spoiling, and foraging, in making incursions and invades; and a better and safer kind of service it was, here and there in handful places, to skirmish with forces divided, than reduce all into one grofs army, and to pitch a field. Leaving therefore a guard to defend the camp, they went forth, and with such a tumult invaded the confines of Rome, that the very terror thereof reached to the City. This flat, especially coming so fondly and unlooked for, made the Romans fear the more. For who should ever have doubted and inspected, that their enemies so lately vanquished, and in manner belied within their own camp, could possibly think upon entering into the lands of others, and to drive booties. Besides, the ruffian peasants came in at the gates, crying, and saying, that they were not petty companies, and small handfuls of thieves and robbers, but (such was their footless fear, augmenting and making everything greater) whole armies and legions of enemies were at hand, and marched space with banners displayed full against the City. From their mouths, they that were next made report unto others: as they heard news from they knew not whom, for they let them abroad they cared not how, but even in the carriage they added somewhat of what their own and cowey laid good foore. Here was running, there was crying alarm & generally such a confusion every where, as if the City had been quite lost. By good hap Quintus the Confil was returned from Algidum to Rome. That remedy cured all and layed the hear. When the tumult was appeased, he rebuked the people for fearing those enemies whom heretofore they had vanquished, and placed good guards over the gates. Then he assembled the Senate, and by the authority and assent of the Nobles, proclaimed Lustitia, a general cessation or vacation in all courts of law; and went himself forth in person with a power to defend them marches, leaving Quintus Servilius Prefect of the City; but the enemy he found not in the territory all about. The other Confil performed his affairs passing well: who having certain intelligence, which way the enemies would come, set upon them laden with prey, and (by that means marching more heavily in disorder) made it a dear booty unto them, even as much as their lives were worth. For few of them escaped the Ambush, and all the pillage was recovered. So the return of Quintus into the City, made an end of the publick Lawful an above-said vacation which lasted but four days. Then was a Cenaie or Affirmation set of mens goods and a mutter or view taken of the number of Citizens, together with a solemn purging of the people, called Lustrium, celebrate by Quintus. And there were numbered of Citizens 14,414 polles over and above men, and women that lived single, or had no children, and al orphans besides. And among the Equians afterward nothing was done worth remembrance: for they betook them to their strong Towns, suffering their territory and villages to be conflagrated with fire, and spoiled. Thus the Confil, after he had divers times overrun the Country of his enemies, with a cruel army wailing and spoiling as he went, returned home to Rome with great honor and a large booty. Then were Coff. Aelius Poppionate Albinus, and Sp. Furis, Some have written them Puliti, who indeed are rightly named furis. Which I note, left any man should think they were hinder men, whereas the variety is only in the name. No doubt there was, but that one of the Confils would war with the Equians: and therefore the Equians sought for side of the Ectranne Volcians, which being gladly granted and lent with speed, (such a perpetual hatred bare those Cities always against the Romans) there was great preparation for war in most forcible manner. The Herniks having an inclining and knowledge thereof, certified the Romans afore-hand, that the Ectranne were revolted and banded with the Equians. The Colony Antium likewise was had in jealousy, for that when the Town was lost, many people fled from thence to the Equians, who all the time of the Equian war, served in the field, and proved the most hearty soldiers and scourer of all others. And now when the Equians were driven into their Towns, that multitude
A multitude being flipp'd away and retired to Antium, withdrew from the Romans the allegiance of the Colones and inhabitants there, who were already of their own inclination unfound and not to be trusted, But before the matter was come to ripeness, and they entered into any action, the Senate upon intelligence given that they intended only, and were upon the point to revolt, gave the Coll, in charge to fend for the chiefmen and head persons of that colony to Rome, and to inquire and learn of them in what terms Antium stood: who being come withing enough, without any great intretacy, and convenyed by the Comulls before the Senate, made answer to their interrogatories in such manner, that they were sent away more inspected, than at their first coming, whereupon they resolved fully of war.

Sparius Firmus one of the Coll, to whom that province by lot fell, having taken his voyage against the Equians, found the enemy spoiling and waiting in the territory of the Hermicks: and being ignorant what number they were (for that in no one place they were all discoered together) he rashly joined battle, and hazarded his power, being in number and force inferior to the other. And at the first encounter he was driven back, and retired into the camp: and yet was he not palt all danger and insecurity there: for both the night following, and the next day after, the camp was so fireightly beleit, and to holy assault, that he could not dispatch so much as a messenger from thence to Rome. The Hermicks sent word both of the infortunate fight, and also how the Comull and his army were beguiled. With which news they so terrified the IL of the Council, that they granted Posthumus the other Comull the iolent commision, To se to the State, that it suffered no danger and damage.

The form of which order and decree, hath been always accounted to signify some great extremity of the Commonwealth. And thought best it was, that the Comull himself in proper person, should abide at home to enrol in the matter book, all those that were able to bear arms: that T. Quintus should be sent as Pro-consul or Vice-consul, with a power of confederate Allies to drive the siege and recu the camp: and for the furnishing of this army, the Latines, the Hermicks, and Colony Antium, were commanded to fend unto Quintius, Subaynt fowlers (for so they termed at that time, the aids and supplies taken up in haine and a sudden.) Many attempts were made, much skirmishing, and sturdy assault for certain dayes on each side were encircled. For the enemy made with more in number, arrayed in divers places and sturdy ways to cut off and diminish the power of the Romans, as not sufficient and able to make head at all.

Turns. For at one time they both made an assault upon the camp, and withal sent out certain of their forces to waft the territory of Rome, yea, and to give the venture upon the very City, if they could eipice any good opportunity to offer it. E. Valerius was left behind to defend the City, and Posthumus the Comull was sent out to refrain and withstand the wafting of the marches. No point of care or travall on any hand was flaked, watch and ward both night and day was let in the City, a good Corps de Eguard appointed afofe the Gates, and fowlers belowed upon the Walls: and (that which was needful in so great an hurlyburly) for certain dayes it was no Terms, or interdiction of Law was observed. In this mean while, Quintius the Comull, who at the first had quietly endured the siege and made no resistance, suddenly and at unawares falled out at the broad gate called Decumanus, upon the enemies: and whereas he might have chafed them, he made some fray of that; for fear lest on some other side, they would have given assault upon the camp. But Eurius the Lieutenant (who also was the Comull his Brother) engaged himself too far, and upon a hot desire of pursuit and following the chase, neither saw he his fellows as they retired, ne yet the enemies as they came to charge him on the back. Thus being shot out from all the rescue, after many effays made (but all in vain) to make way through unto the camp, manfully fighting he was slain. The Comull likewise hearing that his Brother was environed all about with enemies, returned again to fight: but as he ran more tally than warfly into the midit of the skirmish, he was fore wounded, and being hardly and with much ado faved by thosse that were about him, he both diquitted and damned his hearts of his own men, and made his enemies more fierce, lusty, and courageous.

Who were so animated and let on fire, both with the hurt of the Comull, and also with the death of his Lieutenant, that nothing afterwards could stand in their way: no force was able to stay them, but that they beat the Romans again into their camp: where they were besieged before being now both in hope, and also for strength worse than they were before. So that their main State then lying a bleeding, had utterly perished, but that T. Quintius with a supply of strangers: namely, a power of Latines and Hermicks, came to the rescue in time: who charging the Equians behind, whiles they were wholly butted in assailing the camp, shewing them within the Lieutenant's head in a great bravery and pride, at the same instant caused a tally out of the camp, by a signal that he gave them a far off, and to inclosed round about a great number of the enemies. Small was the slaughter, but great was the flight and scattering of the Equians in the territory of Rome: upon whom (filagring here and there and driving their booties afore them) Posthumus, who in divers convenient places had beloweit certain companies and bands of fowlers, ran violently. And as they fled every way in ditary, they lighted upon Quintius as he with the hurt Comull returned with Victory. Then the Comull's army bravely did their endeavour, and had a goodly day of them: and was revenged both for their Comulls wounded, and also for the death of the Lieutenant and the Squadrions with him. Many losses and overthrowes were given and taken on each side for certain dayes. But in so ancient a matter as this was, hard it is for a man upon his credit, to let down precisely the certain number either how many fought, or how many were slain, Howbeit Valerius Antias boldly reckoneth the exact numbers, namely, that there died of the Romans in the Hernicks Country 5000, and of the Aquian robbers, who went up and down spoiling and pillaging in the territory of Rome, were killed by A. Petuluminus the Col. 2400. The rest of the multitude, which laden with spoil and in the hands of Quminius, were not to quit, nor escaped with the loss of so few mens lives: for of them the word devoured 4000, and to account the number exactly, 200 (quoth he) and 30 jult. Then returned they on all hands to Rome, and the foresaid vacation or law-fetch ended.
The skie was seen much on a light fire, and other strange wonders either appeared indeed, or presented to the fearful people vain apparitions, and fantastical lusions. However it was, for to avert the dangers by these prodigious and terrible tokens prefaged, there were proclaimed festival holy days for three days together. During which time all the Churches were replenished with men and women, making supplications and prayers for the favor and mercy of the Gods. The bands and squadrons of the Latins and Hernicks, after great thanks given them by the Senate for their good service in this war, were discharged and sent home. But the Antiate lounders, 1000 in number, who after the battell was fought came tardy, and too late for to succour, were dis-miffled in manner with ignominy and shame.

Then was the great Lect or assembly held, for the election of Magistrates: wherein L. Eutinios and P. Servilius were created Conoils: and on the * Calends of Sextiles (for on that day) began the year then, they entered their Conoilschip. A grievous and heavy time it was, and as it continued, K a year of plague and great mortality, both in the City and Country, as well among brute beasts as men. And the receiving of the Country paents with their cateil into the City, for fear of robbelling and spoiling, encreased the contagiousness of the sicks more the more. For, that confused medly of all sorts of beasts, both annoyed and empoisoned the citizens with the unclean and unusual smell, and also filled with fulny heat and overmuch watching the rutul people, lying pestered together, and thruf up into close rooms and stroke lodging. The mutual reconcile one to help and Minister unto another, and the very catching of the diseas, set it all abroad.
Thus whiles they had much ado to endure their present calamities, behold, to mend the matter, all of a suddain, the Hernick Embassadors bring word, that the Aquians and Volscians having re-died a power joyned together, were encamped within their limits: and from thence with a mighty army waited and destroyed their territory. Now, besides that the small affembly in the Senate-house, was to thefe their allies an evident token that the City was fore visited with the per-itience, they received also an heavy answer from them, namely: That the Hernicks themselves together with the help of the Latins, should defend their own: as for the City of Rome, it was with the heavy hand and visitation of the Gods, dispeopled by the plague: but in case the sicks were decreased in some measure and took up in any time, they would willingly aid their confederates, as they did the year b. fore, as as they had done at all times besides. Thus departed their allies, and for their ill news they brought thither, they carried with them home again a worse answer and miflage, to wit, That they shoule by themselves suffice that war alone which hardly they were able to support, if they had the power of the Romans to assist them. Long stayed not the enemy in M the Hernicks country, but went forward from thence into the territory of Rome, defolate already (God wot) without the injury of war, and little need there was of calamity that wayes: where meeting with no man at all, no not so much as one unarmed, and passing over the Country, disfurnished not only of Garrisons to retift, but also of people for husbandry and tillage, at length they came to the third ilone, i. within three miles of Rome, to the broad port high way, called Gabinis, leading to Gabii. The Roman Col. Eutinios, was now departed this life, and his brother Col. Servilius did lieg on at the point of death, in small hope of recovery. Most of the peers and principal ancients were infected, and sick in bed, so was the greater part of the Nobles, and welne all the serviceable men of war: so as they were not able toer forth an expedition or voyage abroad, as meet was in so great a tumult, no nor scarce to keep any ordinary let guard at home for the defence of the City. The Senators such as age and sickness would permit, took the charge in proper persons of watch and ward, The Eides of the Commons went the round, and had the charge to see all well & in good order: so that upon them now refted the government of the State, & the Majestie of the Conoils Regiment. Thus when all was fororded, no head to direct, no strength of man to execute; the Tullar Gods, Protectors of the City, and the good fortune alone that ever waited upon her, preferred the same chance. This made the Volscians and Equians to carry with them a mind and intent, rather to deal by way of robbings and spoliations, than in any hostile manner like profleded warriors: for to small hope had they, or none at all, of winning the City: so liet little heart, so much as to approach the walls, that even the very roofs of houses, which they defired a far off, and the flight of the tombs and graves: so near at hand, turned their minds clean and dunted their courages. So as over all the camp they began to mutter with themselves. What they meant to spend time idly and sit still without spreading in a wait and defeat Countrie, within the mortality and purified air and corruption, both of people and castle; when as they might as well invade those parts that flood clear and found, and namely the rich, plentiful, and fat fields of Tufculum: and therewithuddainly at once they pluck'd up their ensigns, and by crofs ways passt through the * Luvian countries, even to the mountains of Tufculum: and thither turned

A they the whole force and tempest of the war. In the mean time the Herniks and Latins moved not with piry and compassion only, but also for very shame, in case they had neither withstood their common enemies, marching to Rome with a great army, not relieved their bereaved friends; joyned their powers together, and set forward to Rome: where not finding the enemies, and after the battle that went of them, and tracing their fresh tracks and noting, they encountered them as they came down from the hills Country, of it, where to the vale of A. = Where they made no staying bargain of it, but fought to their loss, so as their fidelity unto their allies, had but bad success for that present. And in Rome there was no less mortality of citizens by theickness, than there were Matters abroad of their allies by the edge of the sword. For the other Conful, who alone survived hitherto, now died. There left this lie also, other noble personages, M.Velarius, Tussus Verginius, Auguris: and Ser. Sulpicius the Curio Maximus. But among the bale and common sort, the violence of the disease raged and spread, I know not how far. The Senate now delituded of all help and comfort of man, moved the people to devotion, to their heads, and prayers unto the Gods. And commandment was given to all men with their wives and children, to go in procession, to pour out their supplications, and crave mercy at Gods hands. Thus being by public authority called forth to perform that which every man was forced unto by his own proper calamities, they filled all the Temples and Chappels, the Danes and anc. Matrons, lying groaning and weeping the Church floors and pavement with their hair and tears, hanging looped humbly entreating pardon of the Gods; and an end once of the petition e, Whereupon, were it that they had obtained the mercy of God, or that the more dangerous and contagious lesson of the year, was now well overpast: their bodies by little and little, having escaped the danger of disease, began to recover and was more healthly.

Then let their minds about the care of the Common-weal, and after certain intervals determined or ended, P. Valerius Patroclus, the third day of his Interregn or Regency for the time, created Conils L. Lucretius Tricipitiuns, and T. Verginius Farnesius, who they will: who * three days before the Ides of Sexilis, began their Confulship. By which time the City was grown to strong again, that it was able not only to maintain a defensive war, but also to enter the field and still others. When the Herniks therefore gave them advertisments that the enemies were passed over into their borders: they made no delay, but readily and willingly promised their aid, and levied two Confular armies. Verginius was sent against the Volscians, to begin with them, and to war within their own Country, Tricipitiuns was opposed in the Frontiers of their confederates, to keep them from invasion and waffling, and went no further forward than to the Herniks. Verginius at his first encounter and confronting of his enemies, discomfited and put them to flight. But Tricipitiuns whiles he lay full encamped in the marches of the Herniks, milked of the army of the Robbers: which was conducted over the Mountains of Prene, from whence they came down into the Champsian, and spoiled the territories of Prene and Gaces: and from thence they fetched a compass about unto the Mountains of Tufculum. The City of Rome likewise was put in great fear, rather upon the iidemanan occurrence of this alarm, than for any want of power to resist their violence. Quinque Fabii, at that time was Proovit or President of the City, who put the youth in armor, disposed guards in places convenient, and made all safe and in good security. The enemies therefore who had raised a booty out of the parts adjoining, durst approach no nearer, but call about with their army and retired: and further they went from their enemies City, so much the more careless they were, until they light upon the Col. Lucerins, who by his epilals and scouls, was at one time acquainted what ways they would take, and was ready also to try battle. So with refection and prepared hearts, they set upon them, that with the idem than were amazed. And albeit they were in number fewer, yet they discomfited and put to flight a mighty multitude of them, and drove them within the hollow valleys, where because they had no ready way to get out, they kept them inclosed on every side in such fort, that the whole name and nation weinper of the Volscians, there utterly perish.

In some Chronicles I find that there were 13470 slain in the fight and chase, and 1350 taken Prisoners alive, and 27 eneign or banners brought away. It may be well that the number perhaps doth somewhat exceed the truth, yet a great laughter there certainly was, The Conils having achieved this victory, and gotten a mighty great prey, returned into the same landing camp again. Then pitched both Conils together, and the Volscians joyantly with the Equians, rallied their Forces thus decayed and weakened, into one place, and made one entire army. This was the third field fought, in that one year, and by the same good Fortune the Romans want the victory: and having vanquished the enemies, they were Makers alio of the camp. Thus the City of Rome recovered her seat, and returned to her ancient good estate. But this happy success in war, immediately stirred up civil troubles at home. C. Terentius Atis, for that year a Tribun of the Commons, supposing in the abien e of the Conils, good opportunity was offered to let on foot the Tribuns actions, and their proceedings: for certain days together gave not over before the Commons, to accuse the great pride and inflency of the Nobles; but especially he inveighed against the Conils Regiment, as being too absolute, and in a free state into liberty, For in name only (quoth he) leis odious and hateful it is than that of the K. K, but in fact in very dead, more grievous and cruel. For why? Instead of one Lord, the City hath received twain, and those having authority beyond all measure, unlimited and infinite: who being them...selves at their own liberty and unbridled, turned the edge of all fright and dreadful Laws; yea, and the rigor of all punishment, against the Commons. But left that their licentiousness should continue for ever, he was minded to prefer and publish a Law, by virtue whereby of there should be five men created, who should set down certain conditions, to limit and gage the authority of the Conuls: and look what authority and commission the people granted out upon them the fame should the Conuls exercise, and no more, and not rule of themselves, and use their own will and licentious left in stead of Law. This act being once published, and the Nobles fearing, left whiles the Conuls were away, they should be taken down and yoked. Quin. Fabius President of the City, assembled the Senate, who so bitterly and sharply inveighed against the Law and the Law-giver himself that if both the Conuls themselves had stood about the Tribun of purpose to contradict and cross his proceedings, there had been no threats nor terrible menaces left for them, to have thundered out. For he laid forth unto his charge, that he had lain in wait and now having spied the time to fit his purpose, had given the venture to affail the C.W. and the State, and in case the Gods in their wrathful displeasure had lent among them such a Tribun as he the year before together with war and pestilence, there had been no remedy then, but he must have had his way, and then they had been all undone. For when the Conuls both were dead, and the City lay bed-rid as it were, in a miserable confusion of all things, he would have made laws then indeed, to the utter abolishing of the Conuls authority out of the Common-wealth, and been a ring-leader to Volcians and Æquians both, for to have assailed the City. For what might not he have lawfully done by virtue of his place? If the Conuls had either proudly or cruelly proceeded against any one Citizen, he might have entred an Action against them, and convinced them for both before those very Judges, of whom peradventure some one had been by them hardly dealt withal. This would have been the course and end of it. And he that thus did, should not cause the Conuls authority and rule, but the Tribuns power to become odious and intolerable, which having been of late well quieted and reconciled unto the Nobles, began now ariew to come unto the old places, and to be troublesome again. Neither intreated he him not to go on still as he had began. But ye my Matters (quoth Fabius) that are the rest of the Tribuns, we would requite you to consider well that point especially: That this power you have, was brought in for the succour and relief of every particular person, and not to the general prejudice and undoing of all. Again, that ye are created Tribuns of the Commons, not enemies of the Nobles, A heavy and lamentable case it is to us, odious and hateful unto you and will breed you much ill will and displeasure, in case the C.W, now forform, should thus be invaded and affaited. Ye shall love nothing of your own right. I assure you, nor, you shall avoid much mislike and hatred of men, in case ye be in hand and deal with your brother Tribun, to put off this matter and defer it wholly until the Conuls coming. Why, the very Æquians and Volcians themselves the last year, when both our Conuls were dead of the plague prefied not hardly upon us, to prosecute any proud and cruel war against us. So the Tribuns commended and persuaded with Tarentians: and this his commenced suit or action being adjourned in outward show, but in very truth let fall quite and disfamed, the Conuls forthwith were sent for home. Licentio returned enriched with a right great booty, but with far greater honor and renown. \textit{Who at M} his very first coming was himself more glory. by laying abroad in \textit{Mars} field all the prizes, that every man for three days space might know his own and have it away. All the rest, that had no owners to come forth and make claim, was sold in port-sale. By all men consent, the Conul was thought worthy of triumph; howbeit that matter was put off by reason that the Tribun had not yet done with his law: which was the thing that the Conul thought meet should be first regarded. The matter was debated and created for certain days, both in the Senate and also before the people. At last the Tribun yeilded to the Majesty of the Conul and gave it over. Then was due honor rendered both to the General and also to the army accordingly. He triumphed over the Volcians and Æquians: and in his triumph his own legions followed after him. To the other Conul grained it was that he should in a kind of triumph called \textit{Oriol}, ride into the City, but not without his foildiers. The year next ensuing, the Law \textit{Tarentina} was by the whole CoEdge or fellowship of the Tribuns revived and propounded again: which put the new Conuls \textit{P. Velleii} and \textit{S. Volcius} to some trouble. And in the same year the state seemed to be on a light fire, and there was an exceeding earthquake. And that which the year afore was no credit given unto, was now for truth believed, to wit, Thara a Cow did speak. Amongst other strange wonders it rained flesh: during which flower, a huge number of fowls flew among, and were reported to have snatcht it and carr'd it away as it was in falling. But that which fell down and stattet their tallons, lay scattered here and there for certain days in such a forth, as the fencech changed not at all, nor the flesh one jot taken and corrupted. Then the books of \textit{Sibilla} were perused by the Duumuris debated over matters of Religion who fore-told of some dangers to enyle by a Company of strangers, and gave warning to look left happy some assault should be made upon the highest places of the City, and thereof a slaughter and massacre enyle. Amongst the rest, warning was given to abstain from civil discord and mutinies: which the Tribuns found fault with: as a devisd mater to hinder the law. Whereupon great debate and contention was like presently to grow. But behold, (that the revolution and consile of trouble might turn about every year to the same point,) The Hermits bring news that the Volcians had Æquians for all their wings were wellcliped, A ped, and their forces greatly decayed, began together and levy new armies; Item, That in Anni num lay the whole weight and importance of the affairs, and all depended upon it: That the An-tiarch coloners held their councils and had their meetings in open balls, as Etectum, but Anti-arch was the principal fear of the war, and from thence came all preparations and forces whatever.

As soon as these news were reported in the Senate, order was given to muster soldiers: and that the Consuls should part between them the administration and managing of their war, so as the one should have the charge against the Volsci, and the other against the Aquilans. But the Tribuns ran out openly in the common Hall before the people, "That this was but a made matter of the Volsci war, and a tale devised by the Hermis, who were suborned and framed to play their parts in the Pageant, and to serve the turn of the Nobles. And that now verily the freedom of the people of Rome was not oppressed or endangered by plain prose & virtue, but finely shifted off and dailied cunningly withal, by flye and crafty inventions. And for all as it was an unlikeliest thing and incredible, that the Volsciens and Aquillans after so great slaughter committed upon them, whereby they were all in a manner killed up, should be able of them selves to wage war there, for all things new enemies fought out: A faithful Colony near adjoining, was now hundred and defamed: war was pretended for a show against the Quiriti and innocent Antiarch; but in truth, intended with the very Commons of Rome, whom they were to drive out of the City, and make them Citizens也就是说.." God knows whither) to be avenged at length of the Tribuns. And thus the Law (lay the Tribuns, for they muit think their drift is to this end and to none other) should be troden under foot, unless whiles all is entire and whose, and nothing done, whiles they remain at home in their houses, whiles they be in their houses, they take heed and look well about them, that they be not difpossessed of the City, and take the yoke of servitude upon their necks: affuring them that if their hearts only served, they should want for no help; and that all the Tribuns agreed and were of one mind, that there was no cause of fear abroad, no fowre war to trouble them; last of all, that the very providence of the Gods the year before restored them that their liberty might with safety be defended. These and such Remontrances gave the Tribuns out. On the other part, the Consuls casting their eyes on the bad to be set, even in their fight and presence, began to matter. Thither ran the Tribuns down in all haste, and drew the whole assembly of people with them.
And, to make as it were a proof and tryst, some few by name were called, and straight-ways began a lit. For whom overseas the Sergeant by the Consil his commandment arrested, the Tribuns charged again that he should let go. And neither side contained within the limities and compacts of their commission and fruitful authority: but premised of their might and strong hand, to attain unto their desired purpose. For even as the Tribuns had demanced themselves in forbidding the matter, semblably the senators besfirred themselves to stop the law for going forward: which was propounded every Court day, and when the people might assemble. And evermore the brash began, when the Tribuns commanded the people to avoid the Hall, for that the Parlament would not endure them to be set out and exit. Few or none of the ancients would be present at these trouble, some elifs, being in such as were not to be managed and ordered by fage Council, but wholly left to the rashness and boldness of young and green heads. The Consils also were much absent, and forbear to be in place, for fear left in such a conilled hurribity their Majecty and dignity, might have been infected to some shameful contumely and disgrace. But there was among them one Quidus Quintus, a lusty young Gentleman and a stout, in regard both of his noble parentage, as also of the goodly tall personage and strength of his body. Besides these good parts that God had bestowed upon him, he had won himself many ornaments by landry exploits achieved in wars; He had within an eloquent speech and a good grace at the bar, so as, in one word, throughout the whole City, there was not one thought to be more ready in tongue, or taller of his hands. This Quidus Quintus finding in the midst of the Nobles, higher to be seen above all the rest, as that in his speech and strength, carried afore him the countenance and authority of all Dictators and Consuls, was the only man that bare off the brunts of Tribuns, and forms of the common people. Many a time were the Tribuns driven out of common Hall, the Commonalty defeated and put to flight by the conduct of this Captain. Whomsoever came within his reach, was sure to go away throughly beaten, and a fearful. So as it evidently appeared, if this course might have been allowed, the law had soon been checked and overthrown. Now when all the other Tribuns besides being there with dismayed and well armed, Antiarch alone, being one of their fellowship, was to bold, as to enter an action against Quidus of a capital crime.
By which deed of his, he rather fired, than leared his hot and furious nature. For so much the more eagerly withstood he the Law, coursed and troubled the Commons, and persecutted the Tribuns as it were with open war. The plaintiff in the mean time, suffered the defendant to run on still, and with many oratudes to kindle more coals of ill will and hatred upon his own head, and to minister further matter of crimes to be charged with. And all the while he ceased not to press the Law to proceed, not so much of any hope to bring it to pass, as to provoke and set on work the giddy head and humorous vein of Quidus. Whereby, it came to pass that many follies and crimes were committed both in word and deed, by the younger fort: and evermore the blame light upon poor Quidus: he alone was always charged, because he had been once impeached. But nevertheless he gain'd way and crost the Law, and Anitus Virginius ever and anon would entertain the Commons with thefe and fuch like speeches, "See ye not already (quoth he) Quirites, that ye may not now have Cæfo your Citizen, and the law which you desire both together. But what mean I to fpeak of your Law? It is your liberty that he infringeeth and feteth himfelf againft, and in pride and arrogancy he exceedeth all the Tarquinius that ever were. But wait, ye were befent until he be made a Conun or Dictator, whom ye fee already, being but a private perfon to bear himself to greatly of his strength and boldnefs, as to Lord it over you, and rule as a King. Many foothed the Tribune and laid the like, adding moreover, how they had been well knocked and beaten at his hands: and were forward enough of themfelves to fett the Tribune on, to proceed in his commenced action againft him.

Now was the law day of judicial trial come: and it leemed abroad, that all men verily thought that the very foundation of their liberty conftited in the condemnation of Cæfo. In conclufion, driven he was with much indignity and shame, to creep and crouch unto every uman, submifly creaving their favor one after another. There fancoed him his kindred and recrec friends the bent men of the City, Tullus Quinthus Capitolinus, who had been thrice Cefili, fpake in his behalf: and after he had reckoned up many honors and dignities, both of his own and aof his family, af{}- med, that neither in the home and race of Quinini, nor yet throughout the City of Rome, was ever fene fo great towardnes, no fuch fhew and likelikood of ripe and perfect vertue and proueus as in Cæfo faying, that he had been fift his fouldier, and ferved under him: and that with his own eyes he had fene him ofteimes fight valiantly hand to hand with his enemies in the field. Again Kep. Fanfs made this good report of him, That upon a time, when himelf was in great diftreß and extremity, Cæfo was fent unto him from Quinthus Capitolinus, to help at a pinch: and that there was no one man, by whole good service, as he thought, the Weal- pubblic at that time was more relied and reforred, then by his, L. Lucceius the Conufi laft year before glittier in his bright grdoi foith and now, joined with the ret: allowing Cæfo partaker with him in his praiue-worthly acts: he recounted his brave combats, reheared his noble exploits, both in his rodes and voiges, and in the pight fielde-riding & confonelling them in that any way they would contain him fill for to be a Citizen of their own City, rather then of any other, this excellent young gentleman, furnished with all good gifts of nature and fortune, like to prove a singular fary of the publifh affairs, into what City and State ever he fhould come. As for thofe hea and halines (quoth he) L. which was in him miifked and offensive, age and time would daily diminish, and bereave him of it: grave and fage counfell, which now was wanting, would come on space every day more then other. Seeing therefore his fults waxed old and faded, his vertues now were in their growth, flourifh'd, and grew ripe unto perfection: they fhould permit to brave, to rare a perfon, to live filly among them, and be a good old man in this their City. His father among the ret, L. Quininius, furname Ceninvarus, went another way to work: who by not iterating fill his praiues,for fear of heaping more matter of envy and repine, but craving pardon for his widnefs and youthful demnour, befoule: them for his fame at leafewife, to give the lion as a preuent to his father, who neither in word nor deed had ever offended any perfon. Some rook no heed and gave a deaf ear to his prayers, either for modefte and reverenc, or for fear. Others complaining how they and M. their's been beaten and hardly ufed at his hands, bewraile and fhewed plainly by their fhred and church anwers what their judgment was. Besides, the common miilke and male conceived againft the defendant, there was one perilous matter and crime above all that touched him very neer. And that was this: M. Volteius Filerus, who certain years before had been Tribune of the Commons, came in againft him as a wittes, and depoled, how that not long after the plague was in the City, he hapned upon a company of youthes as they made a riot and robbery in the Subura: where there arde a brawland fray, in which his elder brother, a man well in years, and not throughly recovered of his ficknefs, was with a buffet with Cefo his fift fell'd to the ground, and lay there for dead: fo as he was faine to be had home between men arms: and as he deemed, of that blow he died: yet might not he as hainous as the fact was, bring his action and profecute him, for fear of the Conuits of thefe fett years. As Volteius therefore, the whole court was moved therewith, in fo much that Cæfo escaped hardly, from being murdered, in that rage and furey of the people. Then Virginius commanded to lay hold on the man, and to have him away to prifon, The Paritius again by force refifted force, T. Quinthus cried out. That he who was under arrett for to make his appearance, and aniver at a day for his life, and who fhottly fhould come to bighial and be judged, ought not beforeentence of condemnation, and before he had predplead themselves, thus violentely be miiffed. The Tribune replied again, That his meaning was not to punish him before he were condemned: howbeit by his leave he would be to boold as keep him faft in prifon, to be forth-coming at the lau day: that he who had killed a man, might fuffer therefore according to the law of Rome they should award. Then were the Tribunes called unto for their help, who by the means of an indifferent decree then made, fhewed their lawful favours with heed. By verne whereof they forbidd expressly, that he fhould not be imprisoned but pronounced that it was their wil and pleasure, that the defendant fhould personally appear, and a piece of money be promis'd unto the people, in cafe he made deuice and failed of his appearance. Much question there was what sum of money fhould be thought reasonable to be promised. And the matter was put over unto the Senate to be decided: and whilst the Senators fate

A thereupon, the defendant was kept still in ward within the common Hall. At length they thought it good and set it down, that he should put in iuries. And they bound each iury in 2000 fl. After, how many of these should put in bond, was left to the will and discretion of the Tribunes, which was a long time past with the defendant. And no more. With for many iuries the plaintiff bound the defendant personally and permanently to appear at his day. This man was the 1st Roman that went under iuristic and put in good pledges to make his public answer. Thus being enlarged out of the common Hall and dismissed the next night following, unwares to the Conisil, he departed to the Thanes into exile. When the day of this judgement was come, and that it was ali-ed for his excite. That he was out of the town, and gone into banishment: yet nevertheless, their number was, they paied the rest of the night, disposing strong watch and ward in all meet and convenient places of the City. But the day light disclosed the war and the Captain thereof. Appius Herdonius from out of the Capitol proclaimed freedom to all bondmen that would come and follow him: taking upon him fortooth to defend the cause of most miserable captifs: namely, to restore home again unto their native country all such exiled persons, as had been wrongfully expelled, and allow to take away the heavy yoke of slavery and bondage. Which thing he could with it might be effected and brought about with the good will and helping hand of the people of Rome. But in case there were no hope & comfort there then he would lay the Volscians & Eequians ye, and procure what means he could, by all hard courtes and extremities whatsoever. Now the Nobles and Coff, began to see more into the matter: and besides those dangers that were in view, and presently threatening, they feared some practice from the Volscians or the Sabinus: and few, there being already many enemies in the City, the legions and Ticuians shold combine together, and come upon them. Over and besides, let their old enemies and perpetual, the Volscians & Eequians should now at once, not, as aforetime, invade their borders and drive booties, but give an attempt upon the very City, which was already in some part, taken and possessed by enemies. Many and sundry were their fears. But of all other the dread and jealousy of their own bond slaves presented unto them most imminent and present danger: for fear, left every man harboured his enemy at home in his own house, whom neither he could trust securely, nor yet mistrust without some jeopardy: fearing left being once dissevered, he might prove the more malicious and bent to do a mischief. And to such frights they were driven, that with all their concord and agreement, they hardly were able to remedy the matter, and to stop the extremity. So greatly the future troubles like to ensue, exceeding those that presently appeared and were inight, that no man feared either Tribuns and Commons. That mild and gentle kind of malady, in comparison of others, and rising always by occasion of reft from all other. Seemed then by reason of a foreign terror, filled clean and brought aflee. And yet see, that was the only thing in a manner that lay harded upon them, ready to bear down to the ground their state, which now began already to shrink and reell. For so intirely and madly were the Tribuns bent, that they flily would stand to it, and bear men in hand, That it was no war, but a vain illusion and colour of war, and no other, that had teiled on the Capitol for nothing else but to withdraw the minds of the Commons from intending and following their Law: and that a fort of clients, followers, and favorites of the Nobility and Gentry were gathered together, who if they might once perceive that the Law were passed, and that all the ill thev had made, took no effect, would flip away soon and be gone, in more silence I wis, than they thither came. Whereupon they called the people away from their armor and weapons, and summoned them to an assembly, to go through with their Law and Enact it now or never. In the mean time the Coff held a Council fearing a greater mischief to ensue from the Tribuns, the enemies had wrought in the night season. And when word was brought that arms were laid away, and that the people had abandoned their quarters where they were set in guard, then P. Val, leaving his colleague to keep the Senat together, departed hastily out of the Court & went straight into the Temple to the Tribuns: 'What work is here my Masters (unto he:) that are Tribuns? M'

Are ye about to overthrow the State indeed, under the conduct of Appius Herdonius? and who was not able to foli it and do any thing with your bond slaves and servants, was his hap good as to corrupt and instigate your selves? Is this your pleasure and to your good liking, whiles the enemy is over our heads, to have our armor laid aside, and laws preferred? Then turning his speech to the whole multitude: I ye take no regard nor care (O Quirites) of the City if ye pas not for your selves yet have some reverence, and stand in fear of the Gods of your native country, which by your enemies are now taken Prisoners and captive. Is, that most bountiful and Almighty God, Queen Juno and Minerva, with all the rest of Gods, Goddeses (and heavenly lights) are befieged: Outlaws and bond slaves are encamped about your Tsueral Gods, and have in possession the Prorectors and Patrons of your City. Is this, think ye, the form of a wife and well governed City? Is it in good case indeed and as it ought to be? So many enemies nor only within the walls, but also afoot upon the hill within the City, over looking and condemning both Hall and Court: and all the while, the people assembled in the Hall. Senators sit in Court like as when we enjoyed peace and were at rest: the Senator he delivereth his opinion at the Council boord: the citizens of Rome besides, are but in their ingredients and giving their voyces. And had her not been more meet and decent that both Nobility and Commonality, Consuls and Tribuns. God and Man, all armed together, should let to their helping hand, should run up into the Capitol to deliver, fast and in quiet that most lately and face passing honore of Hp.

Opt. Macc. O Father Roundall, vouchsafe, I beseech thee, that mind and that courage unto thy succours and policy, whereby some time thou didst recover and win again this freedom from those fame Sabins, betrayed and lost by corruption, and for a sum of gold: command them to enter even that way which thou first ledst, and thy valorous army followed after. Lo, I the Consul fail, but forth as a mortal man possibly may, will follow thee an immortal God, and thy footsteps. The conclusion of his speech was this, That as he put himself in arms, so all the Romans shall do the like, And in case any man went about to hinder this he would without regard of Consuls rule and dignity, or Tribuns authority & might, pass for no faced or inviolable laws: but what

A or otherwise he was in Capitol, in market place, all as one, take him for an enemy, and deal accordingly, let the Tribuns (for as much as they forbade to take arms against Ap. Herodotus) command hardyly, and spare not, to arm against P. Valerius the Conful: it should be well seen that he would dare and do that by the Tribuns, which the first of his house and name sometime had done by the KK. A great broil was toward, and no other like, but that they would have gone together by the ears, and that the mutiny of the Romans, would have been a godly spectacle to the enemies for to behold. But all this while, neither could the law be preferred, nor the Conful go up into the Capitol. The night at length stayed the brants begun, and built all, the Tribuns bearing the armed forces of the Conils, yeilded to the darkness of the night, and gave over, Now when the principal Authors of the discord were once gone out of the way, The Nobles went about to the Commons, intruding themselves into their companies as they were not in knots together: where they would enter into talk and discourse with them, according to the present occasions and the time, admonishing them to take heed into what danger they brought the State, for as much as now (quoth they) it is not a matter of debate between the Senators and Commons: but both Senators and Commons, the Cattle and strongest hold of the City, the Temples of the Gods; their houses both publick and private, were ready to be yeilded unto the enemies. While these things were a practicing in the common place, for to appease the detention: the Conuls for fear, left the Sabins or the Venetians, enemies both, should stir and rise, were gone to the gates, and all about the walls. The same night came tidings also to Tusculum of the taking of the Castle, the surpriung of the Capitol, and likewise of the trouble some State wherein the City was, At that time was L. Camillus, Dictator of Tusculum: he forthwith called a Senate together, brought in the Messengers of the foretold news, and thought it very expedient and needful not to wait until there came Embassadors from Rome to crave their aid: for that the present peril it fell alone, the urgent necessity, their social Gods, and the faithful bond of league, required no less at their hands than to rend succors: adding moreover, that the Gods would never give them the like occasion and opportunity again, to gratifie the Romans: to bind and oblige them by a bound benefit and pleasure done, to mighty a City, and to confer a neighborly benefit. Whereupon it was decreed, to receive them with all speed. The able men of service were taken up and enrolled, mention and armor given them in their hands: who advancing toward Rome by break of day, seemed a far off to be enemies, and were taken for the Aequians or Volkitian.

But afterwards, when this foolish fear was overblown, they were received into the City: and marched down in order of barrell to the market place. Where, at the same time Pulb. Valerius having left his fellow Conul to guard and fortify the gates, was setting his men in array. The authority of the man had prevailed with the people, for he promised and affirmd them, that if the Capitol were once recovered, and the City fell in quiet, if they would suffer him to be informed what fraudulent and secret mischief was underhand practiced by the Tribuns under colour of this Law, he would in remembrance of his ancestors, and of his surname (which in regard of the affectionate love unto the people, as a special care, as it were by inheritance from his forefathers, was recommended unto him) not hinder and trouble the meetings and assemblies of the Commons, nor cross and thwart their proceedings. They followed him therefore as their Captain, and they the Tribuns what they could (for all would not serve) advanced forward, and matched up against the rising of the Capitol Hill. The Tusculan Legion stuck close unto them, and followed after. Citizens and Associates both did their best, and strove who should regain the Capitol first, and have the honor of that day. Each Captain exhorted and encouraged his men, then began the enemies to fear, and will not well what to tryst unto, but only the intuition of the place. Then the Romans and their allies seeing their fear, came forward and advanced their standards against them. Now by this time were they broken into the port of the Temple. Where P. Valerius fighting manfully among the formost in the vanguard, was slain, P. Valerius a Consul, F. F. a Consular man, saw him when he fell: who gave his men in charge to cover his body, and kept himself into the Consils room, and fought in his stead. The soldiers for heat and eagernes of fight, took no regard, and came to no knowledge of this so great mischance, but got the victory, ere they knew that they fought without their Captain. Many of the outlaws were there slain, and polluted the Temple with their blood. Many taken alive Prisoners, and Herodotus himself was slain outright, so the Capitol was again recovered. The captives, as they were either bond or free, were executed every one according to their condition and place. The Tusculians had thanks given them. The Capitol was cleansed, purged, and hallowed anew. The Commons, as it is reported, call’d Quadrans or mice into the Consil his house, that he might with greater pomp of funerals be brought to the ground.

When all was appeased and in quiet, the Tribuns were called with the Nobles to perform the promise of P. Valerius: they were instant also with L. Lucullus, to afford the soul, and keep it from blame of his fellow Conul late deceased: and to permit the law to be fet on foot and go forward. The Conul studiously demised to suffer them to meddle with the law before he had instituted a fellow in his place. And these contentions held unto the time of the grand Election for the filling up of a new Conul. And in the month December, after much fit and laboring of the Nobles, was L. Q. Cincius Consul, the father of Cato, created Conul and presently to enter into his office. The Commons herewith were much troubled and stricken dead, now that they they were to have an angry Conful, and mighty withal: considering the favour of the Nobles, wherein he stood, and his own virtue & prowess beside; by reason also of this three sons of whom there was not one, that for hauteur of mind came behind Cæs, and for wisdom, discretion, and moderation (when time and occasion served) went far beyond him. Who being once entrèd into his office, in all his publick speeches and orations, continually ceased not as well to bridle, restrain, and keep in the Commonality, as also to chastife sharply the Senate; through the remembrance of which degree & want of courage, it was come to pass that the Tribuns became now to continue still in office, and not as in the Common-wealth of the people of Röm, but as in some unly and disordered house, with their lawful tongue raised as it were, and ruled the colo: saying, That to gether with his son Cæs all virtue and constancy, all commendable qualities that grace young Gentlemen both in war and peace, were chased and utterly banished out of the City of Röm.

In lieu whereof, blablers, mutinous persons, and lowers of faction and division, are become Tribuns the second, third, and the third time by imprudent councils & few practises live leafe in the City like Princes and Kings. That same Aclus Virginus there, (quoth he) hath he delivered less punishment than Apl. Herodion, because he was not in the Capitol with the rabble of other Rebels? Nay, much more a good deal, it would weigh the matter a great and truly.

Herodion, (if there were nothing else) yet by professing himself to be an enemy, advertisit you, and gave you warning in a manner to arm your selves. But he, by bearing you down to confess, that there was no war, what did be else but disarm you, and as it were, take your weapons from you, and offer you naked to the devotion and mercy of your bondmen and outlaws? And have ye (under correction be it spoken, and laying the reverence and honor of C. Claudius here, and P. Valerius that dead is) advanced your enigms up the Capitol Hill, before you had rid the market place and common Hall of their enemies? It is a shame (before God and man I speak it) when our enemies were in the Capitol and Capitol, when the Captain and Ringleader of outlaws and slaves, abode and lodged within the Chappels and Sanctuaries of Cap, Opt. Mex., to the proclamation and polluting of all, that they at Tufculum should take them to their weapons before us of Röm, and that it should be doubted, whether L. Mamilius the Tusculum General, or P. Valerius, and C. Claudius, the Roman Consils, should have the Fortresses of Röm: and that we, who heretofore would not suffer the Latins in their own defence, when they had their enemies in their borders, should again as once to take weapon in hand, should now our selves have been surprised and demolished, had not they, the very same Latins of their own accord, put themselves into armor for our fakes, in this your succouring and helping the Commons; (O ye Tribuns) to expel and cast them unarmed before the enemy, to have their throats cut? I wis, if the meanest or basest person of your commonality, which you have dismembrd from the whole body of the people been fided, and made it, as it were the native country of your own, and a Common-wealth peculiar only to your selves: If any one of them I say, should bring you word, that his house was burnt about, with a company of servants and slaves in armor, you would think it meet that he were aided and succourd: And when Cap, Opt. Mex., was besieged with a power of armed onlaws and bondslaves, was he not worthy of man help? And yet these men would be counsell, and held for Sacrosancti, i. Sacred and inviolable, with whom the very Gods themselves are M. not fared and inviolate. And notwithstanding, that ye are thus overchargd and stayned with sins both against God and Man, ye go up and down, and say, That this year you will get your law to pass, and make it sure. In truth if ye prefer it again, then I must needs say the Common-weal is ill bled, and had a shrewd turn that day whereon I was created Conils, and wrore a good deal so at what time P. Valerius the Conful was slain. But now first and foremost (quoth he) O Quires, my colleague and I both, are minded to lead forth our legions immediately against the Volscians and the Equians, show the Divine Providence of God hath appointed it, I know not, but surely we find the Gods more gracious and favorable unto us in our wars ordinarily, than in time of peace. And in what danger we had with those nations, in case they had known that the Capitol was in the hands and possession of outlaws, better it is to gust by that which is past, than to try indeed by present experience. The Conful his Oration moved and galled the Commons; The Nobles took heart, and were in a good belief that the world was well mended, and the state better reformed. The other Cof, more hearty to follow than to lead, and who was well content, that his fellow had broken the ice before, and taken in hand to deal first into weighty a matter, willingly challenged unto himself the charge to perform the pret & office of a Conful, in the execution and accomplishment of those desings. But then the Tribuns made a game therat, and letting light at the Conful his words, inferred again and demanded, how the Conuls would lead out an army, and no man suffer them to moulder flourishes. Marry (quoth Quires) we need no muttering at all: for, at what time as P. Valerius armed the Commons to recover again the Capitol, they were all sworn up to him, and took their oath in this form, To observe together at the Conful his commandement, and not depart from their colours without his leave and licence. We will and charge you all therefore, that have taken this oath to present your felves to morrow, with your armour at the lake of Regillus without fail. Then the Tribuns began to cavil and wrangle and would needs have the people dischargd in their conscience of that oath; alitting how they would take that military Sacrament. Quires was but a private person, There was not as yet, that neglect & contempt of the Gods entered into the world, which now reigneth every where and is to rife: neither did men interpret their oaths, and continue laws, to serve their own purpose,

A purpose, but rather attempted and framed their lives and demeanour thereunto. The Tribunes therefore, seeing no hope to hinder the thing, began themselves to treat about setting forward the army: and the rather, because there ran a rumour abroad, that the Angors were commanded to attend at the lake Regillus: and that by them a place should be hallowed and consecrate there, wherein the Conuls might duly commune and confer with the people, concerning all matters, according to the flight of birds: to the end that whatsoever at Rome had passed under a law, entered by the violent force of the Tribunes: the same might there in a lawfull assembly and general Session, be abrogated & made void by the suffrages of the soldiers, who without doubt would accord to that, which should请and the Conuls pleasure. For by reason that there was no B appeale in force without the city, above one, the Tribunes themselves also, if they came thither, should be subject as well as the multitude besides of the people, to the commandment of the Conuls. These matters feared them indeed and put them in a bodily fear, but the greatest thing above all the rest that disquieted their hearts was this, that Q. Licinius oftentimes had given out and said, that he would not call an assembly of the people for the election of Conuls, for that the city was grown far out of frame and temper, that it might not be reformed and cured with ordinary and usual remedies: but that the Common-wealth had more need of a Dictator, that whooeover were about to trouble the state of the city, might well know that there was an absolute D. Atarship, that checked all appeals. The Senat was assembled at that time in the Capitol: this time came the Tribunes with their Commons greatly disquieted and troubled. The multitude cried C out and betought one while the Conuls of their favour, another while the LL. of the Senat of D their protection; but could not once remove the Conul from his opinion (such a pitch had he taken) before the Tribunes gave their word and faithfull promise, that they would be wholly ruled and ordered by the Senators. Then the Conul pronounced the demands and petitions of the Tribunes and Commons, and the Senat enacted these orders and decrees. First, that neither the Tribunes should that year prefer their law: nor the Conuls lead out of the city any army. Item, from henceforth, the Senat deemed it not to stand with the weal publick, that Magistrates should continue still in place from year to year, and that the same persons should be more than once chosen Tribunes. The Conuls for their part, were overruled and ordered by the Senators. But, lay and gainlay what the Conuls would, the same Tribunes were chosen anew: and the Nobles also because they would not be one ace behind hand with the Commons, would needs choose L. Quentin as his wife for their Conul again. But all the year through was not the Conul more earnest and vehemenc in any action and speech whatsoever then in this. Should I marvell my Lords of the Council (spoth he) that you bear no stroke with the Commonly, and your authority is so little worth among? Why, you, even your own selves let light thereby: seeing forboth, the Common they, brake the ordinance of the Senat, touching the continuance of Magistrates yeares also, because ye would E not seem to yield one inch in summe and folly to the multitude, are as ready and willing to F enrage the famer: as who would say; this were to have more rule and authority in a city, namely, to use more levity, incon sistence, and licentiousnesse. For it is a point of much more lightnesse G and vanity, I assure you, for men to disfarrall the acts and decrees of their own making, then of H others. Ye that be Senators and Fathers of the C. Wiminate, and Iaparte not, the ignorant, lewd I and incomconsiderate multitude: ye that should give good examples to others, sin ye hardly your selves, and do amends by the others: neither then let others by your example do well: J too large as I, for my part, take not after the Tribunes, nor suffer my selve to be declared Colagin, by K an express act of the Senat. As to you, O Claudius, I would exhort you, that both your felow would L restrain the people of Rome of this their licentiousnesse, that they have not their defire, and M all that you would pervade your felow thus much of me, that to farce will I be from thinking N my honour by you impared, rather I will take my glory to be increased by the defiling and O refusing a dignity, and the ill will and envy abated and diminished, that might grow upon the P communion thereof. Whereupon both the Conuls jointly together made an edict and proclamation Q that no man shouild by his voice Jo nominal Quinins, Conul: and if any man did, they would not allow of his election. So there were created Conuls. Q. Fabius Vibulanus the third time, and S L. Cornelius Malagonius the first in this year was held a seeling and numbering of the citizens, but touching the Lustrum, there was some estate of conference, because the Capitol had been taken, and the Conull flaim. When Q. Fabius and L. Cornelius were thus Conuls, suddenly in the very beginning of their year began great treaties for the Tribunes on the one side, as their guile was, let the Commons work the Latins and Herinicks on the other side, sent word of great wars from the Volcicns & Equians: that the Volcicns legions were already at Anniwm, and the Colicin is felt greatly suspected to rebel. Yet hardly could the Tribunes be brought to agree, that preparation should be made forth and to prevent this war. But upon these news, the Conuls parted between themselves the charge of all affairs. Fabius was appointed to lead forth an army to Anniwm: and Cornelius to abide at Rome for the defence of the city, for fear left some part of their enemies. As the Equians manner was in running camp make rodes and forget the territories about. The Herinicks and Latins were by virtue of the league, charged with the finding of certain soldiers, so that the whole army should consist ofij parts of consedates and one third of citizens. When, at the day appointed the Allies were come, the Conul pitched down his tents without the gate Capena: from whence when he had taken a general mutter and purged his armie, he marched towards Anniwm.
and encamped himself not far, either from the town, or the standing camp of his enemies: where H. the Volscians seeing no forces yet come unto them from the Aequians, had no heart to fight, but made preparation how they might keep themselves quiet and safe, within their mure and ramp.

The morrow after, Fabius made not one entire battell of Allies and citizens mingled togeth., but three battells severally by themselves, of three sundry nations, & ranged them along all about the countercarp and trench of his enemies. Himself was in the midst with the Roman legions, and gave commandment to observe heedfully and mark the signall: that the Allies also should both begin battell and also retire, when he found the retret. In like sort he placed the horsermen behind the Principe at the back of each ballest. Thus in three sundry parts he assailed the camp, and environed it round about, and charging lustily hard upon them on every side, he beat the Volscians down from their rampier, for they were not able to endure his violence. And having gotten over all their trenches and fortifications, he drave the fearful multitude clean out of their hold, that now were retir'd to a side and corner of the camp. The horsemen might not easily get over the trench, and flood full of purpose to behold the fight, and to mark their when they should file: but having once gotten them in the open fields, they chased them as they ran a way on heaps: and by killing them in their fearfull flight, deferred their part in that victory. Great was the execution both within the camp, and also without the rampiers, as they fled, but greater was the pillage, for that the enemies had much ado to carry their armour away with them, and but that they throwed themselves as they fled in the woods, they had perish'd every man. During these exploits about Antium, the Aequians having fear before them the talliet and lustieth K. young men they had, intruped the citie of Tusculum, upon a sudden and at unawares in the night, and with the rest of their power they were encamped not far from the walls of Tusculum, intending to interceopt and lay the army of their enemies. Times hierence came in poite to Rome, and from Rome to the camp before Antium: which troubled the Romans as much as it news had been brought, that the Capitol was taken. So freth in remembrance was the late defeat of the Tusculans: and the like jealousy seeming to challenge and redemand remembled and necessity, Fabius issuing all other things aside, caused the booty in all hale to be conveyed out of the camp to Antium: where having left an indifferent guard, he halted in space in order of ballest toward Tusculum; by reason whereof, the soldiers could take nothing with them, but their armour, and such baked or boiled meats as were at hand ready. The Conull (Corvinus) sent a convoy of victuals unto them from Rome. Thus for certain months continued the war at Tusculum. The Conull (Fabius) with one part of his host sallied the camp of the Aequians: for the other part he had let the Tusculans have, to win again their fortres. Against all force it was impregnable, but in the end famine constrained the enemies to abandon it. To which extremity being at length driven, they were by the Tusculans disarmed and compelled to passen under the yoke. Who as they fled homeward with shame enough, were overtaken by the Roman Conull in Alginum, and put to the word every one. After this victory, he encamped with the rest of his army at Colame, for to the pace is named. The other Conull likewise seeing that there was no danger threatening the walls of Rome, now that the enemy was discomfited & repuls'd, departed him self from the city. So the Conulls entering two waies the borders of their enemies, made sharp war and ipovted the Volscians of the one side, and the Aequians on the other. I find in most writers that the Aequians in this year rebelled: and that L. Cornelius the Conull managed that war and won the town. But for as much as there is no mention made of that matter in any ancient writers, I dare not avouch it for a certain truth.

This war was no sooner brought to an end, but the domesticall Tribunes war at home put the Nobles in fear: for the Tribunes cried out that this was cauculose and fraudulent dealing, thus to keep the armies abroad, for nothing els but to dispoint them for publishing the law. Yet nevertheless, since they had begun it, they would not give over, but go through with it, and an end, Howbeit P. Lutcretius, president of the city for the time prevailed thus much with them, That all Tribunitian actions should hang & be deferred unto the coming of the Conulls. There was besides a new occasion arose of fresh trouble. A. Cornelius and Quintus Servillus, Quellors, gave Nummons to M. Volfecus to make his answer at a day, who laid to his charge that he without all doubt, had been falsely witness against Caeo. For by many prelumptions and evidences it appeare, that neither Volfecus his brother, from the first time that he fell sick and took his bed, was at any time seen openly in the streets, or so much as to have fit up, and mended any whilste of that disease which held him many months, he languished and confirmed away to death: nor about that time, whereon the deponent supposed the deed was done, was Caeo once seen at Rome: it being plainly affirmed and proved by those who served together with him in the wars, that he was ordinarily all the time fighting under his colours as well as they, without any passport or licence to depart. And to make this good, many there were that of themselves privately challeged Volfecus, and offered to traverse the law and to be tried by any indifferent and competent judges. But when he durft not abide the trial and to be judged, all these things put together and to commend one to the other made men doubt no more of the condemnation of Volfecus then of Caeo, which was grounded upon the bare testimony of Volfecus. The Tribunes were only the flay, who said plainly they would not suffer the Quellors to hold any feisions or judiciall court, for the trial of the defendant, before they had a solemn assembly about their law. So were both these matters

A. matters put off unto the Conuls coming. Who being entered with triumph into the city, with their victorious armies, & no words made of the law, many thought the Tribuns were clean danted and friken dead. But they (for that the year now was at an end) aspiring to be Tribuns the fourth time, left all their hot contention for the law; and reserved themselves wholly to argue and reason at the assembly for the Election of new Magistrates. And albeit the Conuls had sent all their might and main against the continuity of the Tribunship, as earnestly, as if a law had been propagated, tending to the usurping and abridging of their majesty, yet got the Tribuns the malice, and had the hand of them in the end. In this year peace was granted upon respect and petition, unto the Equians. And the Seffing, which the year before began, was now finished.

B. And this was counted the tenth general Survey and tolem purging of the cite from the foundation thereof. There were numbered in the Cente-book of citizens 133419. polities. A glorious and honourable venit was unto the Conuls, both at home and in war. For they not onely procured peace abroad, but also the citie was, if not in perfect concord and unity, yet in little trouble than at other times. L. Minutius, and L. Naunius, that there were created Conuls, entered upon the reliques of the two matters begun the former year. And much after one fort, as the conuls crossed the going forward of the law, to the Tribunes hindered the judiciale proceeding against Vellius. But the new Quellors were men of more power and greater authority. For together with M. Valerius, the son of Valerius, and nephew of Vellius, was T. Quincius Capitolinus created Quellour, a man that had been thrice Conul. For such therefore, as Cæs, the worthieth gentleman of all other, and the very ornament of the youth of Rome, could not be relitried again, neither to the house of the Quinius, nor the commonwealth, be pursued of more pitie, with just & lawfull war, and false witnesse, who would not suffer on any hand the innocent perlone to have the liberty to plead in his own defence. And when Verrines, most of all the other Tribunes was earnest to publish the law, the Conuls had two months repetit given them to consider thereof, and look into it throughly: to the end, that when they had advertised the people what secret fraud and inconvenience was hidden and lurked therein, they might afterwards suffer them to proceed to a crountie, and gather voices accordingly. This space between granted, brought the cite into a good and quiet state.

But the Equians would not abide, that long it should continue; Who having broken the league, which the year before was made with the Romans, chose Gracchus Cælius for their governor and general, who was in those daites the greatest man among the Equians. Under the conduct of this Gracchus, they enterd in warlike manner the country of Lanuvium, and from thence into the territory of Tusculum, looting and timbering as they went: and being laden with preyes and wares, they yett their tents in Algicinu. Thither repaired from Rome into their camp, Q. Fabius P. Valerius, and A. Posthumius as embassadours, to provide of wounds received, and to demand amends and satisfaction according to covenant. The Generall of the Equians seemed to grant them audience, and will'd them to declare what meafage and commision they had from the Senat of Rome, unto the oakes; for that himelfe had some other matters to dispatch the while. Now there grew a mighty great Oakke hard by the General his pavilion, spreading the branches even over it, and the fhowd thereof covered for a cold sitting place. Then one of the Embassadours, as he went his way, * Let both the faced Oakke (quoth he) and what divine power forever is reared in this place, hear and know that by you first the league is broken, who now regard our present complaints, and shortly sliff our valiant armies, when we shall proficere and revenge at once the diuouall breach, both of Gods laws and mans. So soon as the Embassadours were returned to Rome, the Senat gave direction, that one of the Conuls should lead forth an army against Gracchus, into Algicinu, and the other have in commision, to wait the borders of the Equianis. The Tribunes, as their manner was, hindered the matter and peradventure had flared it altogether, but for a new fearful occurrent that suddenly came in the neck of the other. For a mighty power of Sabines were approch'd well near to the walls of the citie, robbing, spoiling and destroying all before them with sword and fire. The territorie was pitiously round about laid desolate, and the citie there withore terrified. Then the Commons from Rome came down, and gently they took weapons in hand: and (say what the Tribuns would against it) two great armies were enrolled. Naunius had the leading of the one against the Sabines: and being encamped at Ercusum, with rides and incursions, and thole for the mott part by night, made such foule work and walt in The Sabines country, that in comparision thereof, the lands about Rome, seemed as if they had not been once touched. Minutius in his exploits, had neither like good succece, nor yet equal courage and volute of heart. For having pitched his tents not far from the enemy, and received no great foile and loike at his hands to speak of, yet he kept himselfe for tear within the camp. When when the enemies perceived, they grew more bold (as can mony the courage of one incense with the courage of another) and sallied the camp in the night lesson: but seeing that plain force little prevailed, the morrow after they raifed mounts, and cast trenches round about. But before they bad with their countermures and rampiers stoped up all passages, five horison, being even among the guards of the enemies, brought newes to Rome, that the Conul with his armes was besieged. Nothing coude there have hapned to little throught of, and unlooked for: whereupon there was such fear, trembling, and quaking, as if the enemies had besieged not the camp, but the very citie, Naunius the Conul they send for, and because they thought him like to doe but small good, they agreed therfore to creat a Dictator, who might might refer to again the disdrelled state of the C. W. And L. Viques, as Censeourus by content of all H men was nominated. Now a world and wonder it is to hear them speak that in regard of riches depriest all things else, and suppose there can be no great honour and vertue, but where wealth and riches do flow in excede. This L. Viquesius, the only hope of the Romans, a man who was to let upright their Empire now disdrelled, occupied then a piece of ground, to the quantity of four acres, and called this day Quinta praca, i. Quinctius his meddows, on the other side of Tyber, over against that very place, where now the Aranual and Shipdocks are, and there was he found digging a ditch, and bearing hard on his ipade, or else a plowing the ground, I wait not whether, but bufe and earnest about some fruitful work, no doubt he was and after labours passed on both sides between him and the Embaladores that were sent, he was requested by them, that I would put on his belt gown, and that which might turn to the good of himself and the commmonwealth, bear a message from the Senat First, he marvelled what the matter should be & very,often asking of them if all were well, the vife his wife Rustic a bring him forth his Senates robes firstway, out of his ofice cottage; which he put on his back (but first he brush'd off the dust, and wiped away his sweat, and made himself somewhat mannerly), and then came forthunto them, who in joyous manner, by way of congratulation filled him by the name of Dictator calling hard upon him to repair into the city, and declaring in how doubfull times the amrre flood. Then was there large ready provided for Quintus, at the cities colt, and being ferried over the river, his three sons met him and received him first, then others of his kinsfolk and friends, and after the more part of the Senators. Thus attended with this frequent company, and with the K. Sergeants going before, was he brought to his house. Great concourse there was of the Coms: but no thing to joyous were they, to see Quinctius, supposing that government of his over-great and autoluc, and himself a man in time of his rules, so imperserious. And for that might verly, nothing was done, but a good standing watch kept in the city. The morrow after, the Dictator being come into the common place of assembly before day-light, appointed General of the horde, L. Tarquinius, of Noble bloud decended, a man who for mere poverty had ever served on foot, but of all the flower of Rome was reputed and taken to be a bravest in a guise, and an excellent foildier. Then Quinctus with the General of horde men, mounteth into the pulpit solt, pro-claimeth a publieke vacation or Lawtefed: commandeth all shop windows through the city to be shut, and chargeth that no man should follow any privet business of his own. Then as may as were of age to fight, were willing to shew them selves in their armours, before the tentet in Mars held, every one with victuals drest for five dasizes, and with twelve forked staffs a piece for to toppish in the rampart. And that whosoever were above that age, and were unwieldy, and not meet for service should dresse and provide victuals for the next soildier unto him, whiles he himself made ready his armours, and fought for staves aforesaid. Thus ran the young able men to and fro, to furnish themselves with staves, and took whatsoever they could find, and whatsoever was next hand: no man was forbidden, and so they were all ready with heart and good will, according to the Dictator his proclamation. Then went the Dictator forth with the legions of foot-cmen, the Master of the horde likewise with his men of arms, in such good order and array, as might ot only serve for a speedie march to rid ground, but allo for a set barrell if occasion served. "In M e both regiments they spared not to encourage and exhort their soildiers, according as the present time required: 4 pulling them to set foot forward, to mend their pace and make speed, that by night time they might reach to their enemies: & no (say they) before there was great work for that the Roman Consil and army were besieged, and had now three dasizes already been pent up falt instealid: and what might happen in one day or one night, no man knew: for oftentimes ie in the twinkling of an eye, and in the very turning of an hand, there fall out accidents of right great moment and importance. On more space Enigne crieth one: follow soildier faith-nother. Thus went they also hastily forward, and all to please and gratifie their captains. So that by midnight they were come into Aldegam: and so soon as they perceived their enemies to be nearest hand they pitched down their enignes. Then the Dictator rode about at a great as he could see in the dark, and having viewed well the situation, coaling and station of the camp, commanded the Marhsals and Colonels to give direction, That all the carriage and bagages, should be laid up together in one place, and the soildiers with their armours and staves only, should come again into their ranks. What he commanded was soon done. Then in the same order that he marched, he dreweth out his host in length, and compasseth the camp of his enemies, and commandeth them all (upon a signal or word word given) to set up a shour, and presently upon the shour to call a trecch & every man stuck down his pala in the ramiper. Havving given them the charge, straight ways the shour was all follwed. The soildiers do that which they were bidden: the shour was heard over all the camp of the enemies, yea, and into the Comfl his camp causing in one great ear, in the other exceeding joy. The Romans rejoicing one with another to near the shour of their fellow-citizens and countriremen, with a concert of their coming to recontents, begin of themselves from their sentinels and Corps de grand, to threaten and remeire their enemies. The Comsil let them forward and fail, there was now no stayng for the matter, nor delays to be made: for that was apperently by that alarm, that not only their friends were come with succours but also had begun to skirmish: and that it was all to nothing, that their enemies camp, was already on the outward side assaIoted. Whereupon, he commanded his soildiers to arm, and to follow hard after him. Thus in the night began the skirmish, and
A and the legions of a Dictator by their outcry and shouting made signification that the enemies on that side also were driven to their shifts and in great hazard. By this time the Equians had afforded themselves to impress them in their trenching and making of their rampes, to the end that they might not be compassed about; but the alarme was given and the skirmish already begun by their enemies within; fearing therefore, left they would break through the midst of their camp, they turned from the pioners and workmen without, to them that fought within, and thereby gave them other leave to plie their work and labour all the night long at their pleasure and to maintain their skirmish with the Con. until day light. Now by the break of day they were entrenched on every side by the Dictator, and were scarce able to hold out battel with one of the armies. Then the bolt of Quinismus, which presently upon the finishing of the trench returned to their weapons, entering of the mores and rampes of the enemies. Here began a fresh conflict again and yet the former nothing abated. The enemies then leaving themselves thus dispersed and to hardly driven on every side, left fighting and fell to-intruding; they befouged the Con. on one side and the Dictator on the other, that they would not get the victorie by effusion of blood and cruel massacre, but would permit them to go their ways naked without their weapons. The Conful polished them off to the Dictator: who being in great wrath and displeasure, would not be contented without their shame and ignominy besides. But commanded that Claudius their general with other Colonels and Captains should be brought bound unto him. Item, he enjoined them to abandon & quit the town of Corbo: as for the Equians blood, he sought nor for it, he had no need thereof; they might depart with their lives. Howbeit, because he would have it now at length, maugre their heads, confessed, that the nation was vanquished and subdued; this will and pleasure was they should passe all under the yoke or gallows: the manner whereof is this. They took three priests or javelins, and set two of them pitched in the ground endlong, and their overthrow fainted unto the other. Under this kind of gallows the Dictator compelled the Equians to go. Thus having gotten the tents of the enemies full of all kind of store (for naked he fent them under the yoke) the whole pilage he bestowed upon his own loudiers only: and rebuking sharply the Conful by any and the Col. himselle, Ye shall (quoth he) loudiers go without your part of booty as won of the enemy, whose booty ye had like your selves to have been. And as for thee, O M. Libanius, until thou begin to have the heart and courage becomning a Conful, then shalt be a Lieutenant nor only over their legions. So Minutius being discharged of the Confulship, remained still as he was commanded, with the army. But to well were more content in those days, willingly to yield obedience to them that better could command, that this army in remembrance hereof as of a favour received, rather than of a disgrace offered, both ordained for the Dictator a coronation of gold of one pound weight: and also when he went homeward, saluted him by the name of his Patron. At Rome the Senate being assembled together by Q. Fabius Prosvol of the city, decreed that Quinismus should enter the city in triumph with his army marching in battel array as he came. Before his chariot was led the commanders of his enemies: the enigines are carried as before, then followed the army laden with spoil and pilage. Great cheer and banquets were set out, men lay upon tables at every mans door. Thus making merry, they followed the chariot with songs of triumph, with sports and merry conourse, as they are wont to do at their great and solemn feasts. The same day L. Mamilius the Tuscian, with the approbation and good liking of all men, was enfranchis citizen of Rome. And forthwith would the Dictat. have regigned up his office, but that the Court held for the trial of M. Valerius, ended of bearing false witness, flayed him: and in truth, the Tribunes would have hindered the judicial proceeding against him, if they had not been in awe of the Dictator. But Valerius was convassed and had sentence, and departed to Latium in exile. And Quinismus having taken the Dictatorship for six months, gazet over the nineteenth day after he entered into it. About the same time the Conful Naussins fought valiantly with the Sabines at Eresium: who besides the wating of the fields, had an overthrow in fight. Fabius was sent into Algidum, to succeed in the roome of Minutius. In the end of the year, the Tribunes began to live about their law; but because the two armies were absent, the Senator prevailed so much at that time, that no bills were pronounced unto the people: The Commons likewise obtained, that they might create the self-same Tribunes, now the fifth time. The report goeth, that there were seen in the Capitol, wolves chased away by hounds: for which strange light the Capitol was purged. And there were the instants of that year. Then followed Confuls Q. Minutius & M. Horatius Pulvinius.

In the beginning of which year, whiles all was quiet abroad, the same Tribunes and the same law caused dissension and sedition at home: which would have grown to a farther mischief if such heats men were, had not word been brought, as it were of let purpose, that the garison at Corbo was surprized in the night by the Equians and put to the sword: whereupon the Confuls called the Senat together: and order was given, that they should lead a Subitory army and with a running camp invade Algidum. Then was the little about the law laid aside clean, and a new contention arose about the matters. But the Confuls with all their authority, were overawed of the Commons, by the hand and assistance of the Tribunes. At what time a new trouble put them in fear: intelligence came, that a power of sabines were come down already into the territories of Rome for to fetch booties and make spoils: and from thence advanced against the city, upon which fear, the Tribunes were content that loudiers should be put, yet not without this covenant indentific That for as much as they had now themselves these five years been troubled off and deluded, & that this protectorship of theirs flood the Commons in little stead, in regard of their small number, therefore, there should from thenceforth be ten creted Tribunes of the Commona. the Nobles were so near driven and to such straights, that they will, nill they, yield them mult there too: with this proviso, that they should never after Elect the same men Tribunes twice. And for fear that this act should after the war was once past, turn to nothing, like as others had done before, vary they went in hand immediately to call a court for the Election of the Tribunes. So in the 26 year from the first Tribunes of the Commons chosen, there were ten creted out of very Claflins, two.
And by an act it was provided, that in such sort they should be created ever after. The mutters then being taken and foldiers enrolled, Miniutus went with a power against the Sabines, but found not the enemy. And Horatius, because the Equians after they had dunt the garison at Corbina to the sword, and won Hortana besides, fought with them in Algidum. Many a man there he flew, and drove his enemies not only out of Algidum, but also out of Corbina and Hortana. As for Corbina he utterly razed it, for betraying the garison there. After this, were M. Valerius and S. Virginius made Consuls. At quiet they were both at home and abroad. But great scarcity there was of corn, by reason of the untemper and unfeasable rain that fell. A bill there was preferred, that the mount Aurea should be turned to Commons. And the same Tribunes were made again who, all the year following, when T. Romulus and C. Veturius were Consuls, in all their Halls and af embled, still published the law: saying, it was a shame, that their number was thus increas of no purpose, in case their affairs should lie dead in their two years, as they had done in the whole 5 years past. While they were earnestly debating these things, fearfull messengers came in all hnt from Tuscum, with news, that the Equians were in the territory of Tuscum. The fresh defect of that nation would not suffer the Romans to have their holding hand. Whereupon both Consuls were sent with an army, and met with the enemies in Algidum in their wonted haunt and accustomed place, where they encountered and struck a battle in which were slain about 7000 enemies. The rest were put to flight. A huge booty there was gotten, which the Consuls told out-right; by reason of the want of mony in their common treasury. But this cased the suitors to repine and grudge, and in the end ministrated matter to the Tribunes, to accu the Commons into the Consuls. As soon therefore as they were out of their office, when Sp.
Tarrusius and A. Eternus were Consuls, Romulus was arrested and put in jail by C. Claudius Cicca for the Tribunes. And Veturius was likewise troubled by C. Halimus an Edile of L Warden of the Commons, Condemned they both the one and the other, to the great indigna of the Nobles. Romulus was fined in * 10000 Arefes. Veturius in * 15000. But for all this hard hap and calamity that befell to tho' former Consuls, the new were never a jot more remife and cool in the quarel: saying, We may also be called and condemned, and both Commons and Tribunes never the neeter to comphie and enact their law. Then the Tribunes giving over the law, which now by propounding only to oft, was waxen stale and old, began more genly to deal with the Senators, praying them to make an end once of all strife and contention. And in case that the laws of the Commons so dislik'd and displeased them, they requist them to suffer certain Law makers to be created indifferently out of the Commonalty, as well as of the Nobility, who might with devils acts commodious & profitable to both parts and to the equal liberty and freedom of all. As M for the lubblance it fell at this motion, the Senators refused not: but they flatly said, that none but of the Nobility should have the making of those laws. Seeing then they agreed thus about the laws, differed not and quarr'd about the lawgiver, there were Embassadors sent to Athens, Sp. Potho mum Alam, A. Mavus, and P. Sulpicius Camerinus: who were commanded to exemplificate and copy out the famous and worthye laws of Solon: to search out and learn the ordinances, enclomses, and rites of other cities in Greece. For in any outward wars, this year was quiet, and the year fol ing more quiet, when P. Curtius, and Sex. Quintus were Consuls, by reason of the continual silence of the Tribunes; which, as the expectation of the Embassadors that were gone to Athens, and of strange and forsing laws, frant and principally procured: to, two mighty great calamities that rife both at once, to wit, famine and pestilence, noifome and loathsome both to man and N beast, afterwards continued. By means whereof, the fields lay fall and desolate, the city dipeopled with continual burials: many right worshipful and honourable houses thereby torned. Ser gin Cornelius, the Vlamin of Quirinus dyed thereof. C. Horatius Pulvinum the Augur went of like wise: in whole room the Augurs (his Acolites) choose C. Veturius: and the rather, because he had been condemned by the people. Quintus the Consul departed alio this life, and four Tri bunes of the Commons. So that this was a year, with manifold looses and calamities foully dista ed. But for enemies all was quiet. After this were C. Menenius, and P. Sfil in Capitolium made Consuls, in which year likewise there was no war abroad, may it at home some troubles stroke. By this time were the Embassadors returned with the Athenian laws. And therefore the Tribunes were so much the more earnest and urgent that once at length they would set on, to describe and put O laws, and agreed it was, that there should be creted Decemvirs above all appeal: & for the yeare t thing, that should to other Offices and Naudits be in place. Now, whether a ny of these might or the Commons or not, that was a question: and hereupon some debate and conceit continued for a good while. At the last, the Nobles were away with it, Schas the pre beminence, upon this condition, that neither the law Petita, concerning the Aventine mount, nor other ascended laws should be repealed. Thus in the 300 year after that Rome was built, was the form of the emper government changed the second time, and to the Consils from the Decemvirs, the law give back translated, like as before, from the kings to the Consils. This This change was likewise notable, in that it long continued not. The beginning of this Magnificence was fair and good, and goodly to see, but grew too rank, and exceeded in overmuch licentiousness. The sooner therefore it fared and tell away, and the former government was taken up again, and both the name and jurisdiction of Consuls returned, and was conferred upon two. The Decemvirs created were these: Ap. Claudius, T. Sempronius, P. Scaevola, T. Quintus, C. Fabius, M. Maximus, P. Sulpicius, P. Curcius, T. Remus, and Publius Claudius and Sempronius, because they had been Consuls elect for that year, had this dignity bestowed upon them, in lieu of the other. And Scaevola one of the Consuls the year before, because he had preferred this matter unto the Senators, against his fellow Consulswill. Next to these were counted the three Embassadors that went to Aethiop, both for that they should be rewarded with this honourable dignity, for their embassage into so far and remote a country, &c., &c. because men were persuaded, that by reason of their ingenuity and skill in foreign ordinances of strange nations, they might be well employed in letting down, and making of new; The rest made up the number. They say, that in the last secessions and lobbies at this Election, choice was made of those that were more aged, and farther in years, to the end they might not so fiercely and floutly gainfast and croffe the opinions and constitutions of the other. In this last state of government, Appius was the man that bare the greatest stroke, he ruled the rest, and raised all the rest, so highly himself in grace and favour with the people. He had to alter his name, and became such a new man, that all on a sudden of a cruel and terrible precedent of the Commons, he proved a very Publicola, and counter of the Commonalty, and one that lay to forest every gale of popular love and favour that might be had. Every one fat his tenth man in place of judgement, and ministr'd justice in their severall turns unto the people. On which day, the twelve branches of rods were born by the Lictors before the sovereign judge; as for his judge, they had each of them one so jeant to give a tendance. In this agreement among themselves, (which accord otherwheres when they were privat persons, had been hurtful unto them) refted only and wholly the greatest equity towards others. A proof and argument of this their moderation, it shall be sufficient to observe now in the example and influence of one only matter: for whereas they were exalted at absolute, and paid all appeal, it turned, that in the house of P. Scaevola, a private become, there was a dead body found buried, and brought forth openly into the publick assembly of the people. The thing being no less apparent in view, than haughty and horrid in fact. C. Intius Decemvirs, brought Scaevola in question therefore, put him in suit to answer at a certain day, and became plaintiff unto the people, and accused that defendant, whose competent judge he was by order of the law. And so he yielded of his own right, sading to much to the freedom of the people, as was taken from the power of his own jurisdiction and government. When as now both high and low gave out, that this authority was found and uncorrupt, &c. As is also from the Lictors and Gods own mouth, &c. men willing to accept of Justice at their hands, that they might in turn, and went about the making and giving of laws. And with great expectation of men, they sat upon ten Tables, and called the people to a general assembly, commanding them in a good hour, and in the name of God to go. &c. of which that should turn to the good, to the benefit, and happiness of the Commonwealth, themselves their children and posterity: to read the law there published, proferiting, that so far as ten men could with all their wisedome foresee & provide for, had devised indifferent lawes, and equal for all sorts of callings, as well the best as the meanest. But as for the wise and heads of men, of deeper reach to see farther into things, they gave them good leave, to sit in their minds, and ponder with themselves each particular, yes, and to reason together from point to point, and thereof to deliver their opinion openly, what was short and wanting, or what was superfluous, in every article; and look what laws the content of all men seemed to bring in, that should the people accept, and none other; that it might appear they were not too much to approve of them, and give their silent approbation, as they were put to silence and preference, and thus in the high court of Parliament, assembled of all the Centuries & degrees of men, the laws of ten Tables were enacted and established. Which even at this day, amoasting that infinit number of statues, heaped and huddled one upon another, are the very well-spring and fountain of all justice, both publick and privat. After this, there ran a rumour abroad, that two tables were yet wanting, which if they were put unto the rest, then might the complete body as it were of the whole Roman law be finifhed and made perfect. The expectation thereof, now that the great Leet-day grew near for the Election, made men very desirous to create Decemvirs again the second time. Now the Commons abroad, besides that they hated the very name of Consuls, as well as of Kings, sought not greatly for the protection of the Tribunes: seeing that the Decemvirs one after another, yielded in their perservative, and admitted in some fort the appeals. But since that the solemn assembly for the choosing of Decemvirs, was published against the * Triennium of the third month, now ensuing, to such an height was the ambition and desire of this dignity grown, that the very chiefest men, and principal heads of the City (for whereas I believe, left the politions of to great a government, in case they were not invited themselves in the place, should be open unto some unmeet and unworthy persons,) went about and made court to every manly in humble manner to those very Commons, with whom they had been at strife & variance, for this honour and dignity, which they themselves had with all their power and might impugned. The worthiness and reputation of men of those years, and having born and gone through through such offices, being now come in question, and submitted to the choice and judgment of others, pricket on Ap. Claudius, and set him forwards. So as a man could hardly know whether to reckon him among the Decemvirs, or those that stood to be Decemvirs again. For other whiles he was more one that used for an office, than him that pretently bare office: blaming preconages of best quality in the City, and laying hard to their charge: but extolling the valiant & base of the Competitors. Himself in person setting among the Daily and Tois, and such like as favoured the Tribunes, went swinging and squaring in the common place, using them as instruments to vendicate himself forth to the common people. So long, as at length his very brethren in office, who until that time had been singularly addicted and affectionated unto him, cast their eyes upon him, and began to mark, & marvel much what his meaning was: reasoning thus among themselves:

"Surely there is no soundness nor goodness herein, but all mere dissimulation and hypocrisy.

"Certainly, it is not for nought, that in such pride of his, there should appear so much courtesy.

"What? to force his own nature too much within compass: to debate himself, and suffer private men to be his fellows, was aigne of one, that made not so much bault to forgoe a dignity and promotion, as ought means to keep it still. Openly they durst not presume to check and withstand his ambitious desire, but abated by pleasing and soothing him up, to repress, and bridle his foolish affection. And seeing he was the younger of his company, they all with one accord laid upon him the charge, to hold the high court for the Election of Decemvirs. Their drift and policy was, that he should not Elect his own self a thing, which unless it were the Tribunes again (and that was a most dangerous precedent and example) no man ever had done before. And he with all his heart accepting thereof, made protestation that he would be president of that honourable Court and Session, and prayed to the gods that he might perform it for the benefit of the weal-publik. And so took the vantage of that opportunity, to set forward his own design, which they meant should have dropped and crost the same. And after he had by secret packing and conversing with the other competitors, and given the repulse unto the two Quinti Capitoius, and Cestianus, and put before the Cuthion his own Uncle by the fathers side (C. Claudius, a most stout & tolerable champion of the Nobility) with other citizens of like mark and quality: he createth Decemvirs, such as were not for worth, port, and behaviour, to them comparable and his own sweet self with the first. Which as there was no man thought the ever would have done, for all good men misliked when it was done. With him were elected M. Cornutius Maluginensis, M. Sergius, L. Munius, Q. Fabius Vibulanus, Q. Petitius, T. Antonius Merenda, Caio Dinius, Sp. Oppius Corninus, M. Rabirius. And there's an end of Apius playing another mans part. Off went his mask and visor now, and from thence-forth, he began to show himself in his own likenesse, and to live in his kind: yes, and to frame his companions to the bent of his bow, even before they were entered into office. Day by day had they their secret meetings by themselves apart from all other: and being once hereby furnished with ungracious and proud dispositions, which they had closely complotted together, they could no longer hold & dissemble their pride. Few might have accesse unto them: tidedom would they be spoken with, shewing themselves strange, full, & churlish to those that came unto them. Thus drew they the time on, unto the *ides of May, which was the usuall and solemn day then of entering into offices of government. In the very beginning whereof they made the first day of their magistrate noted by an intimidation, and evident show of exceeding terror. For whereas the Decemvirs their predecessors had observed this order. That one alone should have the rods of State born before him, and that this regall ornaments should pace round through them all in course one after another: Behold, these came all of them abroad, and each of them had his xij. bundles of rods carried before him, so that the Lictors, 120 in number, with their rods and axes too, fastned within the rods, took up and filled the whole Forum or common place as they went. And for as much as they were created absolutely, and their commission ran without all appeal, men made this expostion, that to go with their axes or without was all one, & made no matter at all. Thus there a shew & representation of ten KK. And this terrour grew more and more, not with the meanest and baseft sort, but also with the chief and belt of the Patritians: supposing that they fought to pick a quarrell and minifier occasion and overturn to some mislak: that if any man should offer either in the Senat or among the people, to speak one word concerning liberty, forthwith there should be exemplary whipping and heading, to the terrour of all other. For, besides that, from the people there was no remedy and, and recourse to be had, by reason that the appeal unto them was quite disannulled and taken away: the Decemvirs themselves drew for all in one line together and were so combined and linked, that there was no hope at all, that one would thrust and croste that which another did: whereas the former Decemvirs could well abide, that their judgements and sentences should be centuried and corrected, by the appellations or appeal to one of their brethren in commission: yes, and in some cases put off some matters from themselves to be decided by the people, which seemed properly to belong unto their own jurisdiction. For a while, the fear was to all indifferent: but by little and little the Commons only began to feel the smart. The Nobles were born and espoused and insearect the meaner persons went to the walls, and with them they dealt according to their lust and pleasure right cruelly. The person wholly they regarded, and never repected the cause, as with whom favour and friendship prevailed as much as equity and right should have done. At home in their houses, they determined of matters how they should passe: and in open place they pronounced sentence accordingly. If a man had appealed to one of their bench, from him unto
A unto whom he fled for relief, he went his ways again by weeping crople, repenting that he flood not to the order and infliction awarded by the former. It was thought and spoken alo abroad, but the first author would not be known. That they had conspired together, not for the present time only to do wrong and injury, but also were confessedly between themselves privily, therefore, and had bound it with an oath, to call no assembly at all for the election of new magistrates, but being now once invaded in the severest rule, to hold the pollution of the Decemvirsship for ever. The Commons than began to look about them, to behold and advise well the censure of them the Nobles, to see if they could from them each one some good wine of land, some hope again of liberty, at whose hands they bearing bondage, had brought the comon-weal to this hard place.

B The LL. of the Senate hated the Decemvirs, they hated also the Commons. They liked not of things as they went, and yet were perfidiously that the Commons were well enough served, and deliver no better: who gaping greedily after liberty were now fallen and plunged into levity and thraldom. Help they would not with the least of their fingers, but rather heap more wrongs upon them, that having a wearisome and tedious looking of the present state, they might fall to a longing desire to two Commons, and with the old world were come again. By this time was the better part of the year gone and past and the two tables of laws were annexed to the other ten of the former years: which if they might be once confirmed and ratified by a Parliament of the Centuries, there remained nothing behind, for which the common-weal should need new magistrates; but expected it was certainly, that the assembly for election of Commons should out of hand be published and proclaimed. Marry, there was one thing hammer'd in the Commons heads, by what means they might revive again the Tribunes authority; the very grand bulk of their freedom, and the thing that now had discontinued and lien dead. But all this while there was no word of the new election. And the Decemvirs, who at the first preternated actually into the Commons fight, a crew of those that favoured the Tribunes, for to attend upon their persons (a thing right plausible and pleasing unto the people;) were guarded now, with certaine all peninsurers of their Nobility: whole troops of them flied about their Tribunal seats and places of judgment. Their made havoc and spoil of the Commons and their goods: and look what the mind of a mighty man flied unto and lusted after, it was his hap to have it whatsoever. Nay, there was no spare now made of their backs and sides: some were scourged with rods, some loft their heads by the axe. And because this cruelty should not go unrewarded, lightly there was none executed, if he were worth any thing, but his goods went after and were begged or given away. The youth of the Nobility, by this kind of hire well fleshe'd: not only opprest not themselves to withstand their wrongful dealings & hard court's, but carred it afore them, openly profilling and avowing what they wished then rather own licentiousness, than the liberty of all. The new order of May were now come about, and no new magistrates elected in the others room. Forth come the Decemvirs, (who to say a truth and to give them their right, were no other than private persons) neither with minds abstained for the exercising of their imperious rule, nor with few regal enigmas, to secrete and their honour & dignity. When the people saw that, they made no other reckoning but this was plain usurping of the kings government, and no better. And now farewell freedom for ever and a day. For neither had they presently, nor hereafter were they like to have any man to recover it again. So that now, not they only lost all their hearts and were disconsolate in themselves, but also grew to be contemptible in the eyes of their neighbour nations: who disdained highly, that they should have levity of rule, who were not free themselves nor enjoyed their own liberty. For the Sabines with a strong power invaded the Territories of Rome: and when they had flogged far and near, and driven away booties both of people and of cattle, without imprisonment, they gather their army together again, that they had hanged here and there up and down, and entered unto Ferentum, where they encamped themselves lying this for a ground, and building their house upon their discord at Rome, that it would stay their murmuring. Not only the news that came hereof, but the flying of the country peasants, put the whole city in great fear.

F The Decemvirs fall to consulting what were best to do. And whiles they were to seek what course to take, and between the hatred of the Nobles and the Commons utterly forlorn and dilatinor, there hapned also another fearful trouble in the tail of the former. The Equins from another side encamped in Algidum. And from Tusculum Embassadors brought tidings that their country was wafted with excursions from thence, whereupon they craved their help and aid. These fearful occurrances troubled and perplexed the Decemvirs, that considering the city was now betat at once with wars from two places, their stomacks were come down to consult with the Senate. They commanded therefor the Senators to be summoned to the Curia. And well they will, what a great many and form of anger, displeasure and blame was towards them: namely, that they would burden them & lay to their charge, how they were the only cause both of the country wasted already, and of the perils like to presently enume: looking for no other, but that there would be given an attempt and thred path, to abolish utterly their government, unless they stuck closely together to it, and by extending their authority flappily upon some few of the floutell, quall and cruelty the attempts of others. After the voice of the Bedell was heard in the Forum or common place, citing the Senators to retire into the Councell house to the Decemvirs: the novelty and transcen- nesse of the matter, (because they had laid down for a long time the manner of calling them to Councell) caused the Commons to marvail and mule what was behalfe, that they should make such discontinuance, take up a thing so obloolete and out of rule. And thus they conceived of it, that that they were much beholdingly to their enemies, and might thank war for this. that any ancient virtue and custom of a free city was come up and in use again. They looked about on every side of the Forum, to see if they might buy a Senator; but few or none could they hear of, any where. Then looked they into the Curia, and behold, none at all spared about the Decemvirs. Whereof their own selves, even the Decemvirs could gather no otherwise, but that in the conceit, & content of all men, their government was become odious: & the Commons also thus collected, and interpreted, that the Senators met not together, because privat men (such as the Decemvirs were indeed) had no authority to assemble a Senat. And now laid they, is the way and entrance made to recover their liberty again, if to be the Commons would join with the Senate and as the Nobles being called, met not together in council, to the Commons likewise would refuse to be murtled. In this wise mattered and whispered the Commons. And in truth fearfully was there any one of the Senators about the common place, and but few within the city: for very griefe and indignity to see that things went as they did, they had withdrawn themselves into the country to their lands: and forgetting the state of the common-wealth, they became careful of their own privat affairs: thinking themselves so far forth freed from oppression and wrongs, as they were remote and sequestred from the society, meeting and conference, with Lordly & imperious rulers. When they would not assemble at their summons, the officers were sent unto their houses, both for to frencie and take away tri FRIS for their contumacie and disobedience, and also to enquire and learn, whether they refused to come at their commandment, or of let purpose or no. And word they bring back, that the Senators were in the country. The Decemvirs were better paid to hear that, than if anwer had come that they were at home and refused to obey. They gave commandment that they should be sent for: and they warned a Senat house against the next day following: where they assembled more in number than they looked for. Whereupon the Commons supposed that their liberty was bought and sold; and utterly betrayed by the Nobles, for that the Senat had yeilded obedience to them (that now by right were out of their office) as if they had given lawfull summons, who being privat men had no power at all to do. But they heeded more obedience and submission, as we have heard in, coming to the Council house, than any disposition to deliver their minds and opinions there, to the liking and pleasures of the Decemvirs. First, L. Valerius Flaccus, as it recorded, after that Appius Claudius had propounded unto them the I cause of their meeting, before they were required their advice in order and course, claimed the liberty of the house, to speak in the behalfs of the common-wealth. But when as the Decemvirs denied it flatly, yes, and forbid him with threats, upon pain of their high displeasure, he inferred again and menaced, that he would goe forth unto the commons, and lo began a broil and tumult. M. Horatius Barbatus likewise took part with him, and was nothing behind in solemnitie to maintain the quarrel, terming them ten Tarquins: and are ye aware (quoth he) how the Kings were in times past expelled by the the Valerius and Horatius? And yet the name it was not of Kings, that men were so weary of and loathed in those dates. For why? It was right lawful to call Jupiter by that name: whereby Romulus also the founder of this City, and other Princes his successors have been called: yes, and the name hath been used and is retained still as a solemn title, in the sacred rites of holy Kirk. Nay, it was the pride and oppression of the King, that then M. Horatius had been so odious, and nothing els, which enormities, if they were in those dates in the King himself, a lawfull prince, or in the King his son intolerable, who can abide and endure the same in many privat persons? I advise you therefore to take heed how you debar men of their liberty of speech in the Council House, left ye drive them thereby to speak their mind and complain without the Council House. Neither see I any reason at all, why they were not as lawfull for me a privat man, to assemble the people to an audience, as you for to call the Senat together to a Council. Make it triall whensoever ye will, ye shall find how much more forcible our just griefe will be, in recovering our libertie again, than this greedy defire of yours, holding and withholding till your usurped, unlawful, and tyrannicall rule. You have pronounced here unto us, forthwith concerning the Sabines war: as who would lay, the people of Rome can be at greater war with any than with those, who having been created Magistrates only for the publishing and enacting of certain laws, have left now neither law nor justice all within the city. Who have taken away their Comices, Courts and Leet of Election, their yearly Magistrates, the successeive change and course of bearing rule, the only thing that made Sohony, and equality of freedom. Who being but privat men, are posseffed both of regall ornament, and also of toall government. After the expulsion of the Kings, the Magistrates that succeeded were of the Nobility: in procerce of time, upon the rising of the Commons and their departure, there were officers chosen out of the Commonality. I demand of you, and I would gladly know, whether state or body are ye? Are ye, I pray you, popular, and of the Common people? What have ye ever done with advice and approbation of the people? Are ye Nobles and Peers? who now for a whole yeares space almost, have held no Council of Senators. And now that ye have assembled them, you refrain them from speaking for the Wale-publick. Well preume not even much neither bear your selves upon the timorousnes of others. For, truth me truly, the indignities that men already suffer, feem more irkome and unapprovable, than whatsoever els they can doubt and fear hereafter. As Horatius lopp'd these words aloud, and the Decemvirs could not bethink themselves of some in different & mean course, either in anger to be revenged, or in likeness to pardon and put up, nor witt whereeto this matter might tend and proceed in the end: then C. Claudius, uncle to Appius, the Decem-ADecemvir began to speak, rather by way of prayer and intercession, as in checking and reproving a wife, and besought Appius for his brothers' sake, who was his own father, to remember and regard more that civil licentiousness wherein he was born, then this ungracious and wicked conduct of his fellow Decemvirs. And this requell I made (quoth he) tendering your private estate more than the Commonweal. As for me, if the mighty not by fair means and with their good wills, obtain her own due and right, she would by foul wiles, and in flight of their hearts recover it in the end. And as for much as of much debate and strife there ensued commonly heats of anger and cantred rancor, I am in dread & horror what the sequel if of their wil be of these jars. Now when as the Decemvirs would not permit the ret to speak, but only to the point proposed and occasion of their meaning, yet they were abashed to interrupt the speech of Cneanus and to cut him off; but suffered him to go on until he made an end. And in conclusion his opinion and sentence was, that he would not (to abide by it) agree that any act of the Senate should for that time pass in that behalf. And all that were present took his words to, as if Cneanus deemed no other wife of the Decemvirs, then of private men. Many of them all, such especially as had been Conuls, were of his mind, and said as much. Another opinion there was, more rough and sharp in outward show, but far leff forcible and effectual indeed: advising and willing the Nobles, to make no more ado, but to go togethers and chuse an interregent. For this man seemed yet, to account and judge them Magistrates, (bad though they were) that had called a Senat, and held them in Council; whereas the former, that would not abide any act to pass, reckoned them but for privet persons. Thus when the Decemvirs caue began to shrink and go downward, L. Cornelius Malagonenus, brother to Cornelius the Decemvir, being referred of purpose to give his opinion in the last place of all the Conular Senators, such as had been Conuls, pretening a charge that they had of the war, took part with his brother and his Colleagues, saying, that he marvelled much at what misfortune or destitution it hapned, that the Decemvirs should be challenged and opposed, especially by those that had flood for the Decemvirship, or by their friends and associates: and how it came about, that in so many months' space, while the city was at rest and without fear of war, no man made question or doubt, whether they that were in place, and governed the state, were lawfull Magistrates or no; and now at last, when the enemies are in a manner at the gates, they should now civil diligence, unlefe this were the meaning of it, that in a troubled state it would not be clearly seen and perceived, what they went about. But no man is able (quoth he) to fet down a true doome, & alledge a ruled case in great a matter as this is; go men, whole minds are bullied and wholly possesed of a greater care. And therefore my opinion is, that concerning that point which Valerius and Horatius charged the Decemvirs with, namely, That before the idea of May their government was determined, and they out of office; the Senate should dilate and debate, when as the wars now at hand were distretched, and the Commonweal brought once again to quietness. And that Appius Claudius should make this recon- knownum even now abstain, and know that he is to render a reason of that high court of Parlamnt, which for the election of Decemvirs he called and held, being a Decemvir himself: namely, Whether they were created for one year only, or to continue till all the other laws which yet are wanting, were ratified and confirmed. As for the present time, he though good that all other matters should forward, and be passed over, save the war only which hereof, if they thought to be tall, and that they were but tales that not only the messengers, but also the Embassadors of the Tusculans reported, then his advice was to send out eliphs, who upon their discovery might bring more certain tidings. But in case they gave credence to messengers and Embassadors both, then with all speed possible to multer, and the Decemvirs to have the command of the armies, and told them whither they thought next, that nothing els should be thought upon before this. Which opinion of his, that it might prevail and take effect, the rite Senecans by importunate conveyling, obtained. Then Valerius and Horatius both rode up the second time more fierce and eager than before, calling on them aloud, that they might be permitted to speak concerning the Commonweal, and in case they might not be suffered by reason of the faction to have the liberty of speech in the Council House, they would speak their minds without, before the people. For neither could privet men (as they were) debar th. man in Senate House, nor in open affently & to give place unto their imagination, and pretend imperial enchant, they would never bebrok. Then Appius supposing the matier well-ner come to this paff, that unlefe the violence were reflced with like boldness, their rule was at an end, and their authority conjectured: Ye were not bel (quoth he) to speak but to the matter, whereupon we set in Contumacia. And when Valerius repied again and said plainly, that he would not hold his tongue for a privet mans commandment: Appius sent a Servant unto him. When uppon Valerius cried for help to the Quirites, fom. the porch of the Council House. Then L. Cornelius clapping Appius about the middle, without regard to content him whole good he pretended, flayed the little S. by the mediation of Corvitius, leave was granted to Valerius for to fey his mind at his own pucture. But, for as much as his liberate proceeded no farther, than to some ie of words, the Decemvirs held on their purpose still, and had their desire. The Nobles also, such as had been Conuls, and the ancients, upon an old ranked hatred that they bare still against the Tusculan authorities, whereupon they apprehended the Commons were much more devoted and affected, to the more than the government of the Conuls, were rather inclined and willing that the Decemvirs of their own accord should themselves afterwards forgo their office, than that upon tarred and mutate received against them, the Commons should take heart of grace, and hold up head again. For it with gentle handling of the matter, without flit and clamour of the people, the regiment returned again unto the Consuls, it would haply come to passe, that either by means of wars coming between, or through the moderation of the Consuls in their government, the Commons might in time forget the Tribuns quite.

Thus whiles the Nobles were silent and made no more words, a matter was proclaimed, and the younger sort of people, seeing the government of the Decemvirs absolute and without appeal, made answer to their names. And when the legions were enrolled, the Decemvirs took order and agreed between themselves who should go forth to the wars, and who should have the command of the forces. The chiefest & principal of the Decemvirs were Q. Fabius, and Appius Claudius. For that there seemed greater war at home then abroad, the Decemvirs supposing the violent nature of Appius, better to repreffe all troubles and mutinies in the city; and considering with all the disposition of Fabius, to be of a conffant and resolute in good, then active and quiet in martial service, (for this man having been in times past of great worth, both at home, and also in war: the Decemvirs, and the conditions of his colleagues together, had greatly changed, that he chose rather to be like Appius then himself) to him therefore was imposed the charge of the war against the Sabines, together with M. Rabuleius and Q. Postius joined in commiiftion with him. M. Cornelius was sent into Algidum, with L. Minucius, T. Antenius, Cæs. Donibus, and M. Sergius; and they ordained and appointed Sp. Oppius as hisflant to Appius Claudius, for the defense and government of the city, and to have the full authority of all the ten Decemvirs. But the Common-wealth did no better abroad in warfare, than it fared at home. The only fault in the Generals was this, That they had made themselves odious to their fouldiers and citizens: all the blame else lay in the fouldiers themselves; Who to the end that nothing might go well forward and prosper under the leading and conduct of the Decemvirs, suffered themselves to their own shame; and dishonour of their captains, to be defeated: for the armies were both by the Sabines at Ervium, and also by the Equians in Algidum discouraged. That they fled from Ervium in the dead of the night, bivouacked and fortfied upon an high ground nearer unto the city of Rome, between Fidentes and Cunamienus. And when the enemy pursued them still and provoked them to fight, they would never come forth into the plain and even ground, to encounter with them L. in a sight battell, but fled upon their guard and defended themselves, trusting in the situation of the place and their rampart, and nothing upon their own manhood and force of arms. But in Algidum they committed a more foul and beastly fault, and received withall a greater losse and overthrow: informiuch as having left their camp with all their tents, the fouldiers being turned out of bag and baggage, their harnes and implementes of necessity were, retired for refuge to Tufculum, hoping there to be entertained as guests, and to live upon the protection, mercy and devotion of their hosts and friends: who failed and deceived not their expectation. But to Rome there came such full and fearful news, that the Senators and Nobles laying apart now all hatred against the Decemvirs, thought good to keep watch and ward in the city: and commanded as many as were able to bear arms, to keep the walls and guard the gates: they gave order also to lend harness and armure to supply their want at Tufculum: moreover, That the Decemvirs should abandon the castle at Tufculum; and with their fouldiers take the field and keep the camp: That they like wise should diflodge and run out of Fidentes, that lay forftied there and remove into the country of the Sabines: so that by making wars upon the enemies first, they might scare and divert them from pursuing their intent of giving assault unto the city of Rome. Besides these, damages and fols taken at the enemies hands, the Decemvirs committed both in war abroad, and also in the city at home, two most wicked and horrible facts. For whereas one L. Siccius, during their abode in the Sabines country, upon an odious conceit and malice against the Decemvirs, had gone up and down, and in secret tale whispered in the ears of the Common fouldiers, some mention of creating Tribuns, and of another insurrection and departures: he the Decemvirs dispatch before, to spic out a convenient plot of ground to encamp in. Now N. they had given these fouldiers in charge, whom they lent to accompany him in that expedition to let him upon him in some place of advantage and to kill him. And kill him they did, but to their own cost: for whereas he fought in his own defence, some of those that laid for his mischief, died for it, and lay along about him for company: for being a right stout and strong man of his hands, he stood to it comagonally: and notwithstanding he was better round about, he defended himself very manfully. The reft that escaped being word into the camp, that Siccius was fallen unawares into an ambushment, and whereas he fought lustily, was with certain other of the fouldiers slain. At the first, credit was given to him that brought the news. But afterwards, when as there was a band of fouldiers therewith lent by the permission of the Decemvirs, to bury them that there lay dead: they observing none of their bodies there, to be dismembered and despoiled, and Siccius lying in the midst of his armour, and all the rest of the dead with their faces towards him: no corps of enemy, nor fruiting of them departing from thence, brought away with them his dead carcase, and made report that undoubtedly and passe all peradventure, he was murdered by his own company. Hereupon was the whole camp filled with hatred and detestation of this fact, and generally it was agreed, that Siccius forthwith should be conveyed to Rome: and not the Decemvirs made haste to solemnize his funerals soonerlikelie; as the publick charges of the common treasury. So interred was he, with exceeding sorrow and mourning.
of the fouldiers, but to the moft fhameful obloquy and inffamy of the Decemvirs, amongst the common fort.

Now followed the other heinous deed committed within the City: which began of warrant last, and had as it were a fhameful end, as that which upon the carnal abnig and bloody death of Lucretia, called the Tarquin out of the City, and deprived them of their regal dignity that both

KK, and Decemvirs, might have not only the like fucch and fine, but alfo one and the felf fame caufe, of ftoing their rule and dominion, Appius Claudius emauonoured upon a virgin, a commoners daughter, cut to the abufe and iipoil of her body. The father of the maiden L. Virginius, was of good calling, and in place of credit in the camp that lay in Algidium, and had the leading there of a company: a man of honett example and conversion of life, both at home and alfo abroad in warfare. His wife likewiie of vertuous disposition: so were their Children nurtured and taught accordingly. He had upon and advanced his daughter in marriage to one L. Licinius, a man of stout courage (as having been Tribune) and whole vertue and valor had been well tried and approved in the quaret and defence of the commons: This damfel in the prime of her years, paffing fair and beautiful withall, Appius (as I lay) call'd a fancy and liking unto, and so burn'd in love of her, that he affayed with gifts and fair promises to win her good will. But seeing all guarded and tendered with maidenly shamefaftnefs and honestly, he bent his mind wholly to cruel and pride violence. He unbombr and fetteth on a favorite and follower of his, one M. Claudius, to make challenge and lay claim unto her as his bond-maid: and not to give place nor yeeld her unto them, that required to have her at liberty out of his hands, during the tyme, and until fhee brought proof of her freedom: supposing, because the father of the virgin was abfent, he had good opportunity to work this treft, and compass his intended injury. As the maiden therefore was coming into the market place, (for there were the schools for petets kept, of reading and writing) the Decemvirs man (a broker to serve his masters luft) laid hold upon her, avowing that she was his bond-maid's daughter, and therefore his bond-maid; commanding her to follow him, and threatening her, that if she made any trave, he would have her away perforce. The fearing girl hereof was amaz'd and her nurse withal cried to the Quiritisfor help: whereupon the people came running and flock'd together all about them. Now was the name of Virginius her father, and likewife of Licinius her pofter, very gracious and popular; fo that the love and favour wherein they stood, raised friends and acquaintance: and the indiginty of the thing besides, mov'd the whole multitude to render the caufe of the damfel. When as there fore she was now past danger of violence, the party that made claim unto her, faid there was no need that the people thus should gather together, for his meaning was to proceed only by order of law, and not with any violent courfe. And fo he cried her to the court, minding to commence his action a gainft her, and put her in fait. Then they that were prefent to affift her, persuaded her to fubmit. Now when they were come before Appius, sitting judicallly upon his tribunal feat, the Plainit, or challenger, afke'd declarte against her, and telleth a tale ful well known to the Judge himfcll, being the author and deifier of the whole matter and argument: Namely, that the maiden was born in his house, and by faith was from thence conveyed home to Virginius, and so was his supposed and reputed daughter: this he averred to have certain knowledge of, by pregnant evidences and witneffes: and would make proof thereof to be most true, and let Virginius himfcll be the judge, whom the greater part of this wrong deeply touched: in the mean while, it was but meet and reafon that the bond-maid fould go with her Master. The friends and advocates of the damfel, having alledged and pleaded in her behalf, that Virginius was abfent and employed in the affairs of Common-weal: and if he had word thereof, would not fail but be at home within two days: that it was no reafon, that while he was father, he fould be in conffention and controversy about his children: they required of Appius therefore to defer and put off the hearing of the whole matter, until her fathers coming, and that according to a law by himfelf in that cafe made and provided, he would grant her to be at large and hand at liberty, for to bring in proofs that the was not bond: and that he would not suffer a maid of thole years, ripe and ready for a husband, to be more in hazard and danger of her good name, then prejudicie the trial of her freedom. Appius made a long preface and discurfe before his decree, namely, how much he fan-voured and tendered the caufe of liberty, and to that effeA, alledged the felf fame law which the friends of Virginius pretended for their purpose and demand. But to fay forth, and no otherwife, there should be in that law affur'd safeguard of freedom, as the cafe alter'd not in circumftance of causes and per dns. For this, privilidge and benefit held only in thole that were claimed to be free, where any man whomfever might go to law and plead. As for her, who was in her fathers hand & at his dipofition there was no other man elle, unto whom the Master that inkeft challenge, is yeeld the right of his pofition. His pleafure therefore was, and thus he decreed, That the father fhould be fent for & that in the mean time, he that made title to her, fould not be prejudicie thereby, but that he might lead away the wench, promising and affuming to have her forth-coming, and to prefent her in Court; at the return of whom he is pretended and nominated to be her father. Against this injurious decrea, when as many men either muttered and muturured, then any one durst renefe and contradite it, P. Numtorius, the maids uncle by the mother fide, and Licinius her eponind husband, hapnd to come in place: and having way made them through the throng and press, the multitude thought verily, that by the coming, especialy of licinius, Appius might have been refilfed and crofled. But then the Lictor pronounced that Appius had past an order and decree already, and put Iulius back: who cried out aloud (for so H manifest and horrib ea wrong had been enough to have moved a very Saint, and set on fire a right mild natured person.) Nay, Appius (quoth he) thou hadst more need to let me back with force of arms, if thou wouldst go clear away, and not be spoken to, for that which thou wouldest do in hucker mucker. This maid, I tell thee, I mean shall go with me: I purpose to have her to my telic, an honest and pure virgin, and enjoy her in lawful marriage, as my wedded wife: call thereunto thee all the Lictors besides (thou wert bet) that belong unto thy compani on: cause both rods and axes to be made ready: I tell thee, Iulius his espoused wife, shall not abide in any place without her fathers house. What? although ye have taken from the Com mons of Rome the Tribuns assittance and protection, and the priviledge of Appius, two principal but it works for defence of their liberty: ye are not therefore allowed to rule and tyrannise, and to fill your lust upon our children and wives too. Exerte your rigour and cruelty and spare not, upon our backs and in courting us, upon our necks and heads also, in taking them from our shoulders: to ye forbear to affill our chastity and honesty. Whereunto, if any violence shall befall, I will for my part, call for the help of the Quirites here present, in the behalf of my ipoufe: and Virginius for himselfe will call to the fouldiers, in regard of his on ly daughter we will cry for help of God and mankind it shall our lives before thou go away with this decree, and put it in execution, I require and charge thee, O Appius therefore, to be wel advized, and look how far thou doth proceed. Let Virginius when he is come, bee to his daughter, how he dealteth about her: and let him know this much for certain, that if he give place to this plaintifs action, and force the present poifon of her, he shall goe seek his hate and propriety that hath in his daughter. As for me, in this quarrel of maintaining the free dom of my ipoufe, I will lose my life, before I fail in my faithful promife to her made. Hereet the whole multitude was moved, and it was, that some mutiny and fray would presently have enlisted. For the Lictors had hemmed in Iulius on every side. Howbeit they proceeded no lar ther than to big words and high threats: whereas Appius laid hard to Iulius. That he did not this so much in the behalf and defence of Virginius, as (being himself an unright profen, and even already breathing forth a Tribuns spirit) sought means, and picked occasion of an uproar and fa dition. Howbeit for his part, he would not that day minifier unto him any matter thereof, And that he might now well know, that he did not this to feed his malapert fancie, but in re gard of the absence of Virginius, and for the name of a father, and the tender respect of freedom, he would not that day refuse to hear and determine the matter, nor award a affirmative judgment in that cafe: but would requite Mar. Claudius, to suffer his action, and to forbear and yeild lo much of his own right, as to suffer the maid to be bailed and go under oneties, and to be at her liberty unto the next day. But in cafe her father appeared not in Court the morrow after, he gave Iulius, and such as he was, to wit and understand, that neither the law should want the patronage of the maker, nor the Decemvir fall in courage and resolution: neither would he cal gether his fellow officers and fergeants, for to keep under such liberties and turbulent spirits as he was: but would content himself with his own Lictors, and do well enough. The time now effecting this injury, being thus deferred, and the maids Advocates gone aside, they agreed first M of all upon this point, that a brother of Iulius, and a son of Numitorius, two lusty and nimble young men, should be dispatched straight from thence to the gate: and that with all speed possible Virginius should be sent for home from the camp: for that it stood the maid as much as her whole estate and life was worth: that he would be present and ready in due time the day follow ing, to preserve her from this hard course, and wrongful proceeding. According as they were biden, they fet forward, and spared no horsefleth, until they brought tidings hereof to her father.

All this while the plaintiff that made challenge to the maid, was very instant with Iulius to bail her, and put in oneties. And he again made anwer. That he went about it as fall as he could, and nothing else: but indeed tripling out the time on purpose, until the messengers that were sent to the camp, were got afore welloward on their way. Then the whole multitude on all sides N held up their hands, in token that they offered themselves every one unto Iulius, ready to be come bound. Whereupon, he built out into tears for render heart, Gramercy (quoth he) my ma ters all, to morrow I will use your helping hand: for this time I am sped of oneties enough. So was Virginius set at liberty, and bailed by the sheriff of her kinsfolk. Then Appius, after he had stayd a while, because he would not seem to have fat for that matter alone, when he saw all other suits and causes omitted, in regard they had to it, and no man coming to him for justice, he a rofe, got him home to his house, and wrote unto his brethren Decemvirs into the camp, that they should not give Virginius his passport but keep him fast in danger, and in ward. This wick ed practice (as God would have it) came short. For Virginius already had got his discharge, and was departed forward on his journey, in the evening by the letting of the first watch. And very O early in the morning came the letters for to stay him, but all in vain. For Virginius by break of day was arrived: by which time the whole City referred into the common place, standing and waiting earnestly for his coming. And thither he himselfe being in foile and simple array brought his daughter in her old worn cloaths, accompanied with certain Wives, and a great number of Advocates and friends. Then and there began he to go from one man to another, and to labour them hard: and not only befloughed their affair by way of intrisy and prayer, but also required it as due and deliered: saying, that he stood daily in field ready to fight in defence of their wives
A wives and children: neither could there be reported of any man more hardly exploits and valiant pieces of service in war, then of him fell. But what shortly or assistly all this (quoth he) to save the City from enemies, in case our children be forced to abide the utmost extremities that befall unto Cities taken by the enemies? thus went he about preaching, as it were, from one man to another. Likewise Iulius sat forth and redoubled like speeches freely and lipted not. But the train of women, with their still and silent weeping, moved men more then any words uttered. All this notwithstanding, Appius in his obstinate mind (so disquieted was he and wholly pestiled with a forcible spirit of humorous madness rather then of amorous passion) ended up into the tribunal. Where, as the plaintive spirit of himself was framing some short complaint, that by reason of partial humour and making of great friends, he could not have law and justice the day past: before that either he had made an end of his demand, or given cause to Virginius to put in his answer accordingly: Appius interrupted the speech, and began himself. What preface it was that he made before his decree, peradventure some ancient writers have not truth recorded. But for as much as it cannot any where find, in so shameful a decree, that which is carriage but a fiew and roundeth like a truth: therefore, that only which is of all agreed upon, I thought best to let down, even the sentence barely without any pretext at all. I say: That he judged her in the half of the Planter to be his bastard. First, all men there, wondered at this unworthy and foul act: and being drunk therewith to tame their mind, for a good while after, stood still and held their peace. But after a while, when as Appius, went to lay hand on the maid, amongst the dames that stood about her, and was received with a piteous lamentation, and cry of the women: Then, in a great deal be-kissing with his hands and shaking them at Appius: "To Iulius (quoth he) have I betrothed my daughter and not to thee: O Appius!" brought her up I have for honest and chaste wedlock, and not for unclean and filthy whoredom: to be a wife another day, and not an harlot. Is this the manner of fife; like bruit and wild beasts without all regard to leap and run upon you are not whom, and to lull your fleshly lust? How these that be here will suffer such pranks, I know not: but they that are in camp with word in hand. I hope, I may ever put them up. Now when he that challenged the maid was by a knot of Women and Advocates that stood about her repelled back, then proclaimed the Bellie and commanded silence. And the Decemvir having his head into state, and altogether carried away with unbridled lust, brake forth and said That he had certain intelligence and was informed of a truth, by manifest and assered evidences: and not induced and led thereto by the reviling taunts of Iulius yesterday, and the violent proceedings of Virginius, whereof he had the people of Rome to bear witness, and which might give some light and presumptions That the night past, there were meetings and conventions in the City, and all to have a mutiny and insurrection: and therefore, he not ignorant of such a broil and riot toward, was come down into the common place with a guard of armed men: not minding to hurt one any that would keep the peace, but only by virtue of the majesty of government and authority, to repel such as troubled the peaceable Carie of the City: therefore it were best for them to be still and quiet. Go Sergeant (quoth he) cause the people to avoid the place, and make room for the matter to lay hand upon his bond; and after I had thundred out these words full of ire and wrath, the multitude of themselves gave back and made way: so the poor fifty went forth all solemn and leiat as a prey to their injurious clutches. Then Virginius seeing all past help and no other remedy: Well Appius (quoth he) pardon me if I believe thee or upon a further affecation and grief of heart I have let fall some words and cursed words against thee more then was then becominge Then give me leave here before the virgin, to enquire of her more the truth of this matter, that if I have fathered her untruly, I may go hence better appried and satished in my mind. Leave being granted, he led his daughter and the mire apart from the rest near to the Church of Venus Clavina, at the hot shops, called at this day Novo Tribun., i.e. the new shops or foundings: and there had taken a knife from a butcher hence spake: My twentie daughter, no other means have I but this only to let thee free: and so he struck the dam'd to the heart: and looking presently to the judgement seat, Here with this blood I sacrifice thee Appius, and thy head to the Devil. Appius with the rage that arose upon so horrible a fact, being much troubled, commanded Virginius to be apprehended: but he with bloody blade in hand, made his way where he went, until with a number that followed him space to bear him company, he recovered the gate. Iulius and Newtornius took up the bloodie's corps and held it aloft to the people blaming and cursing the wickednes of Appius: pitying the unhappy and unfortunate beauty of the dam'd: and bewailing the extreme and extremity of the father. The Mtrumes followed after and cried: Is this the condition and fortune allotted unto parents for getting and bearing children? Is this the hire and reward of chastity and virginity with other like speeches which in such a cause, women in their grief of mind use to utter: whole sorrow as it is more heavy, proceeding from weak and tender hearts: so yeelde and afford more pitiful and lamentable words, as they make their aunts and dolorous moans. But the men and Iulius above the rest had no other talk but of the Tribunes authority, and the appeal into the cause of the people how they were taken away from them, and of other publick indignities and common differences. The whole multitude partly upon the mainoines of this wicked act and parts for hope by this occasion to recover again their liberties, we call at one in an uproar. Appius one while commanded Iulius to be called, another while for his disobedience and contumacy to be attached and convented before him. At the length, seeing no way made unto the Apparitors, for
to come by him, passed himself with a crew of tall gentlemen of the Nobility that were of his guard through the throng & commanded to have him away to prison. By which time there were gotten about 100 men not only the multitude, but the chief Captains and ringleaders of the multitude, L. Valerius and M. Horatius: who having thrust the sargent back, laid withal, that if Appius had any thing to charge him with by order of law, they would ball 100 men, and maintain his cause against him, who was but a private person; but if he went about to offer violence, he should soon meet with his matches. Whereupon grew a fierce brawl and broil. The Decemvirs ordered them, and they called the Licitors to give attendance no longer upon a private person. Whereupon, Appius his heart was done and his courage quailed; and to flanding in fear of his life, he was fain to cover his face, and to withdraw himself in dignified manner, and took an house over his head, near unto the common place (unknown to his adversaries) there to save himself. Sp. Oppius, for to refuse and to acquit his Colleague, rushed from an other side into the place: and there he might see force and might to have got the upper hand of authority. After many devices and consultations, whereas he was distracted, and framing himself to yield content on every side, at length by the advice and persuasions of many there about him, in great fear he commanded the Senate to be called together. This appealed the multitude, for that they were in hope that (by means of the Senators, K who many of them, seemed to mislike the acts and proceedings of the Decemvirs) that government of theirs should come to an end. The Senat devolved and took order, not to provoke the Commons too far: and withal to have a more provident and special eye, that the coming of Virgininius into the camp, bred no mutiny in the army. Whereupon were sent certain of the senate into the bush, that lay encamped upon the hill Vechius; who advertised the Decemvirs from the Senate, to endeavor all they could to keep the soldiers in good order, from commotion and sedition. But there Virgininius raised a greater uproar and tumult than he had left behind him in the City. For besides that, he was seen coming with a crew and train almost of four hundred men, who incensed with the indignity of the late accident, accompanied him voluntarily from the City, his naked drawn knife, and himself beprinkled and embroiled with blood, caused the whole L campo to turn their eyes upon him. Moreover, their gowns seen in fundry places within the camp, made a greater show of citizens in number then was indeed. Being demanded of them what news, and what the matter was, he kept, and for a good while held his peace. At the last, when as now the multitude; that for fear ran confoundedly together, began to stand still and keep silence; he declared orderly from the beginning to the end, every thing in particular, as it was done. Then lifting up his hands to heaven, and calling to all his companions and fellow soldiers, he besought them not to impute that foul act unto him, whereof in truth Appius Claudius was the author and cause: nor to detest and abhor him as a parricide and murderer of his own children: saying, that his children's life was more dear unto him then his own, if the might have lived free and honestly. But when he saw her one hailed by force, as a bond-maid to be ravished and made a strumpet, he thought it better to be benefic of his children by death, than by consumely and reproach; and so upon mere pitifulness incurred the show and appearance of cruelty. And but that he repented some our hope in the aid of his fellow soldiers, trusting that they would be revenged for his daughter's death, he would not have remained a live man after her. I know well (faith he) that you also have daughters, sisters and wives of your own: And it is not the death of my child that hath killed and mortified the lust of Appius, but rather the longer it else had been unpunished, the more outrageous and unbridled would it be. So that by the calamity of another man, ye are well taught and warned to beware of the like injury. As for me, I have buried my wife before, who died on God's hand: and now my daughter, for that the might not finish the course of her days, with the safety of her maiden head and chastity, hath died, I confess, a pitiful and lamentable, but yet an honest kind of death. As to Appius. (quoth he) now can he not fulfill his lust in this my house: and for any other violence of his whatsoever, I carry the same mind and heart still to defend mine own body, wherewith I have already saved my daughters. Now let other men look to themselves and their children, as well as they can. As Virgininius uttered these speeches aloud, the whole multitude with one accord cried and protested, they would not fail, but both revenge his grief, and maintain their own freedom. The Citizens also, in their side gowns, intermingled among the soldiers, made the same complaints: shewing how much more horrible those things were in the eye to be seen in fact; then they could found onto the ear by bare relation: and withal reported, how at Rome the matter was well speedily dispatched already, for that there were certain come after them, even hard at their heels from thence, who brought word that Appius had likewise to have been murdered, and was departed into exile: and for preserving them with them, that they gave the alarme, plucked up their standards, and took their way to Rome. The Decemvirs being sore troubled, both at these present occurrences which they evidently saw, and also to hear those news, in what had teems all things stood at Rome, ran up and down, here one, and there another, into fundry parts of the camp, to appease the tumult. When they went to work mildly and gently, they had not a word of them again: but if any one laid his commandment upon them, and extended his authority, they would beat them and answer, That they were men, and

A more then that men in arms and fouldiers. Thus march they in order of battle toward the City, and take the mount Aventine, and there letter themselves. And as they encountered any, all their song was this, to exhord and encourage the Commons to recover their franchises, and to create Tribuns of the Commonalty. Not a word was heard eell, tending to any violence. Oppius assembled the Senat together: where it was agreed, not to proceed by way of rigour in any cafe: nor as much as they themselves had given the occasion of sedition. But three ancient personages, such as had been Consuls, were fent Commissioners in Embassage, as it were, Sp. Taurpinius, C. Licinius, and Publilius Sulpius with commision, to demand of them in the name of the Senat, by whole comman-

Dard, for their minds were not less troubled and disquieted with the remembrance remelted, of the late murder of Secerns, that kindled and set on fire by the vrenous news of the death of Virginia, so villanously, so shamefully laid unto and challenged, and all to satisfie the luft of another. Sicilia, so soon as he heard lay, that there were ten military Tribuns created in Aventine, fearing left the election in the City should follow the prerogative of the military Election in the camp, as a precedent to create the self-same men Tribuns of the Commons, being a man well seen and experienced in thee popular affairs, and reaching himself at the fame dignity and promotion, wrouht so with his adherents and friends, that before they went to the City, they should likewise elect the self-same number with equal authority. Who entered the City with banners displayed, at the gate Collins, and marched through the midst thereof in warlike order, up to the Aventine. And there joining and uniting themselves unto the other army, they gave in charge to the twenty military Tribuns, to create out of their number twain for soveraign governors to rule all, So they elected Marcus Oppius, and Sextus Mummius.

The Senators being in great care for the Common-wealth, sat in Council every day: where they spent time ofter in wrangling and jutering, then in advice and politick counsel. The murdering of Secerns, the wanton luft and loose life of Appius, the shameful digresses received in the wars, were laid in the Decemvirs dili. At length they concluded, that Valerius and Horatius should go to the Aventine. But they refused and would not go, but upon condition that the Decemvirs would give up the Ensigns and Ornaments of that Magistracy and government, which by right they should have forgone and departed from a full year before, The Decemvirs were grieved and complained, thus to be set down & made no better then private men: and laid flatly they would not be deposed from their place of rule, before those laws were fully enacted and confirmed, for which at first time they were created. The Commons having intelligence by Dullius (who had been a Tribun of the Commons) that by reason of continual debate and contention in the Senate house, there was nothing done and agreed upon, removed from the Aventine unto mount Saeer. For Dullius created not to ingtell, and plainly affirm unto them, that the Senators and Ancients of the City would never falsely think upon any care and provisio to be made, until they saw the City abandoned and deioilate: moreover, That the mount Saeer would put them in mind of the constant resolution of the Commons: and that they should well know, that matters would never be ended and brought to concord, without they retorted unto them their pow-

Geral and authority again. So they take their way by Nomeurana Mus, which at that time was named Fuerenia, and encamped themselves in the mountain Saeer; doing no harm to any creature as they passed along: following therein the modesty of their forefathers. The whole Commonalty followed after the hot: there was not one who for age was able to travel on foot, that drew back and tarried behind. Their children and wives bare them company in piteous case monoing the soes and asking them: whereeto they would leave them behind in that City, where neither their honest chastity might be guarded, nor yet their liberty secured and kept alive. When as now, by reason of his uncouth and strange deioiation, all seemed at Rome warne and void, and none to be scene in the publick place, besides a few of aged men and when the Senators were called into the Senate house, the common place appeared empty, naked and forlorn: then there were more besides Horatius and Valerius that cried out and said, What look you for till my LL, of the Counsel What and if the Decemvirs will make no end of their peevish forwardness, will ye let things run at his and seven, until all come tumbling down, or be of a light fire? And what goodly dominion is this, that you embrace so in your arms, that you clip and hold to? Will ye minister justice and give laws to empty houses and bare walls? Are ye not abashed and ashamed, that there should be seen in the Place, a greater number well neer of your LICtors and officers, then of crowned Citizens, and of all other men whatsoever? How and if the enemies should come against the City, what would ye do? Nay, what if shortly the Commons should march in arms, seeing we weigh their insurrection and departure to lightly? Will ye, together with the ruin and downfall of the City, end your rule, and not afe? Well, to be plain, ye must either have no Commons at all, or else allow them to have their Tribunes again; there is no mean, there is no other remedy, Sooner shall we want our Magistrates the Nobility, then they will be without their Patrons and Officers of the Commanoty, They wrung and wretcl from our forefathers that power and authority fire new, and whereof they had as then, no proof and experience: how think ye then, that having called now the sweetneds of it, they will endure the want thereof? especially seeing, that we our selves are not of so temperate carriage in our government and command over them, but that they have need of some such cour and relief. And when thee and such like reasons were on all hands often alledged and laid K abroad, the Decemvirs overweighed with the general consent and unity of the house, promised: That seeing it was so thought good, they would be wholly ordered and ruled by the Senators, This only they behoght at their hands, and admonished them of by a way of a proviso, that they would take order for the safety and security of their persons; and not by shedding their blood, to fleth the Commons, and to train them up, and acquaint them with execringly cruelty upon the nobles and Senators. Then were Valerius and Horatius sent with commission to reclaim and call home the Commons, upon such conditions and capitulations, as they should think convenient: yea, and to let all things in good order and make a final composition, with a special charge to provide for the safeguard of the Decemvirs, against the raging ire and violence of the multitude. These mediators took their journey, and were received into the camp with exceeding joy of the Commons, as being doubtfull their very favour and redeemers, approved both in the beginning of their troubles, and now also at the very end and upholt of all. In regard whereof, they were welcomed with thanksgiving, Ictius was the mouth of the multitude, and their proctor, Who when they came to debate and reason about the articles of covenant, and that the Delegates and Committees, required of the Commons, What the demands and points were that they should upon? Being already provided aforesaid of purpose what to say, demanded such conditions, as it was well seen, that they required more hope, and relied themselves rather in equity, and indifferency, than in force of arms. For they require, Imprimis, to have the Tribuns power on foot again, and the appealing unto the people revived: which before the creation of the Decemvirs had been the only help and succour of the Commons; Item, that no man should be called in question, nor M any way touched in his limb, or goods for gathering the fouldiers or Commons together by way of commotion, for recovering again their liberties and franchises. Only, their demand concerning the punishment to be inflicted upon the Decemvirs, favoured of cruelty. For they deemed it meet and reason, that they should be yeilded into their hands, and then they threatened to burn them quick with fire. To these Articles the Committees spake in this wise, As for those capitulations, which upon counsel and deliberate advice ye have articled, they are so reasonable and indifferent, that without your suit, they ought to have been offered unto you frankly and freely: ye may request to enjoy such things as concern the defence of your liberty and freedom, and maintain not your licence and free, to the offence and hurt of others. But as to your ire and wrath, it is to be pardoned, rather then to be followed and yeelded unto: as who, under colour of hatred and detraetion of cruelty, run headlong into cruelty: and before, in a manner, that ye be sent tree your selves, ye will be Rulers and Lords over your Adversaries, Alas the while, and be our City never be at rest, and cease from punishing; but that either the Nobles will scourge the Commons, or the Commons whip the Nobles: As for you ye had more need of a shield I was then a sword, I humbled is enough, and too much humbled, who liveth in a City on even hand, and equal with others, under the same laws, neither doing nor taking wrong. And ye may see at any time you mean to shew your selves dread and to be feared, when you have once recovered your Magistrates and Ordinances again, while you have the law in your own hands, to cenure and judge according to your own discretion, than may ye give your doom of our lives and goods, as each caule requireth. Now for this time it sufficeth, that ye claim and have your freedom again, Hereupon they all submitted themselves to the deputed Delegates, permitting them to do what they would, Who seeing they had brought all matters to so good a conclusion, promised to return with all speed. So they took their leave. And when they had declared to the Senators the demands of the Commons, all the rest of the Decemvirs, perceiving no mention at all made of their punishment (a thing more then they looked or hoped for) denied no one point thereof. But Appius, a man of a fell and cruel nature, and who above all the other was most odious, and lay open to the malice of the people, and measuring the hatred of others toward himself, A bill, by his own pleaeth that bare against other men: "I was not well (quoth he) what ill fortune will betide me shortly: and I see plainly, that our adversaries hold off to wrangle and contend with us no longer then unless they have weapons given in their hands. To satisfy this their malice and hatred, we will part with our blood: nothing else will content them. For mine own part to renown my Decemvirship I weigh not: neither pass I how soon I do it. Then was an Act made by the Senate, that the Decemvirs out of hand should surrender their place: and that Quinctilius the Arch Bishop or High Priest, should create Tribunes of the Commons: provided always expressly, that the mutiny of the soldiery, and insurrection of the Commons should turn no man to destruction and harm. These Acts being passed, and the Council, the Decemvirs came aboard into the open place of assemblies, and the Commons received their government, Tribuns of the Commons were created again. *A general assembly for election of Magistrates. Then, by an Inter-regent were Consuls created, L. Valerius and M. Horatius, who presently began their government. Whole popular Consulship, as it was without wrong doing to the Senators and Nobles, so it was not without some offence committed of their part: For whatsoever was provided for the liberties of the Commons, they flipp'd it abridged somewhat of their power and authority. And first and foremost, whereas it was a question and controversy not well cleared in law, Whether the Nobles were bound to hand to the Acts of the Commons they made a law now in a general Session, by the justificates of the Centuries. That what ordinance for ever the Commons (being part'd by Tribes) had by their voices granted, it should comprise and bind the whole body of the people. By which law, the Tribuns' Acts were armed with a most sharp and keen weapon to strike withal. Moreover, The other Consular law concerning Appeal, the only fort and strength of liberty, which by the Decemvirs absolute power had been overthrown, they not only revive again, but also fortify the same for the time to come, by making a new law, for bidding expressly that no man should create any magistrate abnormally without the liberty of appealing: and who soever should create any such, he might rightfully and lawfully be killed, and that murder should not be counted a capital crime. And when they had sufficiently strengthened the Commons, on the one side with the benefit of appealing, and on the other side with the Tribunes power in favour of the Tribuns themselves, that they also might seem far roanfast and inviolable (a thing now almost born out of remembrance) they renewed that high privilege, with certain solemn ceremonies which having been of long time laid aside & neglected, were now brought up again and put in use. And they ordained them to be inviolate as well in a reverent regard of freedom & triple of confidence: as also by a special law in that behalf provided: namely, that who soever hurt either Tribuns of the Commons, Ediles, Judges or Decemvirs, his head should be accursed and devoted to Jupiter and his family, and in post-false at the Church of Ces. Liber & * Liber, By virtue of this Act, the great Exceptors of the law deny that any man is far roanfast or inviolable; but (say they) it is enstablished, That who soever hurt any of them, shall be accursed. And
And therefore an Ædile may be attached and led away to prison by superior Magistrates, Which H although it be not warranted by law (for he is hurt, who by this law ought not to be hurt) yet it is a good argument to prove, that an Ædile is not inviolable. Marry, as for the Tribuns, they were indeed by virtue of an ancient oath of the Commons, at what time as they first created that power and authority, inviolable; as they would seem to expound and make construction of the law. Others have been, that thus open and interpret the law. That in this fell Æd Act of Horatius, the Consuls also, yea, and Pretors too (because they are created by the same Æfatus or bird-signs that the Consuls be;) were comprised, and had the benefit thereof. For a Conul is called by the name of a Judge. But that exposition is confuted, for that in those days it was not the manner to tear the Conul a Judge, but the Pretor only. And thus much concerning the Consular Laws. I

The same Conul also brought up this order and custom, that all the Acts of the Senat should be brought into the Church of Ceres, and presented unto the Ædiles of the Commons: which a beforetime were suppressed and imothered, yea, and corrupted or perverted at the will and pleasure of the Conuls. After all this, M. Duilius a Tribune of the Commons, propounded unto the Commons a Law, and they let it pass and granted it. That whoever should leave the Commonalty delitute of their Tribuns, or create any Magistrate absolute without Appeal, should be scourged, and lose his head for it, All these Acts, as they pleased against the wills and minds of the Nobles: so they went clean without their contradiction; for that, all this while hitherto, there was no rigour and severity that seemed to extend and reach to any one particular person among them. But afterwards, when as both the Tribuns power, and also the Commons freedom, were once well and duly grounded: Then the Tribuns, supposing now it was full time, that they might safely and without peril give the oneret upon them, severally one by one, made choice of Virginius to be the first accuser or plaintiff; and Appius Claudius the first defendant. And Virginius had not so soon arrested Appius to answer at a day, and Appius come down into the Common place, guarded with a company of tall young gentlemen of the Nobility: but presently upon the sight of him and his guard about him, the remembrance of that most cruel and detestable tyranny was refreshed and renewed. Then Virginius: "Speeches (quoth he) and Orations were devised for doubtful causes: and therefore will I neither spend time in accusing him before you, from whole cruelty ye have by force of arms delivered your selves; nor suffer this wretch, over and besides his other wicked pranks, to shew in the defence of himself his audacious impudence. Therefore, as thou ching all other lewd parts of thine and wicked defignations, O Appius, which thou hast for these two years ungratiably and impiously enterprise, and practised one on the neck of another, I will do thee some favour, and pardon thee: but for one crime only, unless thou canst acquit thyself the better, namely, that thou being the judge, against all order of Law, didst not grant unto the party defendant, the benefit of liberty to go at large, during the time of the suit depending, until the might bring proofs of other freedom: for this, I say, I command thee to prison. Now had Appius no hope at all, either in the Tribuns helping hand, or in the dooms and judgement of the people, Howbeit he both called upon the Tribuns for succours: and also seeing himself tugged and haled away by the officer, and no man to lay his hand: I appeal (quoth he) unto the people, This one word in maintenance of freedom being heard to come out of that mouth, that lately had given sentence on his fide that impeached the freedom of one, and challenged the party for bond, caused silence. And when every man to himself secretly muttered in this wise: "I see well (when all is done) there are Gods in Heaven, and such Gods as negleget not the affairs of mortal men, Pride and cruelty (although it be long firt) at length will lure have a fall, and throughly be punished. Lo, how he is now fain to appeal, who aforetime abolished and took away all appeal; he humbly craveth relief of the people, who heretofore trod under foot all rights and franchises of the people; and fee how he is carried to prison, detriment and deprived of the benefit of liberty, who awarded, and adjudged a free body to bandage and fertilise. Amidst these words, I say, that might be overheard in that confused hummimg of the assembly, Appius also was perceived to call unto the people of Rome for relief and mercy. He reckoned up withal the defects of his ancestors in the behalf of the C, W, both at home in the City, and abroad in the wars: he alledged his own unhappy affection (when time was) to the Commonalty of Rome, and partaking with them: and namely how with the exceeding displeasure of the Nobility he reignified up his Consulship, and all that to bring in and establish equal and indifferent laws to both parties. He rehearsed moreover his own laws, which notwithstanding they remained till in force and strength, he, the law-giver himself, was going to prison. But concerning his own proper parts and defects good or bad, he would then make trial thereof (he said) when he should be permitted judicially to make his defence for the present time, he pleaded the common benefit of the City, to wit, that being a Citizen, he might at the appointed day, speake for himself, & stand to the doom of the people, neither feared he the hatred & malice of men to much as to repel no hope at all in the equity and mercy of his neighbors and fellow Citizens. But and if he were call unto prison and not suffered to come unto his answer, then he would once again call upon the Tribuns of the Commons for their help, and admonish them, not to follow and imitate them, whom they would seem to hate. And in case the Tribuns will be known and aow that they are linked in the same bond and covenant to abolish and take away the benefit of calling unto any one of them by way of mediation against which they have charged & blamed the Decemvirs for conspiring & agreeing together; then he said, that he appealed to the people, and dand had recourse for succour unto the laws concerning appeal, made as well by Consuls as Tribunes, that present year and no longer ago. For who may ever hereafter (quoth he) have benefit of appeal, if it be not lawful for me, who stand yet not condemned, nor attainted, and have not pleased for my self? what Commoner, what mean person may find relief by those laws, if Appius Claudius may not? It will be seen in me, and my example shall be a precedent and proof to others, Whether by these new statutes, lording rule or equal liberty be established: whether the calling for help by way of mediation & inter-cession or by plain appealing against the wrongful proceedings of Magistrates, be granted in very deed, or but only pretended in bare frow, under vaine colourings of pretences and foolish Letters Patent. Against all this, Virginius made his rejoinder and said, That Appius was the man alone exempt out of all benefit of laws, and excluded from all civil and humane society. "Let men but look back toward the tribunal fear, the ye-ny well-head, as it were, and receptacle, the fortefis and hold of all wickedness: whereon that perpetual Decemvir practising his cruelty upon the goods, the bodies and lives of free citizens, menacing whipping and executing hangmans work unto all persons; a contemner both of God and man, guarded with a crew of executioners and butherry tormentors: rather then sentence, proceeding on from spoil and bloodyed to lse his hart on leachery & carnful hillspuked a maid by birth free, from out of the very arms of her father, as if she had been taken captive in war; and that, in the sight of the people of Rome, and gave her away to one of his followers; even to a groom of his bed-chamber. Where, by a cruel decree of his, and deftable sentence adjudging her bond, he carried the father to lay violent hands upon his own daughter; where he command-ded, the eipoused Husband and Uncle of the Virgini that took up her body half dead to he had away to the Gaol, as being more displeased with them, for disappoint'ng and putting him beside his purpose of abusing and spoiling her, then for the murder upon her by them commited, Adding moreover and besides, That he had built a prison, which he used to terms, The habitation and dwelling house of the Commons of Rome. And therefore, plead he ever and anon, and as oft as he will, his appeal. I will not give over (quoth Virginia) but as oft tender a judge between, and be able to prove, that he gave not sentence, and pronounced her free, but bond: but in case he will not abide to be confin'd by a competent judge, then I command him to be carried to prison, as attaint and convicted. Thus was he committed to ward: and as there was none millified of this proceeding, so every man was greatly troubled in spirit, to see so great a personage confined, and the very Commons themselves thought their liberty too large & extensive, The Tribun set him down a day (before hand) to plead for himself and make his answer.
Amid these affairs, there cameto Rome Embassadors from the Latins and Hermicks, to congratulate, and to shew their joy and great contentment, for the unity and concord between the Nobles and the Commons: in token whereof, they brought as a present unto Jup. Opt. Max, a crown of gold, not very maffive in weight, but according to their ability, which was not much, yet answerable to their devotion: which men performed rather with religion and zeal in those day, than in portly shew and magnificence. By relation and intelligence from them they were certified also that the Aquini and Volsciens prepared war with all the power they could make, Wherepon, the Consuls were command to part their provinces between themselves. To Hosatius befell the Sabins, and to Valerius the Aquini and Volsciens. And when they had proclaimed musters against these wars, such was the forward affection and favour of the Commons, that not onyly the younger folk, but also a great sort of these that by law were dispenset with, and discharged from warlike, and lived of their pensions, offered their voluntary service, and were ready to enter their names into the murther-Masters book: whereby the army was not only in number greater, but also for the goodnes of men, more puiftant, as having the old, beaten, and experienced soldiers among them. But before they went out of the City, the Decemvirs laws (which now are known by the name of the twelve Tables.) they set up openly to be seen, engraven in bra	- Some writers have delivered, that the Ediles performed this office, as they had it in charge From the Tribunes, C. Claudius, who upon a deftrepation and deep hatred of the Decemvirs levied and wicked enormities, but especially above all others, of the intolerable pride of his brothers for, which he could no longer abide, had removed and departed to Retillius, his old native country.
He being now a very aged man, return't to fute and intent for his deliverance out of danger, whose vices he abhorr'd: and in fuffled weed and poor array, accompanied with those of his lineage, and other his followers and vasals, went through the common place, and laboured every man one by one, "Bellicating them not to let that brand of ignominy, and bring such a chain upon the honie and name of the Claudius, as that they should be thought worthy of impi-yment and iron: nor infler a man of moit hoftile quality, a singular pattern of Nobiliity to his polterety in time to come, the Law-maker and founder of the Roman laws, to lie in G" chains among felloses, night-theves and robbers by the high way side: but to turn away their minds a while from anger and wrath, and encline to a due regard and consideration of matters: and rather at the iniit and earnell petitions of so many of the Cludius, to forgive them one man, than for the hatred of one man to reject the prayers of so many impliants." As for himself, he protested that he didthus much for kindred and namesake, Neither was he reconciled unto him, and they made friends again: yet could he wish, that his advcrse fortune and poor condition were relieved. Concluding with this in the end, that as their liberty was recovered again, by virtue & proving, so the concord of all degrees & citizes might be establiished sure by clementy.

Some
Some there were whom he moved, more in regard of his own kindneph and love, than in any respect of him for whom he spake. But Virginis prayed them, "To take pity and compassion rather, of him and his daughter, and to give ear to the prayers and supplications, not of the Clan-dia, who have had the day, and tyrannized over the Commons but to the necest friends of Er-ginis; the three Tribunes, who being created for the aid and succour of the Commons, do now themselvcs implore and beseech the help and assistance of the Commons, And verify their tears were thought more reasonable, and like to speed. Thus when Appius law all means of hope cut off, before the foretold day appointed was come, killed his own left. Soon after this, Sp. Oppius, who of all the rest next unto Appius, was molt hated: for that he was in the City at the very time when this unjust doom and lenience of his Colleague hapned to be pronounced, was attached by P. Numitorius. But Oppius was the wore thought of and more prejudiced, by occasion of an injury by himself done, then for not stopping the wrong intended by Appius to Virginis. For a witnicke was produced to depole against him, one, who having lervcd in the wars leven and twenty years, had been rewarded and honoured extraordinarily eight times. This valiant fervitor, thus adorned with those gifts and marks of valour, in the view and sight of the people of Rome not his garments, and threw his back and sides, and the skin all broken with scarring: belenccing no other vavour, but if Oppius the party accused, could guilty charge him with any treipise and off-fence by him committed; he should not spare him, but now a private peron as he was, exercite and redonde his cruelty upon him once again. Well, Oppius likewise was had to prision: and there before the law day, ended his life. The goods of Appius and Oppius both, the Tribuns did conficare. Their com-partners and fellow Decemvirs fled their country and were banished, and all their goods also were lost and confiscate. And not so much as M. Claudius the party that laid claim unto Virginis escaped, but he was arrested to answer at a certain day, and was condemned, Howbeit Virginis of himself released him his life, and would not take the extremity, so he was sent away and confined to Tiberi, as it were into banishment. Thus the poor spirit and ghost of Virginis more happy after her death. then unfortunate during her life, having wandered abroad, and haunted so many houses for due revenge of her adversary at last, when there was not one guilty person of them left unpunished, gave over her walking, and retired quiet.

Now were the nobles in exceeding fear, beholding the tame countenance already in the Tribuns, which they had observed in the Decemvirs. But then M. Duidius, a Tribune of the Commons, L wifely and politickly refraining and keeping within a mean this excessive power of theirs: we have enough (quoth he) both of our own liberty, and also of revenge of our enemies; and th-fore I will not suffer for this year, any man more to be arrested or imprisoned, For I do not like that old faults done and past, and now as it were cancelled and raied out, should be revived a again, and brought in question, since that by the punishment of the Decemvirs, satisfaction hath been made for the new and the continual care and diligence of the Consuls both twain, for the maintenance of your freedom assured me, that nothing will be committed hereafter, that may require and need the power of the Tribuns. This moderation at the first hand of the Tribun, put the Nobles out of their fear but made the Consuls to be thought the worse of, (for that they had been so addicted, wholly to the commonalty) in that a Magistrate of the Commons had more M regard of the safety and liberty of the Nobles, than the proper Magistrate of the Nobility: and because the adversary part had their ill of revenge and punishment of the Nobles, before it did appear that the Consuls would come seem to stop the course and stream of their licentious. And many there were who gave it out, that the Consuls bare themselves too remiss and slack in the matter, and little respected the good and credit of the Nobles, in that they had approved & confirmed the Acts that were proposed by the Tribuns. And no question, troubled as the state was then of the C. W. they were forced to give place, and do according to the necessity of the time.
When the Consuls had set all things in good order within the City, and surely grounded the state of the Commonalty, they went either of them into their own Province, Valerius against the armies of the Equians and Volscians; which now had joined together in Algipsum: where full ponitically he had off, and stood upon his defence only: for it out of hand he had put it to the hazard of a battle, I cannot tell, but I greatly doubt (considering how the hearts of Romans and enemies both, were affected presently upon the uniform conduct of the Decemvirs) it would have turned to their great loss and coln them an overthrow. He therefore having encamped a mile off from the enemies, kept his soldiery within the camp. The enemies ranged in battle array took up the whole ground between both camps, & when they made bravado's, and challenged them to come forth and fight, not one Roman would answer them again, Atlength the Volscians and Equians, weary with long standing still, and in vain expecting battle, thinking verily, that the honor was in manner yielded unto them: departed: some into the country of the Hermicks, other to the territories of the Latins, for to safe booties and make spoil: leaving behind them rather a commerent guard for defence of the camp, then a sufficient power to maintain a field fight. Which when the Consul perceived, he paid them again with the like measure of fear, as they before had from them received: and with his army rejoyced embattled, bids them battle: who being privy to themselves what forces were wanting, forbare to fight whereupon the Romans presently took a better heart unto them, and made account that their enemies were overcome, being in such a fear within their rampart. When they had stood thus a whole day ready to fight, they retired back in the evening and gave place to the night. And the Romans full of good hope, refreshed A their bodies and made much of themselves, but the enemies nothing to heartly and courageous, fend out meffengers every way in heartful harts, to call again the forriages. Such as were near at hand came running back into the camp; those that were farther off, could not be found nor met withal: Now when it was one day light, the Romans flue forth of the camp, intending to give an assault upon the Rampier, unless they would come forth and fight. But when it was far forth the day and the enemies stirred not at all the Conful commanded to advance with their engins. The Equians and Voltsians seeing their battell coming forward, began to chafe and take foul disdain, for very shame that their rampier and trench should protect victorious armies within the camp, rather than their weapons and valor defend them in plain and open field: and were earnest likewise themselves with their Generals for the signal of battell, and at length after much imprority obtained it. Now were some of them filled out at the gates already: and others followed hard after at their heels, keeping their array, and every man coming orderly into his file and rank. By which time, the Roman Coft, before the battle of the enemies flood freely furnished with their full strength, came on still and gave the oner: charged them before they were all come forth, yea, and erst they were well marshalled that came abroad, being a multitude, waving (as it were) to and fro every way for feare, and looking about themselves, and to their fellows: and to amaze their troubled heads the more, he affails them with a great shout and main violence. At first the enemies gave back: but after they had gathered their spirits together, and were come again to themselves, and that their Captains on every side rated them, and asked them whether

B they would yield unto them, whom before they had overcome, the fight began again to be renewed, the Conful on the other part, willed the Romans to remember, that this was the first day, wherein they being newly set free, were to fight like wise for the freed City of Rome: and therefore they were to win a victory for themselves, and not after victory gotten, to be a prize for any more Decemvirs to prey upon. For they sought not now under the conduct and standard of Appius, but of the Conful Valerius: who as he was descended from the deliverers of the people of Rome, so he was one of them himself: exhorting them to shew now, that in former battles of late days, it was long of the leaders and not of the foudlers that they attained no victories: saying, it was a foul shame for them, to have had more fromack against their own neighbours and citizens, than hearts against their enemies: and to have found more in fear of servitude at home, than of bondage abroad, As for Virginia, she was but one, whole honestly and chastity was in time of peace hazarded: and Appius it was only, and none but he, that in regard of his undidle and dilolute life, was the dangerous citizen. But if the fortune of war should fall on our side, and go against us, then shall our children all be in joyfully, to be abused and spoild at the hands of many thousands of enemies. Unwilling I am (quoth he) to preface such miseries and to prognosticate to the City those calamities, which both Jupiter and our stock-father Mars forbid and hinder to light upon us, founded upon to lucks and signs and happy foretokens, at the first beginning: I put you in mind rather of the Augustus Hill, and Mount Saccro: that there within these few months you recovered your freedom, rather y'e may carry back again your Empire, safe and sound, unfeind and unfoiled: that all the World may see that Roman foudlers are as forward and nobly minded after the banning of the Decemvirs, as they were before their creation: and that by the bringing in of equal and indifferent Laws, the manhood and prowess of the people of Rome, is no whit decayed nor diminished. Having utterd these words among the engins of the footmen, he made speed to the corners of the Horemen, Go to, brave gallants (quoth he) exalt the footmen in valour and chivalry, like as ye exceed them in honor and degree. At the very first shot and encounter, the footmen forced the enemy to retreat: and being now retired to your hands, set your fo, gallop after them space, and chase them out of the plain field: they will never abide your violent charge: for even already they are at a bay, and stand rather as a lay, than make any resistance. Hereupon they gird out lightly, and run their horses among the enemies, disordered already, and in disarray the service of the footmen. And having broken through their ranks, and passed forth even to the rearward: certain of them call about in the road and open ground, and when the enemies were about on all sides to fly, they turned most of them away from their camp, and overriding them, they got between them and home, and feared them wholly from thence. The footmen and the Conful himsell, with the whole strength of the main battell, made forward to the camp, assailed the tents, won them, and besides a great slaughter, obtained a booty far greater.

When news of this battell was brought, not only into the City, but also to the other army into the Sabine country, it was received in the City with joy only and solemnity: but in the camp it set the foudlers hearts on edge, and enkindled them to fire for the like honor and renown.

G Now had Hercules already partly by sending his foudlers forth, to make inusions and outrides: and partly by training and proving them in light skirmishes, enured and acquainted them to trust to themselves, and have confidence in their own good service, rather than to remember the flamefull diligence and toil, received under the leading of the Decemvirs, and even those small bickerings, they had done them much good already against they should venture upon a set field, and heard them in affured hopes to win the victory. The Sabins again for their part, will duly upon their good success the year before, ceased not to provoke and urge their enemies very oft asking them what they meant after the guile of robbers, to run in and out in small companies, to to rifie out the
the time, and thus by peaceable means to make of one entire battle many petty and small skirmishes? H Why rather fought they not one field for all, and without more ado, hazzard all upon a cast, and commit the whole to the trial of fortune, to see unto what side fate will incline. Then the Romans besides that of themselves they had gathered heart and courage enough, were with their indignity of this challenge also set on fire: considering that when the other army was at the point now, with victory to return into the City, their enemies began to mutter and grumble within the camp, he assembled them all together, and thus he fpeaketh: "Sirs (quoth he) what facres hath been, and the service hath sped in Algidun, I suppose you have all ready heard, namely, such as befecm'd the army of three estates and people. By the policy of my fellow Conful, and the manhood of his fooldiers, achieved is the victory. As for my self, that cou'd not take, and that refulcure mind will I carry, which you my fooldiers shall afford unto me. The war may be drawn out in length profitably: it may be also dispatched and ended speedily: If prostrated it shall be, look how I have begun already to train you, with the same discipline till I will exercise you, and bring to pass, that your hope and promises may encrease every day more and other. If your hearts now serve you well, and that you like to fight it out, Go on in the name of God, and in token of your willing heart and valorous proffes, now set up such a cry and shout, as you will make when you first join battle, and give the charge. After that they had with exceeding cheerfulnes shouted aloud: God bless us all (quoth he) I will fulfill your desire, and bring you forth to morrow into the field for to fight, So the rest of that day was bestowed in making their harness and weapons ready. When the morrow was come, the Sabins so soon as they perceived the Romans ranged in battle array, came forth also themselves, as ready and desirous of fight, as they. Here was a battle struck, such as might befall two armies, that trusted on both sides in their own value, and made full account of that day's honour. The one eager and greedy to recover their ancient glory, wanted evermore to have the upper hand, the other proudly treating themselves upon a new victory lately achieved. The Sabins besides, mended their strength well with a stratagem, for when they had equally divided their battalions every way, they received two thousand drawn out of the rest, extraordinary without the ranks apart. Who in the very time of the conflict, should hotly charge the left point of the Romans: they advancing overwaft with their enmies, & flanging them on the one side, prided themselves up that one point, and overcharged it, well near environed all about. Then the horsemens of two legions 600, almost in number, alight on foot, from their horsebacks, and as their fellows were even now ready to retreat, rush forward with all speed to the forefront: and withal, made head against the enemy. And first they put life unto them again, for that they entered equally with the footmen into danger and bare even part thereof: afterwards, for very shame, they gave more boldnes, and animated them to fight. For abashed they were, that horsemen should be put to double service in both kinds of fight, on horse and on foot: and professed footmen Not to counteract the horsemen, who had taken them to their feet. So they advance forward to the battle, which on their part was abandoned, and make haste to recover the ground which they had lost. And in a trice, at one instant, not only the fight was rennt, but also a battalion of the Sabins began to shrink. The horsemen closely among the ranks and files of the footmen, gat again to their horses, and from thence rode speedily unto the other side reporting of their fellows the victory: and withal, sharply charged the enemies, who now were affrighted, because the stronger wing of their side was discomfited: neither were there any in this battle also, that were leen to perform better service then they. The Conful as an overseer, beheld all the manner of it, praising those that stood to it manfully, and rebuking where they fought but faintly. They were not so soon chastified and reproved but presently they bare themselves like hardy men, and did right good service: and look how much that praise excited some, so much flame flirred upon others. Then with a fresh shout and outcry, they bent their whole force on all sides, and compelled the enemies to turn their backs: who were not able after this, to abide the violence of the Romans. The Sabins scattered here and there all over the fields, left their tents for a spoil to their enemies: where the Romans recovered again not the goods of their Allies as before in Algidun, but their very own, which they had lost by the forraging and spoiling of their lands.

For this two-fold victory achieved in two bloody battles, the Senat right sparingly (such was their mility) decreed in the name and behalf of the Confuls, one days thanksgiving and procession, and no more. But the people, the second day likewise, without order and warrant from authority solemnized the same in great numbers. And this popular procession, disorderedly as it was, and without formalty, was with more good will and better affection of men celebrated, then the other. The Confuls of let purpose (as it was agreed afore) came within the compass of those two days into the City: and summoned the Senat to assemble in Mars field: where, as they were about to make some speech of their exploits and worthy acts, the chief and principal Lords of the Senat, complainted and flew themselves grieved, that the Senat was assembled on purpose, among the fooldiers, to strike a terror into them. Whereupon the Confuls, because they would give no occasion of quarrel and fault-finding, called away the Senat from thence into Prata Flaminia, where now the Temple of Apollo is, a place which even then they called Circus Apollo, maris, where they being denied triumph with one voice and general consent of the nobles, L. fliius a Tribun
A Tribun of the Commons, propounded unto the people, to know what they thought of the Consuls' triumph, and amongst many that stepped forth to crost and diswade the bill, C. Claudia above all others cried out aloud, that the Coll, intended to triumph over the Nobles, and not over their enemies: and that they sought a thank by way of recompence for a private favour done to the Tribun, and not for an honorable reward, for any virtue and worthy act. For never (quoth he) aforetime, was there held any treaty of triumph before the people: but now more it was referred to the Senate, to consider and determine of that honor. Neither had the Kings at any time, improved the Majesty of that highest Court and degree: what should the Tribuns then meddle so much, and have their hand in all matters by virtue of their authority, as to suffer no publicc counsel at all to remain in force? For a City can never be counted free, nor Laws equal and indifferent, but when each degree and estate retaineth still their own privilege, and hold their proper pre-eminence. When the rest of the principal Senators had spoken much to the same effect, all the Tribes notwithstanding in general, allowed by their suffrages that which the Tribun had propounded. This was the first time that ever any triumph was granted by the voices of the people, without the authority and assent of the Senators. But this victory of the Tribuns and the commonalty, had like to have turned to a dangerous forfeiture of licentious liberty: by reason that the Tribuns conspir'd together and were fully agreed, to be chosen Tribuns again: and to the end that their own ambition should be let seen above others, they alledged to the Coll, for a sufficient reason (that they likewise should continue still in place of government) the agreement and concert of the Senators: through whose holding together and drawing in one line, the liberties of the Commons, to the great disgrace and reproach of the Consuls, were infringed and indamaged. For what would come of it, say they, if before the late Laws were fully established the new Consuls with their factions boding, should uppon the new Tribuns: for we must not look to have always such as the Horatii and Valerij; to be Consuls, men that would not regard their own weal before the freedom of the commonalty. As it hapned very well for that time, it fell to M. Duillius his lot especially, to be chief President of the Comices and Election: who like a prudent and wise man, forseeing the heart-burning and hatred, like presently to ensue, upon the continuance of the same Fayette's still in place, said flatly, that of the old Tribuns he would not propound any one: and when his brethren in office laboured earnestly with him, to permit the Tribes to go to a free election, or else yield up the charge to him allotted, of holding the assembly, unto his brethren, who would keep the same and manage the matter, according to Law rather than to the will and pleasure of the Nobles: Duillius then, seeing their earnest contention, caus'd the Consuls to be called into their own pates and feasts, and demanded their minds concerning the Election of the Consuls: and when they answered that they would create new, he having once got them to be the authors of a popular sentence, and not popular themselves, went forth together with them into the assembly of the people. Now when the Consuls were brought out into their presence, and were asked the question, what they would do, in case the people of Rome should elect them Consuls the second time, and that, in remembrance of their liberty received and recovered by their means, and for their good service in war, and worthy acts by them performed: he finding them constant in the same mind still, and nothing altered from their resolution; after he had commended the Consuls, for their steadfast perseverance unto the last (as altogether unlike to the Decemvirs) went presently to the new Election, and when he had created five Tribuns only, seeing there were not other competitors enough to reach unto sufficient voices of the Tribes, in comparison of the other nine Tribuns his colleagues, who openly stood to be chosen again: he brake up the assembly, and from that time forward called no more about any Election. For he said, That he had fulfilled the Law in that behalf which without fetring down any precise and definite number of Tribuns, so that there were some left behind, and rooms void, gave authority to those that were created, to chuse and take unto them more colleagues, to make up the number. And therewith he recited the words of the Law, which run in this form. If I shall have presented two Tribuns of the Commons to be created, and they shall not elect those which I desired to give them, I shall have no authority to create Tribuns of the Commons. Thus when Duillius perfified still relinquisht unto the end, saying, That in any case the State might bear five and twenty Tribuns and having thus conquered the greedy ambition of his colleagues: with great favor and the good liking as well of the Nobility as the Commonalty, he gave up his room. The new Tribuns now in the election and making choice of their companions, curst their favour with the Senators, and framed themselves to their will and pleasure, in chusing to them some of the Nobility, and those that had been Consuls, to wit, T. Tarpeius and Ab. Eternus. And Consuls there were created, T. Hermellius and M. Tiburius Caliguerus. Who bearing themselves in a mean between Commons and Nobles, and not greatly inclining to one side or other had peace as well at home as abroad. Lu. Treadcous a Tribun of the Commons, being highly offended with the Senators and spitefully bent against them, and saying withal, that in the coaptation of the rest of the Tribuns he had been cunningly over-taken by them, and betrayed by his colleagues, proposed a Law. That whatsoever hereafter propounded unto the Commons any Tribuns to be elected, should not give over, but till propound, until he made up the full number of ten. Thus continued he all his Tribunship in perplexing and molesting the Nobles, never letting them to be quite: whereupon he was surmised After.
After this, M. Goganiai Maximus, and C. Julius, being created Consuls, appeased the contentious Orations of the Tribuns, which were begun and raised against the young Gentlemen of the Nobility, so as without any bitter imputations against that authority of the Tribuns, they prevented still the sober Majesty of the Nobles: and by means of decreasing matters against the wars of the Volcians and Equians, stayed the Commons, and kept the City from all sedition and di-cord: saying, That by civil unity, all would be at quiet abroad: whereas through discord of citizens, foreigners took heart. The care likewise of outward peace was the cause of inward and interim concord. But evermore the one late disquieted the moderation of the other: for whiles the Commons were still and in good tempot, the piny Senators began to offer them wrong and hard measure. And when the Tribuns would have affuited the weaker side, at first it booted little, I and small good they did: but afterwards they themselves escaped not without abuse and hurt: and especially in their latter moneths, when as they received injuries, both by reason of the meetings and packing together of the mighty fort, and also for that toward the end of the year, the edge and vigor commonly of all authority waxeth dull and growth weak and weak. So that now the Commons had little or no confidence at all in the Tribunhil, unless they might have such as Julius to be Tribuns: and as for these two years last past, they had them but in bare name, and not to any effect and purpoze, The elders and ancient fathers of the Senate on the other side, as they believed verily that their youth were too forward and lusty: so they were of this mind, That if there needs must be trepuls and excess, they had rather those of their own degree and cost should exceed measure, and have greater stomack, than their adversaries. So that nothing more dangerous a thing it is to keep a mean in maintenance of liberty: whiles under a colour of with-ning and dislinguishing equality, every man advanceth and lifeth up himself to, as that he thieth and beareth down another, and in pretending a care and regard that men should not stand in awe and fear of them, they make themselves dread and fearful to others, and so the wrong that we put off and turn from our selves, we impose upon others, As if there were no remedy, but that we must either do, or suffer injury.

Then were made Consuls, T. Quintius Capitolinus the fourth time, and Agrippa Furinus who found neither edification within, nor war without. But yet both the one and the other was near at hand.
For now could no longer the dissention of the citizens be held in, but needs it must break out, And both Tribuns and Commons role against the Nobles. For in all the assemblies and meetings of the people, one or other of the Commons and Senators were served with proceses: whereupon grew fresh troubles and new contentions. At the first noise whereof, as if the signal of battle had been given, and the alarm fricken upon the Equians and Volcians took arms: and withal, their Leaders and Captains (such as gaped greedily after spoil and pillage) had born them in hand and perswaded them to believe, That for these two years past, they could not go through with their musters proclaimed: for that the Commons refused to obey, and brake their allegiance: which was the only cause that there were no forces sent out against them. Besides say they, The use and manner of their warfare, is now with their licentious loocieens, discontinued and clean decayed: Rome was now no more a common-wealth and country to her citizens: For all their anger, quarrrels and malice, that they bare aforetime against forein nations, was now turned upon their own M selves: so that at this time they did fit occasion and good opportunity to surprize them, blinded as wolves with mutual rage and fury one against another. Hereupon they joyned their whole power, and first wasted the country of Latium: and afterwards seeing none to encounter them and make defence (to the exceeding joy of those that were the authors of this war) they came foraging and spoiling all the way to the very walls of Rome, even before the gate Ebalinum, there braving and vanishing in reproachful and scornful terms before the whole City, telling them how they had laid their fields and territories waste. From whence they retired themselves without revenge and losl, driving their booties store them, and marched along to Corbin. Quintius the Consul seeing this, assumed the people, and there (as I have heard) he made to them a speech in this wise:

"I am not privy to my self, and my confidence accuseth me not of any fault, O Quirites, yet am I exceedingly abashed and ashamed to come forth into this assembly of yours: that ever you should know, or the povertie hereafter understand, how the Equians & Volcians (who of late days were hardly comparable to the Hernicks) came when T. Quintius was the fourth time Col, in warlike manner with banner displayed to the walls of the City of Rome: & went their ways again clear and without any hurt by them received. This shameful dishonor, if I had known it would have light, so just in this year (and yet for this good while the world hath so gone, and such hath been the course of our life and conversation, that my mind ever gave me there was no goodness toward) I would have avoided this place of dignity, either by banishment or death, if there had been no other way to escape it. And might indeed have Rome been taken in the time of my Consulship, if these weapons which were under our gates had been in the hands of valorous men? Then had I indeed enjoyed sufficient honor already: she had I lived long enough, and a little too long, and might have dyed well when I was but the third time Consul. But who were they? I pray you, whom these meall bale and cowardly enemies of ours despised and let for light by? Were we they that are your Consuls, or you (Quirites) the people of Rome? If we were in the falk, take from us as unmerciful & uncharity persons, our rule and government: and if thes be not enough, let us over and besides be wellpunished and abide the smart. But if the blame be in you Quirites, let neither God nor man chastifie your trepuls and offence, only do you repent your your selves, and be for therefore. It was not your cowardice that they scorned and defiled, neither was it their own valour wherein they trusted. For why they having been too often defeated and driven out of the camp and the field, fined with forfeiture of Lands, forced to go under the gallow, and brought into servitude knew very well both themselves and you also. No, no, the variance and discord between our own states and degrees, is the only bane, and nothing else, of this City the jates and debates, I lay, between the Nobles and the Commons. Whiles neither we have any gage or stay of rule and command, nor you know mean of freedom and liberty: while you are weary of Noble men rulers, and we likewise of the Commoners Magistrates, they gave gotten heart, and was bold. Now, (Gods will) what mean you to do, and what would you have? Tribunes of the Commons yeloned and fought after: for quietness and concord fake, we let you have your longing. Decemvirs you had a great mifs of, and them you desired: we granted and permitted them to be created. Weary you were anone, and all too weary of Decemvirs, we forced them to forgo their office. And when your anger continued till against them, being become private persons again, we suffered them to be put to death, and to be exiled from noble and right honorable men. When you would not elect anew your Tribunes of the Commons, you chose them at your pleasure. To create Consuls from out of your own factions, although we knew it hurtful and prejudicial to the Nobles, yet have we seen that dignity proper to Nobility, given away as it were, and made common with the Commonalty. The attendance of Tribunes, the appealing to the people, the Laws and Acts devised by the Commons, to be rendered and impoused upon the Nobles, to bind them thereto: and that, under the pretence and colour of isnorn, or equal and indifferent Laws, our own rights and privileges should be overthrown, we have abidden, and do still endure. When will there be an end once of discord and di dition? Shall we never have one City of it? Shall we never have this to be the common Country of us all? We can be content much better to be at quiet, when we are vanquished than whiles we are victors. And is it not enough for you, that you are dead and learned at us? but till you seek for more? Against us it was, that you took the Mount Aventine, against us it was that you held and kept the Mountain Sacri. For when the gate Estus, was well-near inspired by the enemy and when the Volscians our enemies were ready to climb our trench and banks, and to scale our walls, none of you there was to be seen for to remove and kept them further off. Against us ye play the men against us ye can be armed. We then go to. When ye have here before the Senate-house taken up the market place and common Hall with fouldiers, filled the goal with Noblemen, and those of the, briefest and best quality, then with like courage and boundless of heart fully thereof the gate Estus. Or, if you dare not venture to much bold and view al to you from the walls discover your Lands and territories with fire and sword waited & con-fimed, your goods and cattel had and driven away as booties and prizes, your farms and houses burning and smocking every quarter. But all this time the Commonweal only (you think) by this means is in worse plight and poorer case, the villages fired the City besieged, and the enemy goeth with his way with the honor of the war. And in what taking, I pray you, is your own private elate the while? Tidings will come anon to every man particularly, out of his own livings and possessions of his proper losses: and what have you at home (it is man may ask) to make supply again? Will the Tribunes make you restitution, and amends for all your damages? You shall have words of them your fill. They will not shirk to speak to rail, and let fly landers fiercely before you against the heads of the City. Laws upon Laws you shall have heaped thick and threefold, Assemblies, convocations, and tedious invective good store. But from their other assemblies, never came there any of you home to his house, richer of one grey goat or little diller nor in better face to live than before. Was there ever any one carried ought from thence to his wife & children but hatred and malice displeasure and incour grudges and heart-burnings both publick and private? From which at all times ye have been shielded and defended if not with your own virtue and innocency, yet by the help and aid of others. But certainly, when ye served in wars under the conduct of your Conims, and followed not the leading of your Tribunes; when you served I lay in camp, and not in the Hall and common place; when in battle your enemies quaked to hear you shout and not in your assemblies the Romans were in dread of your war and out-cries: then you won prizes, and conquered Lands from your enemies, then you returned home with triumph to your houes, full of riches and wealth int of honor and renown as well publick as private. Whereas now, you suffer your enemies to depart, fraught and laden with your goods. Stick to your Ward-Lects, as if you were nailed and tatt pinned to them: dwell still in your Hall, and lead your lives continually there; yet until you never war when all is done, fly from it as fast as you can. Grieved it you indeed, and thought you it a trouble and painful thing, to take an expedition so far as into the Volscians and Aequian country? Lo, the war is come even into your gates: if it be not put from thence, it will anon be within the walls, it will scale the Cattle and Capitol it will follow you even into your houes. Two years ago, the Senate gave order and commanded that there should be fouldiers muttered and an army conducted into Agetum. But we sit still at home & do nothing, but chide & scold (as it were) one another like curts and threat women contenting our selves, and joying in a present peace and little feeling, that of that rest there will come triky was again, and that right shortly. I know full well, there are speeches more pleasing and plausible than these. But to speak the plain truth for your good rather, than to flatter and soothe for your pleasure, if mine own nature and disposition did not teach and admonish me, even very necessity doth force and constrain me. Willing would I be, and most willing O Quirites, to please you; but much more would I have you to be in safety, think whatsoever ye will of me. It faileth out commonly, as a thing that cometh by kind, that who so peacketh to a multitude in his own cause, and for himself, is better liked, and heard with more applause, than he whole mind aimeth at nothing else but a publick weal, timeis peradventure you think these common flatterers, these clawbacks, and men-pleasers, which give you no rest, neither in war nor peace, do stir you up and provoke you for your good. But will you have the trueth? ye being once solicited and pricked on by them, serve their turns in good heed; either for their honor or gain. And because they fee themselves to be of no worth and regard, while the fates do agree, they defer to play small game, rather than to sit out: to be Captains of mi-rue and lieutidness, rather than of nothing: and in one word, to be the heads, the ringleaders and guides of troubles and diffentions. Whereof, if you be so blest and happy, as to be weary now at length, and will betake you to the ancient manners and fashions, both of your own, and of your ancestors, in lieu of these new fanglours, I will refute no punishment: nay, let me be put to the most shameful death that is, if I do not before many days pafs over my head, defeat, discornt and put to flight these robbers and destroyers of our fields, and lend them packing out of their own camp, and finally translate and remove this terror of war, wherewith ye now are so affrighted and allowed, from our gates and walls, even unto their own Towns and Cities.

Seldom at any time else, had there been a speech delivered by a popular Tribune, more acceptable unto the Commons, than was the sharp Oration at this present of a more severe Conful, Yeas, and the very youth, which amid such terrors of war, had been wont to refuse soldiery, the only keen and sharp weapon they had to fight withal against the Nobles, now defired war and to be in arms. Over and besides, the country kerns that fled (to Rome.) such as were spoiled and wounded in the villages about, reported more foul and cruel outrages in their ears, than were pretended unto their eyes, and set all the City in an hot and angry broil. Now when the Senators were assembled together in the Counsel Hous, then verily they all cast their eyes upon Quintius, behaving and regarding him well, as the only patron and maintainer of the Majesty of Rome: but the chief peers and Lords of the Senate spake out and said: That he had made an Oration, be-seeking the sovereign Government of a Conful, beseeking so many Confulships by him already born, beseeking the whole course of his life, that he had past off through many honorable digni-ties, and yet always deferred more. As for other Confrs, they either in flattering and soothing up the Commons, had betrayed the dignity of the Nobles: or else in seeking by hard courtes to maintain the rights, preheminencies and royalties of their state, and to tame the multitude, have thereby made them more fell and untractable. But T ,Quintius, he hath made a speech, respectful and tending, as well to the royal dignity of the Nobles, as to the concord and unity of the States, and principally regarding the condition of the times. They would request him therefore, together with his brother Conful, to take in hand the care of the Common-wealth. They would request the Tribuns likewise, to join in one accord with the Confuls, and fliould themselves willing and forward to have the war kept off and put back from their City walls: and in so fearful and dangerous a cafe, to reclaim their Commons to their due obedience to their Nobles: saying moreover, That the native Country, the common mother of them all, calleth unto the Tribuns and craveth their aid, now that the territories are wafted, and the City at hand to be aflaulted. Whereupon, they all agreed generally to decree a mutter, and presently to make a levy of soldiers. And when the Confuls had pronounced before the whole people then and there assembled, that it was no time as then to hear excuses, but that all the younger fort, should become the next morning by day-light, be ready to attend in Mars field: and that after the war was ended, they would find out and appoint a time, to enquire into their allegations and reasons, that entered not their names: and that he should be taken for a traitor and rebel, whose excuse they allowed not: the whole manhood and youth of the City flewed themselves the morrow after in readines. Each cohort or regiment chose their Centinens or Captains, and every Regiment had two Senators for their N Provost Marshals. All this was performed (by report) with much speed and expedition, that on the very same day, the standards and ensigns were by the Quef tors had forth of the Armony and Chamber of the City and brought into Mars field: and by the fourth hour (or ten a clock) the same day, set forward and advanced out of the field. And this new army, with a few bands of old condicts, who willingly of their own accord followed them, marched on and refeted, at ten miles end. The day following they discovered their enemies, and at Corbio encamped close unto them.
And by the third day, there was no flay on both hands, but they mutt needs encounter and fight.
For why? The Romans for anger were sharper: the enemies again, upon a guilty confidence that they had so often rebelled, were grown desperate. Now, whereas in the Roman army the two Confuls were in equal commission, yet gave Agrippa place unto his brother Quintius, and yielded unto him the entire and absolute command. A course most profitable in the managing and execution of great affairs. And being thus preferred, he again in courteously answered and required the others Gerdeneis and inclination to submission, in this wise, by imparting unto him all his Comnds: by parting with him all his honor and praise; and by making him his equal, who was indeed his inferior and underling. In the battle, Quintius commanded the right point, Agrippa led the left: Sp. Pothinius Albinus, the Lieutenant General, had the conduct of the main battle, And P. Sulpicius the other Lieutenant, they let over the hirtemen. The foot-
The third Book of T. Livius.

A men of the right point fought most valiantly, and the Volsciens received them with equal valour, Sp. Sulpicius with his men of arms, brake through the main battle of the enemies: albeit he might have retired himself the same way again unto his company, before that the enemies could bring their ranks again into order, that were disarrayed: yet he thought it better to charge them upon their backs. And in one moment he had discomfited and quite defeated his enemies, by affailing them behind, and thus affrighting them on both sides, but that the Volsciens and Equeian Horsemen relaxed him, held him play in his own fight, and so kept him occupied a good while. "Whereas, Sulpicius said, it was no time now to linger and to drive off, but to beat themselves, crying out aloud that they were environed round, enclosed within their enemies, and excluded from their own fellows, unless they let to, and bent their whole force, quickly to dispatch the Horse-fight: and that it would not serve, to put the Horsemen to flight and save their lives: but kill both horse and man, that none might ride back again from thence into the battle to renew the fight. And to make head and resistance against him and his horsemen, they were never able, since that the main thick battal of footmen had given him ground already. Good ear they gave to his words, and soon harkened to his direction: and with one entire assault they gave a head charge, and defeated the whole power of the Cavallry, unhorted and dismounted a number of them, and with their javelins goared both them and their horses. And there's an end of the horse-service. Then they set upon the battle of the footmen and dispatched messengers unto the Conuls with news, what they had done: where also by that time, the battle of the enemies began to shrink. And when tidings came into the Romans that were already upon the point of victory, they verily were more encouraged, but the Equeians that were about to retreat, were stricken with greater fear. In the main battal first began the overthrow; namely, whereas the men of arms before had broken the array. After them, the left point also began to be disstressed and driven back, by Quintus the Conul. But in the right there was hardest hold, and most ado. Where Agrippa being a tall man of his hands and young withal, seeing in every part of the battal things go better than where he was, caught the enemies from the enign bearers, advanced them forward his own self, yea, and fell to striving some of them against the thickets of his enemies. For fear therefore of so flaming a disgrace, the louder, belittling itself, and sharply affailing the enemy. And when all hands alike, they achieved the victory and won the field. Then came a meleenge:

D from Q. intire & brought word that he had the better hand and was now ready to give an assault upon the camp, but would not break in, and enter the intro before he knew for certain, that they in the e't point also had gotten the upper hand, and made an end of the battal. In case therefore he had discomfited the enemy, he should join his forces to him, that the whole army altogether might gain the spoil and pillage of the tents. So Agrippa, who also for his part was victor, came to his brother Conul and the camp of the enemies, and met with mutual congratulation one to another. There, finding but a few to defend, whom it discomfited in the turning of an hand, they brake into the rumpants and musquets, without conflict or skirmish: and so besides the recovery of their own goods again which they had lost by the overturning of the country, they gained also a rich booty, and retired back with their wholearmy. I cannot learn, that either they themselves required triumph, or the Senate offered them any: and no cause appeared upon record, why they should either refute or not hope for that honor. For mine own part, so far as I can guess, in so long distance of times singing that Valerius and Horatius, who over and besides the conquest of the Volsciens and the Equeians, had the honor also of dispatching and finishing the Sabines' war, were denied triumph at the Senats hand: these Conuls might not with modelly, but for the fame: having performed but half the good service of the others: left if they had gotten it granted, there might have seemed more regard had of the perions, than of the desert.

But this noble and honourable victory over the enemies abroad, thus achieved, was obliered and foully disarrayed with a flameul doom of the people, in a controversy of their allies, about the bounds and meers of certain Lands. The inhabitants of Arietia and Ardej, having warred oftentimes one with the other, about some lands in question between them, and by giving and taking bloody forays and overthrowes outweared, chose the people of Rome their Umpire to decide and determine this quarrel. And when they were come with their council to plead the case, the Magistrates granted a Court of Allies of the people. Where was much arguing and dispute on both sides before them: and after the witnesses were depoied and that at length the Tribuns should be called to the curtiun, and the people give their voices, there steps forth an old father, one P. Scarpinus, a Commoner. And I (quoth he) my part, O Conuls if it be lawful, to speak for the good of the State, will not suffer the people to erre, and be deceived in this question. When as the Conuls denied him audience, as being an old fool, and of no credit: and commanded him (as he cried fill that the publick caufe of the City was betrayed) to be had away, he calleth for the assistance of the Tribuns. The Tribuns then, who lightly were overruled by the multitude rather than able to rule them, yeeded unto the Commons: That for as much as they were deirous to hear what the old man could say, Scarpinus should speak his mind at large. Then fenth he the tale on end, and beginneth thus: I am (quoth he) fourscore winters old, and three on the head of it: and even upon that very ground for which all this strife and variance is. I served as a fodder, when I was no young man neither but one that had been preft to wars, and received pay twenty years afore. And it was, I remember well, during the siege before Corioli. Hither am I now come, to give evidence of a thing by long continuance of time, the evidence given by old Scarpinus.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the fourth Book.

The Law concerning marriage between the Nobles and the Commoners, was proposed, and with much ado enacted by the Tribunes of the Commonwealth: notwithstanding, the Nobles withstood it; Tribunes military with full authority of Consuls were created. Under this kind of Magistracy was the State ruled for certain years, both in City and in war. The Lands of the Ardeates, which had been awarded from them by an arbitrement of the people of Rome, were restored again unto them, and Colonists sent to inhabit the same. In the time of a great dearth and famine at Rome, one Sp. Melius, a Roman knight, dealt corn amongst the people freely, at his own proper charges: by which deed he won the favor of the Commons; and thereby offering to be King, was at the commandment of Quintius Cincinnatus, the Dictator, slain by the hands of C. Servilius Hala, General of the Horsemen. L. Minucius, who defaced the treason, had a bullock with guilt horns given him for a reward, The Embassadors of the Romans, which were murdered by the Fidians, had their Statues or Images erected at the Rosetta, or the common Cross of the City, because they died in the service of the Commonwealth. Cornelius Cillus a Colonel, having slain with his own hand Tolumnius, the King of the Veneti, was made by the second Here succeeded Consuls after these, M. Ceninius and P. Curciatus. A year full of broils, both at home and abroad. For in the beginning of the year, both Censure, a Tribune of the Commons, proposed a law, concerning alliance of the Patriarchs with Commons, by way of marriage. Whereby the Nobles supposed their blood to be stained, and the Rights and Privileges of Families and Houses confounded. Also, whereas at first the Tribuns by little and little had moved, That one of the Consuls might be created out of the Commons: now the matter proceeded so far, that of ten Tribuns that then were, the other nine proposed this in plain terms for a law. That it might be in the peoples power to chuse both the Cofl. (if they would) either out of Commons or Nobility, May, if it should come to pass the Nobles thought indeed that the sovereign rule and authority, was not only made common with the basal fort, but also translated altogether from the great men and bell of the City, to the commonalty. Glad were the Senators therefore to hear, that the people of Ardea, for the wrongful awarding away of their Lands from them, were revolte: and that the Venetians had waited the frontiers of the Romans: and that the Volcians and Equins garded and murthered for the fortifying of Verrugo; So much preferred they any war, miserable though it were and dangerous, before a shamefull and dishonourable peace. Having heard therefore these news, and taken them in the worst manner, to the end that the rumour and brut of so many wars, the Tribunitian troublesome suits might stay and be dead for the time: they command masters to be taken, and soldiers to be levies, all fortune of war, and all manner of force to be prepared, and (if it might be) with more deavours, than it had been when Q. Quinctius was Consul. Then C. Censure, after some words which he spake aloud in the Senate; namely, that the Commons by frightening the Commons, went about but in vain, to avert them from the regard of their new Laws: and thistol long as he had any breath in his body, they should never go through with matter, unless the Commons had first ratified those things, which by him and his brethren had been proposed: forthwith assembled the people together. Thus at one instant the Consulsanimated the Senate against the Tribuns, and the Tribun incited the people against the Consuls. The Consuls gave it out plainly and said, that no longer now might these furious couples of the Tribuns be endured. Now were they come to the very height and extremity, and raised more war in effect, at home, than the enemies abroad. Which thing (no doubte) happened not to much through the fault of the Commons, as of the Nobles, nor of the Tribuns more, than of the Commons. For look what thing was best rewarded in a City, the fame always most increased: thus men in peace (we fe) prove excellent, thus in war they come to be singular. In Rome (say they) leditious ped ever bell, and have been reputed both to each one in particular, and to all ingeneral most honourable. But let the Senate call to mind the dignity which they themselves had received from their fathers, and compare it with that which they were like to leave to their children: and see, whether they may boast as the commonalty doth, how that their condition is much betered and more glorious than before, Well, neither is there any end of the allegataions of the Consuls against the Tribuns of the Commons.
We shall have then the Camileius and Italians to be our Coffers, But Jupiter (that great good God) forbid, that ever the Royal and Imperial Majesty, should come to that low ebb or declination: they were a thousand deaths rather, than suffer to great a shame and indignity, knowing this adversity, that their ancestors allow, if they had once suspected or foreseen, that by granting the commonalty every thing as they desired, they would not have more lovely and cheerful towards them, but rather more curious and untractable: and when they had obtained their first fits, to proceed still to demand worse and worse, one thing after another: they would sooner have indured at the first, any contending and debate whatsoever, than suffer those hard conditions to be imposed, and put upon them: and because they had once relented, that Tribunes should be created, therefore to grant them again the second time. I say then, there is no quietness with them, nor end of quarrels will be none, so long as in one and the self fame City, Tribunes and Senators remain together. Nay verily, either this state must be put down, or that office utterly abolished. And better later than never, to withstand and meet with their rage and desperate boldness. What shall they without control, first low discord at home, and then siphon forrein wars abroad? and afterwards, against those wars which themselves have raised, debar and hinder the City, for to take arms and defend itself? and when as they have as good a sent for the enemies to come to their doors, then, not suffer an army to be levied against them. But let Camileius (if he dare) speak these words out in the Senate, That unless the Nobles suffer his laws, as if he were a Conqueror, to be admitted and received, he will lay the murthering? For what else is that, but to threaten that he will fell and betray his country, and suffer it to be affaile and lost? What encouragement will lurch a word, give as that, I say not, to the commonalty of Rome, but to the Volscians, Equeans and Venetians? Will not they hope, under the conduct of Camileius, to be able to scale the Capitol and the Caffle, if to be the Tribunes shall take from the Nobility their courageous hearts, as they have bereaved them already of their right, their honor and dignity? Let him know therefore, that the Conuls are ready, first to shew themselves to be Captains and Leaders, against the mischievous practices of their own citizens, before they will make head again against the armed forces of their enemies? While these matters were debated of with great contention and heat in the Senate house, Camileius for the maintenance of his laws, and to cross the Conuls, made this Oration unto the people. How greatly the Nobles have defpised you, O Quirites, how unworthy, they have ever thought you, to live among them within the walls of one City, me thinks I have, as often hereuntofo, so now especially and most of all perceived: in that they have risen up altogether to fiercely to check and withstand our proposed laws. Wherein, what pretend we else, but to tell them and put them in mind, That we are, as well as they, citizens: and although we are not of the same wealth, yet we inhabit the same country with them? In the one, we request marriage: a thing to borderers, yes, and to foreign nations usually granted: and to speak of our selves, we also have afforded even to our conquered enemies, the benefit of our City, which is far more than marriage. In the other, we move no new matter, but only claim again and challenge that, which is the people's right, to wit, that the people of Rome may below their offices and dignities, upon whom they pleafe. What reason have they then, I pray you, to fer all on an upproar, as if Heaven and Earth should go together? and what is the caufe, that cerebrally I hadSlice to have had violence offered unto me in the Senate? What moved them to break out and say, they could not forbear or keep their hand from me, and threaten to abuse and violate the sacred authority of the Tribunes? Set cale that the people of Rome may have their free voice, and suffrages, to elect the Conuls whom they will, and that no Commoner be denied, so he be worthy of the highest place, for to obtain the sovereign dignity. How then? cannot this City possibly fland any longer? and is our Empire come to an end for ever? And all one it is (be like) an importune as much to disable a Commoner, for being made Conul, as if a man inferred, that a bondman or a freed libertine should become Conul. Perceive you not yet (my Malters) in what content you live? They would, if they might, bereave you in some measure of this day's right: that ye breath and speake, that ye have the shapes of men, they think much, they reprove, and it goes to their heart. And what else? They give it out flatterly and say (if God will) it is un- lawful, that a Commoner should be a Conul. I believe you hear me a little. If we may not be allowed to read the Chronicles, nor to peruse the High-priests records and registris, know we not those things then, that even all strangers now? namely, That Conuls entered in place of Kings, and succeeded them, and have no other right, preheminence or dignity at all, than Kings had before? Think ye that men have never heard, that Norma Pamphilius, a man not so much as a citizen of Rome, much less then, a Patrician and Nobly descended among them, was sent for out of the Sabines country, and by the people's voices, and the silent of the Nobles, created King of Rome? Alfo, afterwards, how L. Tarquinius, who was no Roman born, no, nor yet so much as an Italian, but the son of Demaratus the Corinthian, a stranger inhabitant at Tarquinius, and from thence removing, albeit King Ancus his sons were living, attained likewise to the crown? Moreover, how Servius Tullius after him, the son of a captive woman of Cornelium, whose father was unknown, whole mother a bondwoman, through wit and vertue, obtained and held the Kingdom? For what should I speak of T. Tatius the Sabine, whom Romulus himself, the father and founder of this City, admitted to reign together with him? Well, so long as no flock was disdained, no race rejected, wherein appeared parks of vertue, the Romans Em"pire became mighty, and flourished. Scorn ye then at this day, a Conul out of the Commonalty, when our forefathers deplored not Kings that were aliens and strangers? No, nor when the Kings were expelled, was this City denied and flurnt against forreiners, that were valorous, men of action. The kinned and whole name (I am here) of the Claudii, after the Kings were exiled, we not only admitted into our City, from out of the Sabinus, but alfo received into the number of the Patrarians and Noble men. And may a meer forrainer indeed become a Nobleman, and to a Conul? And hall a Citizen of Rome, if he be of the Commonalty, be wholly disbled and out of all hope, or ever of being Conul? Tell me I pray you, Think ye it not poiffible, that a valiant and hardy man, approved both in war and peace, being one of the Commons, may proove like to Numa, E. Tarquinius, or Servius Tullius: and must, whether we forfe it him to govern the Common-veal, or no? And whether will ye have our Conulis, such rather as the Decemvirs (the most wretched and wicked persons under the fea, who, by your leave, were at that time of the Nobility) than strangers and new-comers, which of all the Kings were simply the very best? But forfooth, preiently after the KK, were defpofed and expelled, there was not one of the Com, a Conul, What of that? ought no new thing to be ordained, and which hath not been already taken up afore? For many things have not yet been praofed, as in late newly incorporated ought not ftch then to be put in life, if they be thought expedient? While Romulus reigned, there were no Bishops nor Angers: by Numa Pompilius they were created. There was no Selling of the people at all in the City, no description of Hundreds and Clanes. By S. Tullius they were instituted, Cofl, were never heard of before: when the KK, were driven out, they were elected. The time was, when neither the abolute rule nor yet the name of a Dictator was known. In our fathers days it first began, Tribuns, Ediles, Qeetiors there have been none: it was ordained they should be made. Within this ten years, we have both created and alfo abfolved out of the common-veal, Decemvirs for the making and penning of our laws, And who doth not, but in a City founded for ever to endure, and incrcaning still infinitely, there will be brought in new Governments, new Priet-hoods and facer donal dignities, new priviledges both of kindreds and private persons? And even this one thing in question, to wit, that the Com, and Nobles might not joyn in marriage, were not the Decem-vers that ftift within these few years made that Edict? A most shameful example and precedent in a free state, and tending to the maineft wrong of the Commons. Can there be any greater or more notorious injury, than that there should be in a City one part and member, as defiled and polluted, thought unworthy of the bond of marriage? What elle is this, but to suffer exile and confining within the fame walls, when they debar us that we fhould not be either al-laved in affinity or knit in kindred? They provide (forfooth) and take order that blood fhould not be mixed, nor families confumed. How then? If this do pollute this great gentry of yours, which moft of you deceed, from the Sabinus and Albans, have not by right line from the Pa-trianens, but by copitation and election into the number of the Nobles, as being chosen either by the favour and grace of the Kings, or else by the peoples voyces after the KK, were expelled: could not your wisdome, and kept your blood uncorrupt by some private means and provion, namely, by taking heed neither to epofolute wives from among the Commons, nor to suffer your daughters and fifters to be married to any other than Nobles? No commoner (ye might before) would have forced a daughter of any noble house: no, these infelenoees of laicitions liet are appropriate to Gentlemen only of the Nobility: none of us would have compelled any of you against his will, to make covenant and contrac of marriage. But I wot, that by an ex-pref law it fhould be forbidden, and that marriage between Nobles and Commons fhould be condemned, that is, which to the commonality is a plain contumely and open injury. And why couet ye not, and lay your heads together, that the rich may not marry with poor? That, which at all times and in all places, hath been a matter left unto particular policy and confe-ration: namely, That into what houfe ever a woman caft a liking and fancy, there the might be married: and into what family a man oblied himself by word, promife and covenant, from thence he might take a wife: even that, reftaine ye within the bonds of a most proud and tyrannical law, whereby ye might break in under all civil soeietie, and of one City make twain. Why forbid ye not by a positive Law, that a commoner should not dwell by a Noble-man, or go the same way that he doth, or frequent the same feaft, or converse in the fame market or common place of aflemblie? For in effect what difference is there if a Gentleman marry a commoners daughter, or a commoner epofolute a Gentlewoman? What right I pray you or condition of state is thereby changed? fully the children till take after the father. Neither feel we for any thing ele by matching with you, but only this, that we may be reckoned in the number of men and of the citizens. Neither is there any canie, why you should fo contend and stand upon it (unless it do you good to cros and take a pleafeure to exercife your felves in working us disgrace and shame,) Finally I would gladly know whether the favereign government of the state relileth in you or in the people of Rome? When the Kings were driven out, go you thereby to your felves Loyally fovereignty, or purchased all men equal liberty? It muft needs be granted, that the people of Rome may at their pleasure publifh and ordain a law. And will ye then as soon as any law whatever, is by them proposed, appoint a mater preliftly for their punishment? and as soon as E for ever, by them proposed, appoint a mater prelently for their punishment? and as soon as I thay am Tribun, shall begin to call the wards to give their voyces, shall you that are Conulis by and by fwear all the younger fort, pref them to warriere, lead them forth unto the field, and menace.
menace the Commons; menace I say, the Tribun also? What? If ye had not twice already good experience, how little these goodly threats of yours prevailed against the Commons, when they agreed and stuck together, it were somewhat, Will ye say, that ye forbear to strive, ye rendered our good, and for pity spared us? Nay rather, to say a truth, was not this the case that no sly was made. For that the longer tide was also the more cool and melodiet of the twain; Neither (O Quirites) will there now, I warrant you, be any combate, nor blows dealt: they will always fly at and found, what stomacks and hearts ye have, but never will they feel your fists, and try how keen your swords be. Therefore to these wars (be they falsely pretended, or truly indeed reported) O ye Consuls, the Commons are ready to follow you provided always, that by granting them liberty of mutual marriage, ye will make at length this City one: that they may be linked, joined and united unto you by private alliance and affinity: that hardy and valiant men may have hope and possibility, to honors and dignities: that they may be allowed fellowship and society in the Common-wealth. Finally, that (which is due unto equal liberty) they may one with another in alternative course, obey annual Magistrates, and be obeyed against their will and talk at your pleasure of wars: multiply and make them as many and as great as ye will: There is not one shall give his name, nor one shall take arms, nor one shall fight for those proud Lords, with whom they can have neither fellowship of dignity in the Common-wealth, nor alliance of marriage in private affaire. Now when as the Consuls also were come forth into the open assembly of the people, and that they fell on all hands from continued and long Orations, to short dispute and altercation: the Tribun demanded why a commoner might not attain to a Consulship? Unto whom the Consul returned an answer, as to the substance perhaps truly, so for the present contention not very wisely and to the purpose: Namely, because that no commoner had the Apices: which was the cause why the Decemvirs ordained distinct marriages, left upon a doubtful and mingled issue, there should follow a troubled condition of the Apices. But hereat, the Commons flamed and stamp'mot of all: that as odious men unto the immortal Gods, they were flatly denied and deemed unworthy to observe the flight and singing of birds. And never gave they over their threats of clamorous debate (whiles the Commons had gotten unto them a moment to thramp the Tribun to let them a work, and were themselves in obtinacy no whit behind him) until at length the Nobles were over one and driven to grant, that the Law as touching marriage should pass: supposing by that means especially, that the other Tribuns would either clean give over their suit for making commoners Consuls or at least wife put it off, until the war were ended: and that the Commons in the mean while being well pleased and contented with marriage among the Nobles, would be willing and ready to levy a mother, Consulemus for this his victory over the Nobles, and for the favours he got among the Commons, became a great and mighty man. Whereupon, the other Tribuns were kindled to the like combate: and for the proceeding of their Law also, indebted with all their might and main, and albeit the rumout of the war encreased daily more and more: yet they hinder the levy of consules. The Consuls seeing now that no decree and order could pass the Senate-house, by reason that the Tribuns interpreted their negative vote: took counsel together with the chief of the Nobility at home in their private houses. And well they saw that they must yield either the victory to their enemies or the buckler to their own citizens. Of all the Senators that had been CoH, only Valerius and Horatius were not present at these counsels, C. Claudius his opinion was, That the Consuls should put themselves in arms against the Tribuns: But the two Quirites, C. Memmius and Capito, disapproved all bloodshed and violent proceedings against those, whom by a solemn covenant made with the Commons, they had received and accepted for to be as far from stain and inviolable. But in these counsels they grew to this point in the end, that they designed military Tribuns of equal power with the Consuls, to be created indifferently from out of the Commons and Nobles: provided always, that as touching creation of the Consuls, there should be no alteration from the old manner aforesaid. And herewith were both Tribuns and Commons well satisfied and contented. A general assembly therefore was proclaimed for the deiining of three Tribuns in Consul authority, which being once published: forthwith as many as had spok'en or done ought tending to sedition, and above all others those that had been Tribuns of the people, began in their whitst robes to take hold of men and run to and fro about the common place labouring for this dignity. At the first, the Nobles partly in despair of obtaining the place (seeing the Commons set a flote) partly for disdain and indignation to bear any honourable office joyntly with them of so base condition, were scared and affrighted from standing therefore: at the last (but they were forced thereto first by the heads and the chief Lords of the Senate) they were content to be competitors and suiters for the dignity: left they might seem to be fully excluded forth of the possession of the Common-wealth, and leave it entirely. The event and effect of this Court, showed O plainly, that mens minds are otherwise affected in contending about liberty and dignity, than presently after such contentions laid away, they are in weighing and judging aught without passion and affression. For the people satisfied herewith that there was some account made of the Commons, and that they were not shut out, elected military Tribuns all of the Nobles. This modelly, this equity, this noble mind where shall a man now days finde in one person, which then was to be seen in the whole people? In the three hundredth and tenth year after the City of Rome was founded, were the first military Tribuns created, that bare office in the room of the Con-
A Confuls, to wit, A., Sempronius Aratianus, L. Arrudus, and C. Cecilius: in whole government concord at home caused also peace abroad. There be writers who affirm, That upon occasion of the Vetianet war, and the rebellion of the Ardeats, because two Confuls were not able to manage so many wars at once, therefore were three military Tribuns chosen: without making any mention of the Law published, concerning election of Confuls of the Commons: and that they were invested both in the jurisdiction, and also in the ornaments of the Confuls, Howbeit, the exercise of that government, how not fuel and sure, nor continued long. For within three months after that they entered, they forewent their offices by a decree of the Augurs, as if there had been some error in their creation. It was alleged that C. Cæcilius, who was President of that Court of Election, had taken his quarters a mile for the observation of the lucky signs by flight of birds, and not according to the Augurs skill.

There came from the Ardeats to Rome Embassadors, complaining of wrong received, in these terms: That if it might be redressed, and amends made, and their grounds restored, they seemed willing to abide still in league and amity. Answer was made them by the Senate, that the judgment of the people already passed, could not be reversed by the Senate, if it were for nothing else but for concord fake and agreement of the States: besides, they had neither any precedent to lead them thereto, nor Law and authority to warrant them. Marry, if the Ardeats would wait their times and put to the Senate arbitration and discretion, the redress and satisfaction of their injury pretended, it would come to pass, that in progress of time they should not repent of governing their passions and bridling their holier: and should well know, that the Nobles had a good regard, that if there should no wrong be offered unto their friends, as they were careful, that if any were offered it should not long continue. Thus the Embassadors promising to make a true report unto their citizens of the matter, wholly as it was: were friendly dismissed, and had their duty rende.

The Senators seeing now the Commonweal, without any foreign Magistrates of the chair and of State, went together, and made an Intergent: and whiles they thereto, whether Confuls or Tribuns should be created, the Intergent continued many days. The Intergent and the Senate laboured, that there should be an Election of Confuls: the Tribuns on the other side, and their Commonality were for the Tribuns Conunar. But the Senators prevailed, because both the people seeing they were to confer the one office or the other, upon the Nobles, conceived to arise any more: and also the chief of the Commons chose rather to have that Election, wherein they should not be on occasion prejudiced, than wherein they were sure to take the repulse, as unworthy. The Tribuns also gave over to construe any longer to no purpose, and without effect, seeming thereby somewhat to gratify and please the LL. of the Senate. So T. Quinctus Barbatus the Intergent, chose for Confuls L. Papius Magnianus, and L. Sempronius Aratianus. Whiles these were Confuls, the league with the Ardeats was renewed, and this is the only evidence and proof, that they were Confuls that year, for that neither in the ancient yearly records, nor in the Calendars of the Magistrates, they are found at all, I take it, because the military Tribuns were created in the beginning of that year: and therefore, although these Confuls were in their head chosen, yet their names were left out, as if the other had remained in office the whole year.

Lecinius Massey affirmed, that they are mentioned both in the composition with the Ardeats, and also in the linen books or regillers in the Church of Jano Moneta. Albeit there had been so many rebellions and bravados threatened from the borderers, yet both abroad and at home, all was quiet. And whether Tribuns only, or Confuls also chosen in the room of Tribuns governed in this year; certain it is, that the next following, had Confuls M. Geminus Maccalinus the second time, and T. Quinctus Capitolinus the first time. This was the very year when the Censors office came up first. A thing that role at a small beginning: which notwithstanding afterwards increased to that height, that it had government of the manners and discipline of the Romans: and under the jurisdiction thereof, the Senate and Centuries of the order of knights, the division of worship and shameful disgrace, were reduced. Likewise the survey of publick and private Edifices, and the temples, revenues and subsidies of the people of Rome were at the disposition, ordering, and dismission of that office. The beginning of which thing arose upon this occasion: For that the people in many years space had not been affessed and numbered, and seeing the Cenel could be defeter no longer, nor the Confuls (by reason of wars, from lo many nations imminent) had leisure to go about and accomplish that business: the Senate therefore made a motion that the charge being painful, and not for the Majesty of Confuls to buy themselves in, required a special Magistrate, and a peculiar officer by it self. Under whom should attend the Secretaries and Clerks: who likewise should have the keeping and charge of the rolls and publick records: and at whose discretion should pass the edicts and instruments of all Affemsions. The Senators therefore accepted gladly of this overture, although it were but a trifling matter: yet because there should be the more Magistrates of the Nobility. Supposing (I ween) it would come to pass (as it proved indeed) that shortly the power and wealth of those, who bare the office, should win more authority and credit into the thing. Yea, and the Tribuns also made no great ado, but indulged it to pass, being an office (as it was in truth, no other at that time) rather of necessity and attendance than of power, or honor: because they would not seem to be rows and peetith in every small matter. When as therefore this dignity was of the principal of the City confered the people by their voyces chose to that Office, Papius and Sempronius, of whole Confulship there was some doubt: to the end, that by that office they might supply and make up the

the defect and mis of a Consulship. And of the excercise and function it self, Censors were they called,

While these things were a doing at Rome, there came Embassadors from Ardeea, craving as well in regard of their most ancient amity, as also of the late league renned, their helping hand for their City, weleigh undone and overthrown. For, peace (which witty and by right good advice they had kept and maintained with the people of Rome) they might not enjoy at home, by reason of inward debate and dometical quarrels. The caufe and beginning whereof, as it is reported, arose from sedition and faction, which have been and will be to most States more pernicious, than forain wars, than famine or plague, or other adversities, which men attribute to the anger and wrath of God, as the extremity of all publick calamities whatsoever. There was a maid, a Commons daughter and no better, by birth, but for her rare beauty of singular note and passing renown: whom two young men were fuiters unto. The one of the same condition or estate that the maid was of; and who relied upon her guardians and tutors, who also were of that degree and calling: the other a Gentleman, enamoured on her, only for her beauty. As for him, he had the good wills of the bel of the City, by whose means the strife of partaking, entered even into the house of the Damned. For the Gentleman in the Mothers judgment, was the more welcome and better liked of, whose desire was, that the maid should be preferred by marriage, and be most worshipfully beloved. The Guardians also banded themselves, and laboured for their party. But when as the matter might not be ended within dores, it came to suit in Law. And when thereasons and allegations were heard, both of the Mother, and also of the Guardians, the Judges pronounced sentence of marriage to be at the disposition of the Mother. But might prevailed more than right. For the Tutors aforefaid, openly in the market place of the City, having amongst those of their party and faction, complained of that injurious award, with a troup of men by force, set the maid out of the Mothers house. Against whom arose a stronger power of the gentry, and following the young Gentleman, who was incenced and set on fire upon this injustice offered, Whereupon initia a cruel fray. The Commons being delected, were forth (far unlike to the Commons of Rome) armed as they were out of the City, and took for their hold a Hill, and invaded the Lands of the Nobles with fire and sword: and having gathered to them a multitude of Artizans and handicrafts men, whom in hope of spoil they had called forth, they purpose and prepare to besiege the City alfo, which aforerime had been altogether unacquainted with the like forms. In such force, as no kind of calamity that followeth war, was wanting: as if the poor City had been tainted, infected, and poisoned with the furious madness of two brain-fick young men, seeking a wou'd and deadly marriage, with the utter ruin and destruction of their native Country. And neither part thought it enough to war and fight at home among themselves. For the Nobles solicited the Romans for to rescue their besieged City: the Commons stirred up the Volscians, to help to force and sack the City. The Volscians under the conduct of Compaus Clinera came first to Ardeea, and against the walls of their enemies, raised a countermarch, and call a tranch, and blockced the Town round about. Which tidings being brought to Rome forthwith M. Cognatius Conful, went forth with an army, and incamped himself three miles from the enemies: and the day being now far spent and drawing toward night, he commanded his foudiers to refresh and make much of themselves, and take their rest: and afterwards at the relief of the fourth watch, he brought forth his enigns, let his men to work, and sped his business once begun, so that by the sun-rising, the Volscians might see them selves inveted more freightly by the Romans, then the City beleaguered by them. And on another side the Conful had joyned a fconco to the wall of Ardeea, by which way his foudiers might go and come in safety. The Captain of the Volscians, who had to that day prepared no victuals, but sustained his army only with the corn which he had for the present from day to day robbed by forraging the Country, seeing himself intrenched, and of a sudden to be destitute of all things, called the Conful forth to parle, saying, That if the Romans coming was to raise the fiege, he would remove and diflodge from thence. To which again the Conful made this reply, That vanquished men were to take, and not to make Articles of Conditions: neither should they, as they were come at their pleasure to affulate the allies of the Romans, so depart again when they lift to Poffei. He commandeth therefore to yeeld their General, to lay down their weapons, confeying themselves overcome, and to be at his devotion. Otherwise he would be a bitter and mortall enemy unto them, whether they departed or tarried till, and carry home to Rome the victory of the Volscians, rather than their fafetie's peace. The Volscians, when they had affayed that small hope they had in their weapons (for all hope else was cut off) besides all other things that were crofs unto them, encountered in a place of great disadvantage for fight, but worfe for flight: and being themselves on ev'ry side beaten down and flain, turned from fighting to intreating, delivered up their Captain, yeelded their weapons, were driven under the Gallows, and in their single doubler and hofe with great flame and calamity, were let go and fent away. And fitting them down to ret themselves, not far from the Town Trifcium the Trifcians upon an oldrudge and hatred against them, set upon them thus disarmed and naked as they were at unawares, and were fo meet with them, that scarcely there remained any one to carry news of their ill day and unfortunate overthrow. Then the Roman Con, appeased the troubles at Ardeea: beheaded the chief Captains of that commotion, and confiscated their goods to the common chief and Chamber of the Ardeans. And so by this great favour and benefit of the people of Rome, they supposing the injury of the former arbitration was done away and recompened. But yet the A the Senat of Rome thought somewhat behind still for the cancelling of the memorial of publick avoice. The Consuls returned triumphing into the City, leading Cluentius the Captain of the Vol- fians: before his chariot, with the spoil born afore him of the enemies, whom he had disarmed, and brought under the yoke. Quintus the Consul again for his part, in his long robe and gown of peace, countervailed (a thing not usually seen) the glory of his Colleague in his bright armor: who had so great regard at home to entertain concord and peace among the Citizens, by min- istering justice indifferently, as well to the highest as to the lowest, that the Senators reputed him averse Conul, and the Commons accounted him as meek and gentle a person. And more he won at the Tribunes hands by contentence and reputation, than by contention and debate. His five Consulships wherein he carried himself after one and the last same manner and order: the course of his whole life, ever Consul-like, caught his pention to be in a manner more reverenced then his honourable place. By this means, whiles there were Consuls, no words were made of military Tribunes, Then created they for Consuls M. Fabius Vibulanus, and Polibinius Eurius Censor. These Consuls, by how much greater and more glorious the acts both at home and abroad, were achieved by those, whom they law they were to succed (and truly that year was right memorable among the borderers, as well allies as enemies, and namely, because the Ardeats in fo hard difficulties were by them succoured) no much the more earnestly endeavoured for their part, to raise out of mens minds the infamy of that judgement aforesaid, and made an Act and Decree of the Senate in this form. That as much as the City of the Ardeats, by reason of Consul Creules, was dispersed and brought to a small number of Citizens, there should be enrolled certain inhabitants to be sent thither for a Governor, and defence against the Volscians. This was openly ingruffled in publick Tables, and Instruments, for a policy, that their secret intent and purpole of revering and dianilating the arbitration, might not be perceived by the Tribunes and the Commons. But they closely complotted, that when they had enrolled a far greater number of Rutuli ans than of Romans, for to inhabit Ardea, neither should any other lands be divided, but those which by that inamous and unholenot award were intercepted: nor that one foot or clof of ground should be assigned to any other Roman, before the whole lands were parted among all the Rutuli ans. Thus the domain that had been in question, returned again to the Ardeats. The Triumvirs for the conveying of a Colony to Ardea, were created thee, Agrippa Menenius, C. Clutius Secular, and M. Eurius Helms. Who, besides that, they offende the Commons by their ready service and nothing popular, in regard, that they affigned and set out to their allies, that land which the people of Rome judged their own, were not well thought of neither, by the chief of the Nobility: because in the execution of their charge, they did nothing of affection, and for favour. Howbeit they avoided all troubles and dangers that were toward them (albeit they were accused by the Tribunes before the people.) For when they had registred and placed the Coloners, they remained still themselves in the fame Colony, which they had as witnesses of their innocency, and just dealing.

In this year, and the year following, Caius Furius Petilus and Marcus Popilius Cabbage were Consuls, there was peace at home and abroad. The plays which had been vowed by the De- cemvirs, according to the Senate decree, during the time of the Commons insurrection and de- parture from the Nobles, were this year set forth. Petilus fought for some occasion of sedition but in vain, Who being made Tribun the second time, albeit he harped still upon one string, and threat- ned the selfsame things that he had before, yet he could not bring about, that the Consuls should propose unto the Senate concerning the division of lands among the Commons: and when as with great ado he had obtained thus much, that the Senators should be moved and their opinions asked, whether they would have an election of Consuls or Tribunes (Consular:) determined it was at length, that Consuls should be chosen. So, that the menaces of the Tribun, that he would hinder the matter, was a ridiculous matter of game: seeing that when the borderers were at quiet, there was no need either of war or preparation for war. After this great quietness of the State, followed a year (wherein Proculus Gergamus Macerius, and L. Menenius Latennius were Consuls) for sundry calamities and perils memorable: namely Seditions, Fanimie, and hazard of receiving upon their necks the yoke of Kings rule again and that by the sweetness of a Largeis. There wanted only foreign war: wherewith the Common-weal had been afflicted too, hardly could the help of all the gods above, have recovered the State. Thee calamities began with hunger. But whether it were, for that the year was unseasonable for corn, or that they were too in love with the plantible and sedicious Orations, and of the City it fell, that theyighed and neglected the Tillage of their ground. it is uncertain. For both the one and the other is reported. The Lords of the Senat blamed the idleness of the Commons: and the Tribuns of the Commons laid the weight, one upon the fraud and mauntisnies, another while upon the negligence and remis- nes of the Consuls, At the left the commoners enforced and drave the people (but not against the will of the Senat) to chuse L. Minanius Muller of the provision or principal purveyor of corn and victual: a man who in that office proved more lucky to preserve the liberty of the City then happy in the exercise or ministration of his charge: albeit at the latter end, he delverted and had, both prate and thanks, for bringing down the price of Corn. Who, notwithstanding many Embaflages sent both by sea and land to the neighbor nations round about, and all to little purpose (but that out of Heortius there was brought some little sprinkling of Corn) nothing eated and mended the Market: and therefore he turned again to the dispensing or dealing the present death inindifferently indifferently among all, by forcing every man to confesse what corn he bred, to open his garner, to bring it forth, to vent and sell it, which he had more then would serve a month, But when by this practice, and by deading servants a portion of their daily bread, and by acquainting the corn-mongers and exposings them to the furious ire of the people, he had with all his hard courtesies and sharp inquisitions rather laid open then cased the present need and necessity: many of the common people depairing of all hope, rather then they would live thus miserably tormented, pinning and wearing away in hunger, covered their heads, and threw themselves headlong into Tyber. Then Sp. Melius by calling a Knight or Gentleman of Rome, a man (as in those days) exceeding rich, enterprized a thing, commodious I must needs say, but a difficult precedent of dangerous consequence, and proceeding of a worrie mind and intent of his. For having with his own money bought the corn out of Betruria by the means of his friends and vassals, whole ministry he used: which thing (I believe verily) was an hindrance that all the publick care and provision, took small effect, and nothing helped the general want and scarcity, he devied to bring up a free dole and distribution of corn: and to the end that when he had once by this benefit and liberality won the hearts of the Commons, then he might, what way ever he went carrying a port and majesty with him above the degree of a private person, draw after him a train of the people, promising him by their favour of support, undoubt and assure hope of a Compact. But himselfe (as mans nature is unstable) not content herewith, aspired to higher matters then fortune promised him, and those unlawful, and beyond his reach. And for as much as even the very Confulship was to be wrested from the Nobles against their wills, he posteth to make himselfe a King, and thought that, the only gundred due for so deep reaches and designs, and worthy that great contention and strife which he was to abide with much toil and sweat of brows. Now drew the Election on space for Conuls, which thing prevented him thera he had brought his devices to full ripeness and perfection. Conul was created L. Quantius Capitolinus the fifth time, a man most unfit for his turn, that should go about innovations and to change the state, and with him was joined Agrippa Memmius, sumnamed Lanius. And L. Minius, was either made again the master victualler, or else created he was at first without limitation of time, to continue so long as the cale should require. For there is no certainty thereof, but only the name of Conul-master, recorded both years in the Ilmen Books or Register among other Magistrates. This Minius was vigilant and as careful for the common-wealth, as Melius for his private wealth: and upon occasion that men of the same quality, to wit, the Commons, were conversant in both houses, namely, in his own and in the house of Melius; he came to the knowledge of his means, of Melius his treasure: and declared unto the Senate the whole compilion, Namely, That there was armor and weapons good store carried into the house of Melius: that he kept conventions there, and made feuditious Orationes, and that it was past all peradventure that he practised to be King. As for the time of working the fact and to put it into action, as yet it was not determined and certainly known: all other things were already agreed upon, Item, that the Tribuns were bribed and hired to tell and betray the liberty of the City: That to certain Captains of the multitude divers charges were appointed. And herewithal, he excused himselfe (and said) That because he would not be reputed the author of any uncertain or vain intelligence, he uttered these matters somewhat with the last, and later well neer, then might hand with the common faculty of the Wealth-publick. Which news after they were heard, and that on every side the chief Senators had given both the Conf, of the former year a check, for that they had sufferd those Largeles of corn, and tolerated meetings of the Commons in a private house: and rebuked the new Conuls also, for that they had stayd so long and waited till a matter of so great importance was by the corn-master detected and declared unto the Senate, which required a Conf, to be not only the informer, but also the reformer: Then T. Quantius answered, That the Commons were blamed without just cause, who being bridled with the laws of appealing, rending to the great prejudice and disgracing of their sovereign government, had not comminon sufficient by virement of their place, to punish the thing according to the common sense and quality thereof, as they had courage and heart thereto; and that there was need now, not only of a valiant and stout man, but also of one that was freed from all bonds of laws and tied to none. And therefore he would name L. Quantius for Dictator: in whom there was courage answerable to that absolute authority. When all men liked well therof, Quantus himself at the first reputed demanding what they meant, to object and expose him, an unwelde man for 10 kept in years, to a great trouble, and manifest danger. Afterwards, when they replied on all hands, and likend how in that heart of his for all his age there was more valour, and in his head more policy then in all men besides; keeping on him right due and deserved praisie and commendations: and whereas the Conul also importuned him still and gave not over then Gregorius, after he had prayed to the gods immortal, that his decrepit old age in so fearful a cafe, might not turn either to the loife or dishonor of the Common-wealth, was by O the Conul pronounced Dictator. And he forthwith nominated C. Servillius Holi General of the horsemen. The morrow after, when he had set and disposed certain guards in divers places of the City, and was come down into the common place of the common people wandering at the strangeness of the matter, had their eyes upon him; and the adherents and complices of Melius, and he himselfe their Captain, saw well that the force and power of this great magistrate was bent against them. But they that were not acquainted with those plots and designs that tended to the setting up of a King, asked one another, what tumult or sudden war, should require either a A Dictators majesty, or that Quintus after fourscore years of age, should be the only Ruler of the City. With that, Servulus the General of the horsemens was by the Dictator sent to Melius: Who said unto him, The Dictator calleth thee. Whereas he being afraid, asked again, What he would and Servulus said, That he was to make his answer and purgation, of a crime that Minutius had informed against him, before the Senat. Then Melius began to retire him selfe back into the rout of his followers, and looking about at the first, thrunk only away from him, and refused to obey. At the last the Apparitor at the general of the horsemens commandment, began to force him to go with him: but he being resisted by the handers by, found his feet and began to fly, and befouled the air of the Commons of Rome: saying, That the action of the Nobles conspired his overthrow, and persecuted him for the good he had done unto the Commons, and for his liberality bestowed upon them: beleeching them to help him in that extremity, and not to suffer him to be murdered afore their face and in their very fight. As he ipake these words, Horatius Servulus overtook him, and killed him out-right: and being sprinkled with his blood thus slain, and guarded with a company of tall Gentlemen of the Nobility, he bringeth word to the Dictator, how Melius being cited to come unto him, put back the Apparitor, and raised the multitude, and now had suffered due punishments for his defectors. Then (quoth the Dictator) On forthis in valor and vertue of thine, O C. Servulus, thou deliverest great praise, and hast delivered the Common-wealth this day from tyranny. Then the multitude murmured and made a fit upon some doubts, what they should think of the last, and what might be the occasion thereof: he commanded them to assemble together, and openly avowed the deed, and pronounced that Melius was justly slain: yea, albeit he had been clear from seeking to be King: for that being summoned and convened before the Dictator, and by that the General of the horsemens, he refused and came not: "for my selfe (quoth he) was set judicially to examine and inquire of the cause: and upon the trial thereof, Melius should have been free and defended: but because he went about by violence to withdraw himself from judgment, by violence therefore was he restrained. Neither was he to be proceeded against as a Citizen, who being born in a free State, where justice and law were in force: and in that City, whereas he was not ignorant that the KK. were sometimes expelled: and where in one and the same year Callatius lifters sons, and the sons of that Cof, that was deliverer of his Country, detected of a complott and conspiracy of receiving again into the City the KK. blood, were by their own father beheaded: out of which City, Tarquinius Colatius Cof for the detestation only of the name, being commanded to give up his office, suffered exile: in which City, many years after Sp. Cassius for practising and plotting only to be King, suffered condigne punishment: wherein also of late time, the Decemvirs, for a tyrannical pride, where deprived of their goods, banished their country, and thereby of their lives, That in the same City (I say) Sp. Melius should conceive any hope of reaching to a Kingdom? And a man (I pray you) of what quality and condition? And yet, no gentrity of birth, no dignities nor deferts were sufficient to make way to any for lordly rule and tyranny. Howbeit, the Cato ed and Cassius, by reason of the Conspiracies and Decemviri's of their own, by reason of the honorable estate and reputation of their ancestors, and the worship and glory of their lineage, took upon them, because hungry and proud, and aspired to that, whereunto Sp. Melius had no inch means to induce him: who might have him down, well enough, and rather wished and prayed to God, then hoped once to so much, as a Tribunship of the Commons. And supposing he, being but a rich corn-mafter, that with a quart (or measure of corn of two pounds) he had bought the freedom of his fellow Citizens? or thought he could conveying mories of bread and viaticals afore the common fort, that the victorious people, conquerers of all nations about them, might be allured into thraldom? and whom the City could hardly brooke to be a Senator, him they should endure their King, to have the regal enigns and the government of Romulus, the first founder of the City, descend on from the gods, and to them attend unto again: why, it was a thing not to be wicked as monstrous. Neither was this act sufficiently ratified for, with the shedding of his blood, unless the house and walls, within which so horrible madness was conceived and forged, were call down and razed: and unless their goods, which were imitated and infected with the prices and hire that should have purchased the Kingdom, were forfeit and confiscate. He commanded therefore the Quiritis, to fell those goods: and to bring the money into the common Treasury. And then he caufed forthwith his dwelling house to be overthrown and made even with the ground, that the plot or floor thereof, might be a monument of a wicked attempt, imothered and lifted in the very hope and hatching thereof. This is the place which was called afterwards Aquaeium. As for L. Minutius he had an Ox with guided horns given him for an honour and reward without the gate Triumviri. The Commons therewith were not misconcented, for that to them he divided Melius his corn, at the price of one. As a Medius, Among some authors

I find, that this Minnius forsook the Nobles and went to the Commons, and was taken in to be the eleventh Tribun of the Commons; and appeased the mutiny that arose upon Melius his death. But it was not like that the Senators suffered the number of the Tribuns to be encreased: and especially, that such an example should be given and taken up by a man of their coat: or that the commonality would not keep it still, if it had been once allowed, or at leastwise attempt it again. But above all, this conmitten and represent the false title of Tribune set upon his image, for that a few years before, it was by a statute expressly provided, That Tribuns might not chuse and take unto them a Colleague in office, Q. Cecilius, and Q. Junius, and Sextus Titinius were the only men of all the Collidge of Tribuns that propounded not the Law for the honour of Minnius, but rather accused it unto the Commons, both Minnius and Servilius, and ceased not to make complaint of the cruel and unworthy death of Melius: and in fine prevailed so much, that there should be an elecution for military Tribuns rather then for Consuls: nothing doubting, but if he were chosen (for so many at that time might be created) some of the Commons also, by promising to revenge the death of Melius, might step in and be elected, The Commons for all they were tolled that year with many and sundry troubles; chose no more then three Tribuns with Consuls authority; and among them, L. Quintinius the fon of Cinclunatus: Upon the hard conceit and hatred of whose Dictatorship pait, they thought to pick some occasion of quarrel and tumult: and Mammcrus Emnius, a man of great credit and reputation, was by voices preferred afore Quintinius; and obtained the first place, And L. Fulius they created for the third.

Whiles these bare sovereign rule, Fidenis the Colony of the Romans, revolted to Laars Tolumnius, the King of the Veientian's, and to the State of the Veientians, and besides their revolting, a more horrible fact they committed, For at the commandment of Tolumnius, they slew C. Fultinius, and C. Fulius, Sp. Naunius, and L. Roscius the Roman Embassadors, who came to demand the cause of this their change and sudden alteration. Some here do excuse and elevate the act of the King, saying that upon a lucky cast of dice he uttered a doubtful speech, which was by the Fidentianis so taken, as though he seemed to bid the Embassadors to be killed, and that (forsooth) was the occasion of murdering the Embassadors (a thing incredible, that at the comning in of the Fidentianis, his new allies, L. who were to confult with him and ask his advice, about a murder that should break the law of Nations, his mind should not be turned away from earnest studying about his game) and so this hainous fact proved to be but an error. More credible it is, that he had a further meaning and deeper reach: namely, that the people of the Fidentianis should be bound unto him, and only rely upon him, being attain with the guiltinesse of so foul murder, and not to look and hope for any mercy or favour at the Romans hands, The fates of these Embassadors which were at Fidenis murdered, were set up openly at the charges of the City in the Rostra. [A publick cross (as it were) or pulpit in Rome, out of which the Magistrates made Orations to the people, beautified with the beakheads of ships and their bosom pikes called Rostra.] Thus was there like to be a cruel conflict with the Veientians, and Fidentes, M. Who besides that they were people confusing on their frontiers, had also in the beginning of their war given so wicked and horrible a cause of quarrel. Therefore when as the common people and their Tribuns, in regard of the care for the publick State, were at quiet: there was no question, but that M, Gerginius Maximus the third time, and L. Sergius Fidenus (named [I suppose] to, upon the war which afterwards under his conduct was fought) should be created Consuls. For this man first encountered with the King of the Veientian's on this side * Anio, and got the victorie: but not without much bloodshed of the Romans. So that the grief was greater for the los of his own soldiery, then the joy for the discomfiture of his enemies, And the Senate, as in all fearefull times and dangerous occurrences, ordained Mammcrus Emnius to be created Dictator, Who, out of the brotherhood of N Tribuns military in Consuls authority, the year before, named for the General of his horsemen, L. Quintinius Cinclunatus, who had been a Tribun with him, a toward young Gentleman, and a worthy fon of so worthy a father. To those soldiery that were by the Consul muttered and levied, were the old Centurions, experienced and skillful warriers, adjoined: and the number of thole, which in that last battle were slain, was supplied. The Dictator commanded to follow him as Lieutenants, Quntrinius Cinclunatus, and M. Fulius Velstnus. This greater power and authority, and the man likewise nothing thereto inferior, drave the enemies out of the Roman ground, and set them farther off, even beyond Anio. Who removing their camp hill backward, set up the hills between Fidenis and Anio: neither durst they come down from thence into the open plains, before that the Legions of the Fidentes came to succour. Then at length, the Timlins encompased themselves under the walls of Fidenis. And the Roman Dictator likewise refted and abode upon the banks of the Confluent (where both rivers run into one) and flanked himself thereby. And when he had eft a trench and rampart afoft, reaching across from the one river to the other, the morrow after he brought his power forth, and set them in order of battell. The enemies
A. mimes were of undry minds. The Falichians, who hardly could away long with military service farre from home, and trufling withal in their owne selves, that they were good enoough, required battle. The Veicentians and Fidenates had more hope in drawing out the war on length. Tulumius, albe the advice of his own men liked him better, yet because the Falichians should not endure lingering warfare, sendeth a trumpet, and proclameth battle against the morrow. The Dictator and the Romans, for that the enemies for the present shifted off sight, took more heart unto them: and on the next morning, when as now the fouldiers gave out brave words, and menaced, That unless they might have battle, they would assault both the Camp and the Town: the armies of both parties came forth

B. into the midst of the plain, between the two Camps. The Veicentians, as being more in number and having to spare, sent covertly out certaine companies to fetch a compass behind the Hills, who in the time of the conflict should light upon the Roman Camp. And in this order stood the main Army of three Nations together embattelled. The Veicentians kept the right point, the Falichians the left, and the Fidenates the middle of the battel. The Dictator in the right point advanced his standard against the Falichians, and on the left Capitellum Quintus charged the Veicentians: and against the main battle between both, marched the Colonel of the Cavalry, with his Continues of horse. Thus as they stood arranged in battel array, for a pretty while was there silence on either side, and all quiet. For neither would the Fulinians begin first, unl etif they were urged: And the Dictator looked ever and anon backward toward the Capitol of Rome, that the Augurs should set up a signal altot (as it was agreed between them) to soon as the flight of fowles gave approbation accordingly: which he no sooner espied, but he put out presently the men of arms, with a great shout against the enemies. The army of the footmen followed hard after in the tail; and seconded them with a fully charge. But on no hand were the Tuilcan legions able to abide the force of the Romans. The Cavalry stood hardest to it, and made head still, For the King himselfe, the beft horfeman and most valiant of them all, when as on every side his enemies charged and pressed fone upon him, rode afront them, held out and maintained figh. There chanced then to be among the Roman horfemen, a Tribune or Marshall, one A. Cuscinus Cofius, a goodly tall man of body, and as valiant and strong without, as he before his eyes the noble house from whence he was defended, and carried this mind, as it was right honorable already by his ancestors left him, so to recommend the same to his posterity more glorious and renowned. This man seeing the troops of Romans wasving to and fro, for feare of the violence of Tulumius, which way longer he bent and turned: and knowing him by his rich and royal furniture, wherein he bare himself like a brave Knight, riding all over the battel. "Is this (quoth he) the foremost breaker of humane league, is this he that hath violated the laws of arms, and of nations? Now will I presently, if it be Gods will that any thing in the world should remain wholly and entire, be his Prieft, I will sacrifice and beake him to the ghosts of our Embassadors deceased. Herewith, letting spurs to his horse, with bent spear in rest, he rode full a

C. gainst that one enemy, fangled from the rest: inoite him, and dismounted him from his horse. Then beaing upon his staff, alight presently on foot, and as the King was getting up again, he overthrew him backward with the boles of his target, and had him stretching long & after many wonds given him, at length falled him with his spear to the very ground. And when as he was once dead, he disarmed and dipolado him, and struck off his head: and carrying it aloft on his lance, presented a fearful spectacle to the enemies of their King slain, and so discomparted them, Thus was the strength of the horfemen deleted also, which only had made the battel doubtful. The Dictator having put likewise the legions of footmen to flight, pursued them still, and drove them to their join, killing them all the way in the chase. Many of the Fidenates which knew the coasts of the Country, fled into the

D. mountains; and escaped. Cofius with his horfemen passe over Tyber, and brought home into the City a great booty out of the country of the Veicentians. As this battel was in fighting, there was a skirmish also in the Roman Camp, with that part of the forces, which (as it is aforesaid) was smuk by Tulumius to surprise it. Fabius Vatulanus first defended the rampart; ordering his men all within, in compait like a garland: and while the enemies were wholly about the start, he with the Triarii or fouldiers of the rereward, suddenly iffued forth at the gate, called Principaliis, on the right hand, and gave an hot charge upon them: Upon which they were affrighted, but there enied the left slaughter, because the number was smaller. Howbeit, they fled no lcte in dilarray, than hole in the very battel. Thus the Dictator having prosperous success everywhere, returned with triumph into the City, by G. the degree of the Senea, and grant of the people, In which triumphs the greatest flew and goodliest sight of all, was Cofius, bearing the rich & royal spoils of the King, slain by his own hand. For of him the fouldiers charged divers rude ballads without rime and metre, comparing him in their songs with Romulus, Which spoils with a solemn manner of dedication he bestowed and hung up in the Temple of Jupiter Furtantus, near unto thole of Romulus, which, were the first and only spoils, until that time, called Opima Speilia. And as he went he withdrew from the Dictator's chariot, the eyes of all the people unto him, and he in manner alone, carried away the magnificence and glory of that tetratical day. The Dictator by order from the people, presented in the Capitol for the honour of Jupiter, a golden Crown, weighing one pound weight, rafed out of the common money of the City.

M 3 were:

Thus have I set down (as following all other writers before me) that Aulus Cornelius Cæsar, a Colonel or Marshal, brought into the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, the second royal spoils. However, over and besides, that those spoils only are by right accounted Opima, or royal, which a General hath taken from a General, and we acknowledge none for General, but him under whose conduct a high Commission a war is managed, the very title also written upon the spoils, doth check and reprove both them and me. The words whereof are these, [That Cæsar being Consul, won those spoils.] When I once heard say, that Aulus Cæsar himself, the founder or repairer of all Temples, entered into the house of Jupiter Feretrius, which he re-edified, being by injury of long time fallen to decay, and read it to written in a linen Jack or Curass: I thought it little better then sacrilegious, to difcredit and cancel the testimony of Cæsar himself concerning his own spoils, and of Aulus Cæsar, the benefactor of that very Temple. Which error, if it grow hereon, That So ancient Records and Chronicles, and that the Books of the Magistrates, which being of linen, and laid up in the Temple of Mounta, Maec Licius doth very offen quote and cite as his Authors, do represent unto us Aulus Cornelius Cæsar, the seventh year after Conful, with Titus Quinctius Pennus: let every man abound in his own fideas, and have his opinion by himself freely. For more than this may be alledged to prove, that so famous a battel could not be transferred to that year: because that for three years space about the Confulship of Cæsar, there was no war at all, in a manner, by reason of petition and death of corn; so as some records, as it were, mourning, and bewraying the calamity of the time, deliver unto us nothing but the bare names of the Conful. In the third year, after that Cæsar was Conful, he was military Tribun in Confuls authority, and in the same year General of the horsemen also: in which government he obtained another notable battel with hercules. But hereof a man may conjecture and guess what he will, and (as I think) we may tos the three things of small importance to and fro, according to every mans opinion; and when all is done, the author of this battel his own selfe, having set up theie fath and new spoils in a holy place, in the sight of Jupiter himselle standing thereb, to whom they were vowed, and Romales alio, two witnesses, not to be decipied nor abused with a fale title, hath written himself, [A. Cornelius Cæsari Con- ful,]

When Marcus Cornelius Maluginensis and Quintus Cæsarius were Confuls, the Armies were led forth: the one into the Veientes Country, and the other into the Ficilians, and booties both of people and cattel were from thence driven and carried away. As for the enemies themselves, no wherein the Country were they to be seen, nor any battel was fought: and yet for all that, the towns were not affaile, because the people at home died of the pestilence. And within the City, Sp. Metius Tribune of the Commons fought occasions and prentices to made seditions, but without effect. Who supposing by the popular favour of his name to preserve and raise some mutiny, both arrested Minutius to make his answer, and also put up a bill for the confiscation of the goods of Serulus Hadru: laying hard to Minutius his charge, that Metius was falsely accused and circumvented by him: and burdening Serulus with the murdering of a Citizen uncondemned. All these outrimes were with the people of his credit and importance, than the author himselfe. But the violence of the ficknesse still increasine more and more, troubled them: besides the fearfull and strange prodigious tokens: but especially, the fresh news that divers houses in the Country were by many earthquakes cast down. Whereupon the people went in solemn procession and made their supplications, whiles the Dunin going afore pronounced the prayers, and the people laid after him word for word. But the year following, when C. Iulius the second time, and L. Virginius were Confuls, was more contagious by reason of the plague, and caused both in Town and Country, to great a fear of utter defolation, that not only there were none set forth in any roads without the territory of Rome to raise booties, whiles the Nobility and Commons had no mind of making war: but the Fidenates also of their own accord, who before time had kept themselves either within their Towns, or Mountains, or Fortresses, entered now into the lands about Rome, and forged all the Country. After this, having gotten all unto them a power of the Veientes (for the Ficilians could not be induced either by the calamity of the Romans, or prayers of their confederates, to take arms again) these two Nations passed over Anio, and not far from the gate Collina displayed their ensigns. So the fear was no lesse within the City than in the Country. Then Iulius the Conful bringeth the forces abroad, and placeth them upon the rampart and the
A the walls: whiles Virginia assembled the Senate in the Temple of Quirinus, for to ask their opinion. Where agreed it was, to create for Dictator, A. Servilius, surnamed (as some say) Probus, or as other, Strato. Virginia making no longer stay than until he had consulted with his Colleague, by his permission declared the Dictator in the night season. And he nominated for his General of the Cavalry, Pothemon Ebatius Helus. The Dictator commanded every man to be ready without the gate Collina, by the break of day: and so many as were able to bear arms were in a readinesse. The Standards and Ensigns were taken forth of the treasury or chamber of the City, which was thence guarded, most neglected, and for the natural situation the securest, to undermined unto the Caiffe. And he himself in places farthest off from thence, approached close under the walls, with his army divided into four parts, to advance one another by turns in order: and, by continual skirmishing day and night, he kept the enemies at bay and withdrew them from all perceiving and intelligence of the work under ground: until at length, as by digging through the hill from the Camp, there was a way and passage made straight up into the Caiffe. And when as the Tyans were wholly amend upon the vain threats and bravadoes of their enemies before them nothing minding the present danger wherein they stood: behold, the alarm of their enemies even over their heads, made an outcry, that the town was taken. An this year Cn. Purius Paelinus and M. Geminus Mactrinus, Centones, appointed and dedicated the Large Hall, named Villa Publica in Mary field: and there first by them was held the sitting and numbering of the people. I find in Mace Livius, that in the year following, the same Consuls were made again, namely, Julius in the third time, and Virginia the second time. But Valerius Annius and Q. Tiberio, do name M. Martius and Q. Sulpitius for the Consuls that year. Howbeit in so different report, both Tiberio and Mace professe that they followed the former Records: and neither of them both conceal that which the ancient writers have set down, namely, That the same year were Tribunes military, in Consuls authority. Livius without doubt is addicted to those former Registrers, and Tiberio is uncertain of the truth. But among other antiquities, not known by reason of long time, this also is left in doubt and not cleared.

After the winning of Fidene, great was the feast in Helvetica: whilst not only the Venetians were feared, fearing the like defection: but the Fides also, remembering the war began first with them, albeit they were not affilting in their rebellion. When as therefore these two States had sent their Embassadors abroad to the twelve Cities about them, and obtained a Diet or General Parliament of all Helvetica should be assembled at the Temple of Virtumus, the Senate, as if some great troubles were like thereto, pretendingly to enuie, thought it good that Mannonis Ammianus should be created Dictator the second time. By whom, A. Pothemon Tiberio was named General of the horsemen. And so much great endeavors made they preparation of arms then in the last war afore, by how much more danger there was from all Helvetica banded together, than had been between two nations combined and no more. But this business was much more quiet than all men looked for. When therefore news came by Merchants, that the Venetians were flatly denied help, and bid end to that war by their own means and forces, which they had begun upon their own heads: nor seek to embarr them in the association of their misery and adversity, into whom they had not impressed their mind & hope in their upright estate, and when they were in their height: then the Dictator, to the end he should not seem to be created in vain, seeing all matter of acquiring renown by war was cut off, deviseth yet in time of peace, to doe some notable piece of work for a monument, setteeth in hand to abate and diminish the Censorship: either supposing it to be too high an office, or else offend not so much with the greatnesse of the honour, as with the continuance and length thereof. Having therefore assembled all the people together: "For as much as the immortal Gods (quoth he) have under

G staken to govern the Common Weale abroad, and performed all sorts and sorte: I for my part concerning that which is to be done at home within the walls, will take order and provision for the freedom of the people of Rome. The greatest preservation, and defence whereof resteth in this, when offices of great command are not long enduring: but when they be limited by term of time which may not be restrained or gaged in jurisdiction. As for
for other magistracies they are from year to year: but this of the Centoils continuing five years, is very heavy and grievous. And hard it is for men to live so many years, even a great part of their life, in danger of the same Rulers still. Minded therefore I am, to provide a law, That the Centoilsheeifie continue no longer than one year and six months. With great applause and content of the people, the next day after, he both published the law and enacted it. And now that ye may (quoth he) O Quirites, know in very deed, how I millike of their long lasting offices, here preently I render up my Dictatorship. Thus having given over his own place, let a limitation to the rule of others, and abolutely ended one, with exceeding congratulation and favour of the people he was brought home to his houe. The Centoils taking it grievously Mamercus had abridg'd an office of the people of Rome, displaced him from his own Tribe, laying on him an eightfold tax in the subsidy Book, disranchied and disabled him from giving his voice, and made him no better then a Tributary. Which disgrace (they say) he toke with a noble stomack, looking rather to the caule of this shameful noce, than to the ignominy it self. Moreover, the Lords of the Senate, albeit they were willing enough that the Centoils ship shal be spared and their power taken down, were offended yet, with this example of the rigour and severity of thiose in place: for as much as they all law plainly, that they should be both longer time and other under Centoils, then Centoils themselfes. But to great an indignation of the people (by report) grew heereof, that by the authority of no man but of Mamercus himselfe, could they be refrained from offering violence to the very perfons of the Centoils. And the Tribuns of the Commons, with their continual Orations and Remonstrances, prohibited the Election of Centoils. When as the matter was well neere brought to the point of an inter reign, they obtained at length with much firce and contention, that there should be military Tribuns chosen, with Concular authority. But reward of this their victory, whereas they shot, could they get none: namely, that a Commoner might be chosen for one. They were all of the Nobility that were created, to wit, M. Fabius Vibullanus, M. Polius, and L. Sergius Fidenus.

The plague that year was the occasion of quietnes from all other troubles. A Temple then was vowed to Apollo for the health of the people. Howbeit, great los was there both in town and country, by the the mortality of men and manner of cattel, one with another indifferently. And fearing left the husbandman of the country should be famished, they sent for corn into Hetruria and the country of Pontimium, to Corinthus, and at last even into Sicily. And not a word all this while about the election of Centoils. So there were military Tribuns elected, with Centoils authority, all again of the Patritii, namely, L. Pinarius Mamercus, L. Furius Medullinus, and Sp. Posthumius Albus. That year the violence of the sickpelle abated: neither was there any danger or fear of scarcity of Corn, because they had made provision of them. Great fitting and conjunction there was in the general Diets of the Volkians and Equins, and in Hetruria at the aforesaid Temple of Votumnia about making war. There, the matter was put off for one whole year: and by an Act or Decree it was provided, that no Assembly or Parliament during that time should be held: notwithstanding the M people of the Veientians complained but all in vaine, that the same fortune was like to happen unto Veii, which had fallen already upon Fidenae, even the utter subversion of the State. In this mean feast, at Rome the chiefe heads of the Commons having aspired and gaped now a long time, but still in vaine, after higher place of dignity and honour, took their vantage whiles all was quiet abroad, and began to have their conventicles and meetings in the houes of the Tribunes, and there entertained secret Counsels. Some complained that they were much deiphit of the common people: for whereas in so many yeares, There were Tribunes Military created with Centoils authority, yet never was there any one of the Commonality adanced to that Dignity. Our forefathers (say they) ingrate wifedom and deep foresight, have done well to take order, that none of the Nobility at any time should have access to any office of the Commonalty: for if that were not, the Commons should have had ere this some of the Patritii for their Tribuns: so odios we are become to those of our owne cost, and are as little set by of the Commons as of the Noble. Others excused the people, and laid the fault upon the Senators: by whose ambition, by whose crafty fetches and subtil policies it came to passe, that the Commons were stopped from the highway to advancement and promotion. But if the Commons might have any reftit or breathing time, and not be soliciting and tempted by their prayers interlaced with threats: they would remember themselves and thiose of their own calling, in giving of their voices: and having once gotten afittance unto them, would also win the highest pitch and sovereign type of authority. For by the abolishing therefore of this ambitious seeking and standing for offices, they agree and resolve, that the Tribuns should prefer and publish a Law, that no man might wear white more than ordinary or refresh the bright lue of his upper garment, while he used for any dignity. A small matter now adyes, and may seem scarcely worth the debating in serious counsel, and not A not be solicited and tempt[ed] by their prayers interlaced with threats: they would remember themselves and those of their own calling, in giving of their voices: and having once gotten assent about them, would also win the highest pitch and sovereign type of authority. For the abolishing therefore of this ambitious seeking and standing for offices they agree and resolve, that the Tribuns should cease and publish a law, that no man might wear white more than ordinary, or refresh the bright hue of his uppergarment, while he fiud for any dignity. A small matter now adays and may seem scarcely worth the debating in serious councils, which notwithstanding at that time, set both nobles and commons in a great heat of contention. Yet obtained the Tribuns so much, that this law passed: and it appeared, that the Commons when their blood was once up, would affect their own, and whollly incline to them in their sufferings. But to the end that they might not have their full scope and put it in practice, an Act of the Senate was, that there should be held an Election of Confuls. The occasion thereof, was a tumult or commotion: which, as the Latins and Hernicks admir'd them, arose from the Equians and Volscians. T. Quintus Cincinnatus, the son of Lucius (furnamed also Pennus) and C. Julius Mento were elected Confuls. Neither was this fearful news of war entertained any longer, for the enemies having by a falsed law (which amongst them was of greatest force to levy an army) muldred their power, set forth two mighty armies from both parts, into Algidum, and there met. Where the Equians and Volscians, severally by themselves encamp'd strongly, and more earnestly the Captains to fortifie their camps, and to train and exercise their foilders, than at any time afore. Whereupon, the news was more fearful that the messenger brought to Rome: So the Senate agreed to create a Dictator. For, although those nations of times had been vanquished by them, yet now they rebelled in more forcible manner, and with preparation, than at any time before. Also, by reason of the late sickness, the youth and flower of the Romans was more diminished. But above all, the private discord of the Confuls one with another, and the debate and difference in all their counsel terrified them more. Therebe that write, how these Confuls had but unlucky fortune, and lost a field in Algidum: and that it should be the cause of making a Dictator. But this one thing is certain, that howsoever else the Confuls disagreed, yet they jumped in one to crose the wills of the Senators, in that they would not nominate a Dictator until such time as after news brought, still worse and worse, and yet the Confuls would not be ruled by the Senators: one Quintus Servilius Priscus, a man, who right worthy and honourably had born the highest offices, made this speech: "My Matters, ye that are Tribuns of the Commons (quoth he) in this exigent and desperate case, the Senate calleth for your assistance, that in so great hazard of the Common-wealth, ye by virtue of your authority, would force the Confuls peremptorily to make a Dictator. Which speech being once heard; the Tribuns supposing now they had good occasion offered, to fenced and extend their power to the full, departed aside: and in the name of their College or society, pronounced, That it was their pleasure and will, that the Confuls should be obedient unto the Senat: and in case they proceeded to do farther, then the content of that most honourable House would bear them out, they would command them to ward. The Confuls chose rather to be over-ruled of them than of the Senat: saying yet withall, that the prerogative of the highest government was by the Senators betrayed, and the Confulship made thrall and subject to the Tribuns power, if to be the Confuls might be compelled to do oght by vigour of the Tribuns authority, and (than which, a private person could fear no more) be sent aloft on ward, or committed to prison. The lot fell to T. Quintus (for in this also they could not agree between themselves) to nominate the Dictator: who named A. Porphiuibus Tiburtius, his wives father, a grim Sir, and a man of most levies and stern government. By whom was L. Julius nominated for General of the Cavalry; Herewithal was proclaimed a vacation or law-fled; and that throughout the whole City they should go in hand with nothing but war. The taking knowledge of such as pretended to be freed and exempt from fouldery, was put off until the war was ended. So that they that were before doubtful, suffered themselves to be enrolled: and foulders were levied out from the Hernucks and Latins, who from both places obeyed the Dictator to their uttermost. All these things were dispatched with exceeding expedition. Then the Dictator having left C. Julius the Conful, for the defence of the City; and L. Julius the General of the horse, for all sudden occasions incident unto wars, that they might not be to seek for anything whereof they had need in the camp, took with him Aulus Cornelius the High Priest, & saying after him certain prayers, word for word, he vowed great and latesly plays, in regard of this tumultuous and troublesome war: and thus departing from the City, and dividing his whole army between himself and Quintus the Cof, at length he approached the enemies. And like as they had discovered the two camps of their enemies, a little space distant one from another, so they also, about a mile from the enemy, intertrenched themselves; the Dictator neared to Tufculum, and the Conful to Lamium. So those four Armies, and as many fortified camps, had a spacious and large plain in the middle, sufficient not only for small excursions to skirmish in, but also to display their armies of both sides. And all the while that they lay encamped. encamped one against another, they ceased not to make light skirmishes: for the Dictator was well content, that his men by making proof, and comparing their strength and presence with their enemies, and affaying by little and little to try the event of these skirmishes, should conceive a forehand some hope of the entire and general victory.

The enemies therefore having no hope left, to speed well in a set field and pight battle, failed by night the Consul's camp, and put all to the hazard of a doubtful issue. The sudden cry and alarm, awak'ned not only the Consul, Sentinels, his corps de garde, and to his whole army, but the Dictator also out of their sleep. And where need was of present help, there failed not the Consul, either in courage or counsel. Some fouldiers waid and defend the gates, others compress the trench, ranged in a round array. In the other camp of the Dictator, look how much leisir there was, so much more leasure had they, and studied what was most needful to be done. Forthwith aid was sent unto the Consul his camp, under the leading of Sp. P. Vellius MESSUS, a Lieutenant. The Dictator himself in person, with part of his power, fetching a small compass about, gained a place most apart from all noise and tumult, and from whence at unawares he might charge upon the back of the enemies. And leaveth Vicegerent in the leager Q. SulP ITUS: and to M. Fabius a Lieutenant, he committed the conduct of the horsemens, commanding him not before day to flit with his horse, as being unruly and hard to be managed in tumults and troubles of the night. And all things else, that a provident and industrious Captain in such a cause might command and do, that commanded he, and did orderly. But for one thing above the rest, he shewed singular proof of policy and courage, and worthy no mean praise: in that he sent out first M. Gna- ninus with certain chosen Squadrons to aflail that camp of the enemies, from whence he knew by his espials there was departed a greater part of the forces. Who after that he surprized the enemies there, amased wholly upon the event of other mens danger, carelesse and secure for their own selves, and therefore neglecting their lances and guards; wan their hold, in manner before the enemies knew well it was aflailed. From whence the Dictator having descried a smak (which was the signal agreed between them) cried aloud, that the enemies camp was won, and commandeth news thereof to be carried every way. Now it was broad day light, and all was clearly to be seen: by which time both Fabius with the horsemens, had given the charge, and the Consul also had made a sally out of the camp, upon the enemies that now already were fear'd. But the Dictator on the other side, charging upon the rewer and the middle battel, came on every side with his footmen, and horsemens in train of victory against the enemies: who were forced to turn round and fight every way, according to the discomfiture, and sudden alarms. Thus being environed round about, they had in the midst died for it every one, and suffered punishment due for their rebellion, had not Vellius MESSUS, one of the Volsciens, a man more renowned for his valiant acts, then noble by his parentage, rebuked with a loud voice his fellows, being ready now to call themselves into rings, and said: "What will ye here without making your defence, without revenge, offer your selves to be devoured of the enemies sword? What do you with your armour and weapons? Why began ye war first? Are you trouble Mercenary men and unruly in peace, and cowards in war: What hope have ye in standing still? Do you look for some god from Heaven to protect and deliver you? You must make way by dint of sword. Go to then, and fick to it like men, and that way whereas ye shall leave me asfo, follow ye after, as many of you as mind to see again your home, your parents, your wives and children. It is neither wall, nor rampart and trench, but armed men that must with him and armed men. In valour ye are their matches, but in respect of necessity (which is the last and strongest enfin of all other) ye are the better. When he had these words spoken, and done accordingly, with a freth foun they followed after, and made head to that quarter whereas P. FABIVS ALBIVS had placed against them his cohorts: and compelled the victors to lofe ground, until such time as the Dictator came to succour his N men thus drieffed, and now ready to retreat: and so he bent thither all the force of the whole battel. In one only man, MELLVIS, rated all the hope and fortune of the enemies. Many a man was there hurt on both parts, and many a one slain outright, and left dead in the place, so as now the very Roman Commanders. fought not without bloodshed. Only P. FABIVS ALBIVS being fitten with a stone, which had broken and bruises his head. went out of the throng: for either the Dictator, wounded as he was in the shoulder, nor yet Fabius, albeit his thigh was almost mended to his horse, nor the Consul, for all his arm was quite cut off, once retir'd or departed out of that dangerous combate. But MELLVIS amidst the enemies that there lay dead on the earth with a guard about him, most hardy and tall men passed through in for mine manner, and escap'd clear to the Volsciens legation, which as yet was not loof: and so the whole battel in lined thereto. The Consul, after he had chafed them, scattered in parts here and there even as it was to the trench, aflailed the very camp and the rampart, Thither also brought the Dictator his power to another side. Neither was the assault lesiht there then the fight was sharp averse. It is laid moreover, that the Consul threw an ensign within the rampart, to animate the fouldiers, that they might more eagerly get up after it: and A and by recovering the banner again, was the first breach and entrance made, thus the Dictator having broken through the mure, came to close fight and hand-to-hand even within the camp. Then began the enemies every where to fling from them their weapons, and to yield themselves prisoners. So being themselves and their pavilions taken, they were all bold, but those of Senators calling. Part of the pavement was restored to the Latins and Hernicks, namely, to so many as knew their own goods; part thereof the Dictator fold in part-fale, and leaving the Colus the charge of the camp; rode himself triumphing into the City, and gate over his office. Of which his noble and famous Dictatorship, they bleth the memorial, who write, that A. F. Flaminus (the Dictator hision, that for that advantage offered a fortunate service, he departed without leave from his quarter and guard) was after his victory achieved, by his fathers Commandment beheaded. But I will not to believe the other. And lawful it is for me to do, among so divers opinions: and a good proof it is on my side, that such imperious and rigorous proceedings were called Impria Manli- auas, and not Pifhamnus. For like it is, that he who had given the first example of such cruelty, should have gotten afore all others, that noted title of cruelty. Besides, Manlius was, that was named Impuria. But Phibunmus is not marked with any odious note at all.

C. Iulius Conuls, in the absence of his College, without any calling of lots, dedicated the Temple of Ap $e Quintus having discharged his army, when he was returned into the City, took not that well. But it was no boast to complain in the Senate house. Moreover, in this notable year, so full of brave and worthy acts, there is recorded one thing, that was thought in those days nothing pertinent to the State of Rome, namely, that the Carthaginians (so great and mortal enemies in time to come) passed the seas then first: and (upon the occasion of civil dissension and discord among the Sicilians) with a power landed in Sicily, to take part with a side and faction. In the City of Rome the Tribunes of the Commons laboured, that Military Tribunes might be with Conuls authority chosen: but it could not be obtained, Conuls were made, Lu. Papius Caurius, and L. Iulius, The Equians Embassadors suing to the Senate for a league, and for that league pretending very often to yield themselves, and be in subjection, obtained a truce only for 8, years. The Volscians after their overthrow in Alfedum, fell to continual debate and contention, whiles some persuaded peace, and others war so long, until at length they grew to brawls and mutinies. So on every side the Romans were at rest. The Conuls understanding that the Tribunes of the Commons were compacted (for one false brother among them bewrayed and detected all) to put up a bill, and make a law, concerning the citing of fines and penalties (a thing right pleasing and acceptable to the people) they themselves prevented them, and preferred it. Then were Conuls, L. Servius Fidenas, the second time, and Hofius Licinieus Tricipitanus. In whole year nothing was there done worthy of rehearsal. After them succeeded Conuls, A. Cornelius Cossius, and Titus Qunius Pannus the second time, The Veientians made rodes into the lands of the Romans. And a rumor went, that some of the Fidenat youths were accrescent unto them, and had their hands therein. For which were appointed as Commissioners to make inquisition, L. Servius, Quintus Servilis, and M. Mumerus Aemilius. Some of them were confined to Hoffman, for that they could make no sound excuse, and justify their absences for certain days out of the Senate. So the number of the inhabitants there, was encreased, and their lands, who were slain in the wars, allotted unto them.

In that year happened an exceeding great drought, For not only the wanted rain water from above, but also the earth, lacking her natural moisture, severely sufficed to maintain the running stream in main rivers. The scarcity of water besides about springs that were dried up, and the small rivulet and brooks caused a great death and mortality of cattle for default of drink: whereof some died of the fists: by contagion whereof the people also were diseased generally. The malady first began among the rustic folk, the bond-flaves and hinds: and afterwards spread into every corner of the City. Neither were men only tainted and diseased with this infection: but their minds also were troubled and posciled with sanctified sorts of superstitious religions, and those for the most part strange and forren: whiles upon vain and foolish prophesies, they brought new rites and ceremonies of sacrificing into mens houses; and made good gain of such as were given to superstition devotion, and made conscience of every little thing: until such time as now it grew to a publick offence, and the chief of the City were ashamed to see in every street and chappel, flange and unacquainted purgatory sacrifices and expiations, for to procure the favours and mercy of the gods. Whereupon the Ediles had in charge and commission, to look sightly to this disorder: and that no other gods were worshipped, then those of the Romans: nor after any other manner than had been usual in their native country. So their anger against the Veientians and desire of revenge, was put off unto the next year following. when C. Servilius Hids, and L. Papirius Magilus were Conuls. And even then, they made some ftable to proclaim war immediately, or to make out any power against them: but they thought good to lend their Heralds more, to make claim for their own and challenge restitution. For whereas of late years there had been a field fought with the Veientians before Numen and Fideus: whereupon there followed no peace but only a truce concluded: both the time was now expired, and also before the day they had rebelled. Yet were there Heralds sent unto them. And when they had demanded amends by a solemn oath and other ceremonies according to the ancient manner, they might have no audience. Neither were their words regarded. After this there arose some question, whether the war should be proclaimed with the peoples allowance & suffrages, or the Senates decree were alone sufficient. The Tribuns by giving out and threatening that they would stop the mutters obtained in the end, that Quintus the Consul should propound this matter concerning the war unto the people. And it passed clear through all the Centuries. Herein also had the Commonalty the better of it for that they prevailed that there should be no Consuls chosen the year following. So there were four Tribuns military created with Consuls authority, T. Quintius Pomponius immediately from his Consulship, C. Furiius, M. Pobulumus, and Cornelius Cossius of which Cossius had the charge and government of the City. The other three after they had in emptied, took a journey to Veii, and made good proof how hurtful in war is the rule of many Commanders. For whereas every man was inclined to his own counsel and advice, and took divers courses one from another, they made way for the enemies and gave them advantage. For if the Veientians taking their opportunity and time, entred upon the army thus disstrated, whilst some commanded to found a retreat, others the alarm and to strike up the battle. Whereupon they were disorderd and put to flight. But for as much as the camp was near at hand, thither they retired themselves in safety: so as the shame they gat was more then the harm in this defeat. The City was passe and herenpon forrowed, as not used to take foiles and overthrowes. The Tribuns they hated, and required a Dictator; in whom rested ever the whole hope and stay of the City. And when as even in that behalf, they made a matter of conscience, because there might not be any Dictator nominated, but by a Consul, the Augurs were consulted withal: who resolved them of that doubt and rid them of their scruple, So A. Cornelius (a consular Tribun) nominated M. Lucius Aemilius Dictator: by whom he was him selfe also pronounced Grand Master of the horsemens. At such default was the City then, of right valour and true vertu, that notwithstanding the prejudice was the Senors, yet there was no remedy, but the whole government of the state shou'd rest upon that family, which had been wrongfull disgraced and unworthily noted by the Senors.

The Veientians proud of their late good success, albeit they sent their Embassadors about all the nations of Latium, boasting and vaunting that in one battle they had discomfited three Roman Generals, yet could not they with all their solicitation, persuade any to be in to take part with them in publick action: but they procured divers from all parts for hope of spoil, voluntarily to aid and assist them. The people of Fidenes only agreed to rebel. And as though it had been in no wise lawful, to begin any war but with some wicked, heinous and execrable sort as afore they had embrued their hands, and bathed their swords in blood of Embassadors, so then, they began with murdering their new received Colonors: and so banded themselves with the Veientians. Then conñused the Princes and States of those two nations, whether they should make Veii or Fidenes the front town of the war. Fidenes was supposed the fitter and more commodious. So the Veientians passed over the Tiber, and translated the war to Fidenes. Great fear was there at Rome to see the army of their enemies removed from Veii, and implanted at Fidenes. And being shrewdly danted by their late overthrowes besides, they encamped even before the gate Colline. On the walls were armed fowlers placed, vacating in all courts of law was ordained, shaws windows shut up, and all more like a Leaguer then a City. Then sent the Dictator the Criers about into all streets and lanes, to summon the Citizens thus terrified, to a general assembly. Where he rebuked them for carrying such warring and doubtful hearts upon so small accidents and events of fortune, having received but a flight lofs and final spoil: and that, not through the manhood of the enemy, or cowardice of the Roman army, but only through the disaffection and difference of the Leaders. Also for that they were afraid of the Veientian enemy, whom five or six times afore they had put to the worst and vanquished, and especially of Fidenes, which had been oftner in a manner won, then affluated. As for the Romans and their enemies (faith he) they are even the same still that always for so many hundred years, they had been: bearing the same minds, the same bodily strength, and the same armes: and even my self am the same M. Lucius Aemilius, and no other, who heretofore discomfited at Nomentana, the Veientians and Fidenatians, with the Felicians power also adjoined unto them. And as for A. Cornelius, he will no doubt be the same General of horsemens in this battle, as in the former war he was: at what time he being a Knight Marshal, flew Lass Tolmanius the King of the Veientians, in the sight of two armies: and brought into the Temple of Jupiter Ferarvus, the rich armor of him delpoied. Wherefore ye ought to remember this, that we have on our side triumphs, spoils and victory: whereas with the enemies remaineth the worst and detestable fact of killing the Embassadors, against the law of all nations: the mischief of the Fidenatians inhabitants, in time of peace: the breaking of truce, and their revolving now seven times to their ruin and overthrow. Take weapon therefore in hand like mentor: I trust assuredly that so soon as we shall join our camps together, and encounter their most wicked enemies, they shall have no joy of the shameful discrepancy of the Roman army. And the people of Rome shall understand, how much better they have deferred of the Common-weal, who made me Dictator now the third time, than those, who for clipping the Senors wings and abridging them of their kingly rule, had misdoubted and disgraced my second Dictatorship with the shameful blot of ignominy and reproach. After this speech, when he had made his words accordingly: he encamped a mile and an half on this side nd, flankd on the right hand with the hills, and on the left with the river Tiber. And commanded T. Quintius Pompoius his Lieutenant, to gain the hills aore, and he possesseth secretly of that cape or hill, which was on the back part of the enemies. Himself the next morrow when when as the Tuscan, (full of pride and romanck for the prosperous succces of former days; which was much better than their service in fight) came forth into the field: after he had stayed a while, until the ioune and epial brought word, that Quinctius was gotten safely unto the Hill top, adjoyning to the Castle or fort of the Fidenates, he advanced forth his standards and with his footmen ranged in battle array, marchd against his enemies with full pace: comman- ding his General of the Horfemen not to charge without his warrant: for that he himself, as need should require, would give the signal for the aid of his cavalry to come in, willing him then, to quit himself like a brave Knight in remembrance of his glorious combate with a King: of his rich proue and obligation: and of Romulus and J. Peter spectus. Thus the legions still valiantly than other, two speeoe: the reit he fold in portiake, And so with triumph brought home to Rome his victorious army, enriched with a great booty: and having commanded the General of the Horsemen to resign up his office, himself also surrendresth his own, upon the sixteenth day after his creation, yielded up his government in peace, which in time of war, and in a fearful state he had received.

There be some that have recorded in their Chronicles, that there was a barlet fought with the Veientans at Fidene by ships upon the water. A thing vely, no is impossible than incredible, Considering that even at this day, the river is not broad enough for such a purpose; and that at that time, (as by ancient men we have learned) it was far narrower than now it is. Unles, haply in crowling over the river some vessels or bottoms, that were put out to meet and to receive them, I were *and. And so, men making the matter greater, (as usually it cometh to pass) have deified a vain title of a naval victory at Sea. The year following, there were military Tribuns, with Consuls authority, A. Sempronius Astratus, L. Quintius Cincinnatus, L. Furius Mucundinus, and L. Horstius Barbatus. Then was there a truce granted unto the Veientans for twenty years, and to the Aquilians for three years, whereas they had made suit for more. Reit there was also from all seditions and broils in the City. The year following, having neither war abroad, nor yet sedition at home, was famous yet for the plays which in time of war had been vowed: both in regard of the great preparations that the Military Tribuns made, as also for the frequent restoring and concurrence of the Nations adjoining. The Tribuns with Consuls authority, were CL. Graffius, SP. Nuntius, T. Sergius Fidanes, and Sexatus Julius Titius. The fight of these games and palmites, K whereunto those strangers were come by publick consent of their States, was unto them more acceptable in regard of the courtesy of those friends that gave them entertainment. After these plays, there enmied seditions Orations of the Tribuns of the Commons, who rebuked the common multitude, for that they were beforesated with admiration of those whom they had to have erected, kept themselves in perpetual thraldome. And not only didst nor attempt to put forth them selves to bring in again the possibility to have Consuls of their part, as in times past: no, nor so much as in the creation of Military Tribuns (the Election of whom was indifferent as well for Commons as Nobles) were mindful or thought either upon themselves or their friends, and those of their own body: And therefore they should raise to marvel, why no man pleaded for the benefit of the commonalty. For, travel is well bestowed, and danger well advantured, where profit and honor might be hoped and looked for. And nothing is so difficult but men would employ themselves to enterprize the same, if for the adventuring of great exploits, there might be proposed as great rewards. But, that any Tribun of the Commons should run directly and blindly into a world of brawls and troubles, with great hazard of his person, and hope at all of fruit and profit in the end: for which contention, he might be sure that the Nobles would be against whom he rivetted, would persecute him with deadly and irreconcilable malice: and at the Commons hands, for whom he thus contended, he should be honored and advanced never the more, it was a thing neither to be expected, nor required. The only means to get courage and magnanimity, is advancement to high place of honor and dignity. And as for them, they would not disdain the meanest commoner that was, if they themselves might be no more despised. To conclude, the matter were worth the tryal in one or two, whether any commoner were sufficient to bear a great office of state: or whether it were a wonderful thing and strange miracle, that a valiant and hardy man should arise out of the commonalty. With much a do (say they) we got and obtained, that Tribuns military with Consuls authority might likewise be chosen out of the commonalty: and men approved both in war abroad and in affairs of State at home, had sued therefore. In the first years they being nipped by you, and to having the repute, were had indiscern of the Nobility, for that at length they torberate to give themselves thus contumeliously to be mistrels and made fools. We see no cause therefore, why that law also should not be repeated, wherein a dignity was granted, and never like to be obtained. For lets shame would there arise, if the law were not indifferent nor respected unto them as N unmeet persons and unworthy, thus shamefully to be past by and take the repute. Thafle and suchlike, as by the word of the general applause, that some of them were invited forward to sit for the Military Tribunall: whilsts every one promised in the time of his offer to do great matters, and to propose, some one thing, some another for concerning the benefit of the Commons. Pretending great hopes of dividing the common Lands, and planting of colonies abroad, and laying tributes and impositions upon landd and persons, for to pay fouldiers wages. But the Tribuns military then in place, devised to lose out a time, when upon some occasion of the absence of much people departed out of the City, the Senators by a privy and secret warning, shoulde at a certain day be called home; and then whiles the Tribuns of the Commons were away, an act of Senate should passe in this form: That for almost as it was noticed that the Vellians were entred into the lands of the Hernicis, to raise and rob, the military Tribuns should go to see whether they were so or no, and that in the mean time there should be held a general assembly for the Election of Consuls. The Tribuns military took their journey accordingly, and left Appius Claudius the Decemvir for Governor of the City, a new young gentleman and a forward, who from his very cradle bare an inward grudge and hatred against the Tribuns and the Commons. And boards it is whether for the Tribuns of the Commons to find themselves grieved with those, who made the decree, now that they were ablet.
A foreign matter, but yet worthy to be remembered and here inferred, is reported to have happened that year: to wit, that * Vulcumnos * a City of the Tuscanes, which now is * Cupra * , was by the Sammites taken; and that it came to be named * Cupra * of one * Capis * their Captain; or (which sounds more like a truth) of the champian field. But they want it by this means, for upon occasion that the Tuscanes were wearied with former wars, they were admitted into the society of their City and territory. And on a solemn festival day, when as the citizens had filled their belles and were round asleep, the new Coloners the Sammites, let upon the old inhabitants, and in the night season flew them all.

But now to return. Things passing thus (as I said before) the Comuls abovemented upon the * 13 of Decem * , entred their government. By which time not only they which were of purpose lent to learn the news of the Volcians brought word that war was at hand; but Embassadors also from the Latins and Herricks, gave intelligence of the same. And namely, that never at any time afore, the Volcians were more busy and occupied, either in chusing of good Captains, or in levying an army, giving out their speeches abroad and in every place; That this time was now come, either to forget warfare, and lay away boulterly; and for ever make account to bear the yoke of thraldom; or else not to give one foot, nor come behind those with whom they trove for soveraignety, either in mankind or in painful travel, or in Discipline of warfare. And slyly, they were no vain tidings that those messengers reported. But the Senators would take no such knowledge, nor be greatly moved at the matter. And withal * C. Sempronius * unto whom the charge of that war was allotted, presumed upon fortune, as if the were always right confiant and at command, and leading an army of a people used to victory, against those that were wont to be over one, did all things rashly and negligently. So as to speak a truth, there was more Roman Discipline in the Volcian breath in the Roman. And fortune (as oftentimes else) went with virtue. At the first encounter, which by * Sempronius * was unheedfully and undulyedly begun before that either the battalions were reinforced and strengthened with fresh supplies of succour, or the Horlemen ranged in convenient place, they ran together, and came to handlocks. And the first token which way the victory would encline, was the manner of shout at the first charge: which by the enemy was more loud, more thrill and continual: but by the Romans dissonant, unequal, dead and cold, often begun, and often reuned: and by their uncertain and variable noise they bewrayed the inward fear of their hearts. Whereupon the enemies so much the more eagerly charged them, pressing upon them with their shields, and laying at them thick with their bright swords: on the other side, the Romans helmets wag, and their crests nod every way as they look about them: and as they were to seek what to do, so they tremble and run together on heaps one while the ensigns stand still, and were abandoned of the formost fighting in the vanguard another while they retired in again amongst their own squadrons. Yet was not the flight certain, nor yet the victory. The Romans fought more to cover and threw themselves than to fight; so ward

The Roman Empire. Follow therefore in stead of banner displayed, the point of my lance: let both Romans and Volcians fee, that no nation is comparable to you, either for foot or horse. Whole encouragement being approved and received with a shout, he advanced forward, bearing his staff aloft: and what way forever they go, they enter and make room with forcible sway: and where they see their fellows in greatest distress, thither they make speed, opposing their targets afore them. And thus in every place whereas they thrust themselves forcibly, was the fight tented: and doubtless the enemies had turned their backs; it possible it had been for so few to have performed every thing at once. Now whereas the Generall of the Volcians, saw his men not able to withstand them, gave a signal and charge to give way to this new band of enemies, so wit, these Targettiers until such time as they had put themselves forward; which might be excluded from their fellows. Which being done, their Horlemen were enclosed on every side: neither could they break through that way which they went: because the enemies were there thickest, where they had made their lane before. The Cothen, with the legions of the Romans, having lost the right of those that had been a shield of defence and bulwark everly to the whole army, left to many hardy men thus intrusted, should be overpressed by the enemies: resolved to adventure any peril or hazard whatsoever. The Volcians were likewise diversly occupied & troubled. For on the one side they bare off the Coth, and legions: on the other side they aromented * Sempronius * fore, & the Horlemen: who seeing that after many ayles and offers they could not break forth to their fellows, but up unto a certain little Hill, and cast them selves into a ring and flood to their defence, not without doing some mischief to their enemies: neither gave they over fighting until night. The Consul also maintained the battle so long as he could, and kept the enemy play. So the night parted them al together, and uncertain it was who had the upper hand, and for that the event was unknown, who sped the better. So great a terror came upon both parts in their camps, that leaving the wounded and a great part of their carriages behind, both armies as taking themselves losers, recovered the mountains that were next unto them, Howbeit the Hill or bank aforesaid, continued still full bright round about, until midnight. But when word was brought thither to the Affairians, how that their camp was abandoned: they thinking their fellows vanquished, were also for their part affrighted, and made shift and fled in the dark as well as they could. Tempamius, laying an ambushment, kept his men there together until day light. Then went he down with a few to discover the coasts: and finding by enquiry made of the wounded enemies, that the tents of the Volcians were left and forlorn: he was full glad thereof, and called down his fouldiers from the mount, and entered into the Roman camp. Where seeing all void and forlorn, and finding the same defection which was amongst the enemies: before that the Volcians upon knowledge of their errors should return again, he took with him those hurt fouldiers that he could: and not knowing to what quarters the Consul was gone, marched forward the next way to the City of Rome. And thither already the brut of this unlucky fight, and of abandoning the tents, was arrived. But above all the rest, those Horsemens were bewailed, and great moan and lamentation was made for them as well in private as in public like. The Col. Fabius, seeing the City also terrified with this news, kept ward before the gates: by which time, they might discover the Horsemens aforesaid afar off: but not without some fear of their parts, doubting who they were. But being soon known, they caufed to great contentment after former fear, that in most joyful manner the noise went through the City, how the Horsemens were returned safe with victory. And out of thofe mourning and sorrowful houses, which a while before had bid adieu to their friends and kinsfolk, and bewailed their death, they ran into the streets and high ways by heaps. The feart full damos and wives, forgetting, for joy all decent and womanly modesty, were out to meet the army, fell every one with open arms upon their own husbands and sons, took them about the neck, clipp’d and kiss’d them, and with all their hand and heart received them; yea, and for exceeding joy were almost past themselves.

The Tribunes of the Commons, which had challenged and accused M. Porcius Cinna and T. Quinctius, for that by their default, there was an unlucky fight before Vei’s: seemed to have good occasion and opportunity offered now, by bringing the Consul Sempronius into fresh and new hatred and disgrace, for to renew the conceived displeasure and malice of the people against them. Having assembled therefore the people together, with open mouth they declared, that the Commonwealth was betrayed first, at Vei’s by the leaders, and afterwards, because they went clear away withal, and unpunifhed, therefore the army in Vei’s was likewise lost by the Consul: and that a troop of most valiant knights were thus cast away and given to be murdered, and the camp shamefully left and forlorn. Then C. Julius, one of the Tribunes, commanded Tempamius the Horlemen to be called and before them all said, "I would know of thee O Sextus Tempamius, whether thou M. think that C. Sempronius the Consul, either began battalion in good time, or strengthened his battalions with good succors and supplies? or whether thou thyself, when as the Roman legions and footmen were discomfited, of thine own head and policy, canst concessio the Horlemens to alight on foot, and thereby reencreased the force? Afterwards, when thou and thy men of arms were shut out from our battel, whether either the Consul himself came to rescue, or lent any succor unto thee? Last of all, whether the morrow after, thou hadst any aid or rescue at all? Whether thou and thy troop of Horlemens brake through into the camp by your own hardiness and valor? And whether ye found in the camp any Consul or army, or rather the pavilions abased, and the fouldiers left behind, hurt and wounded? To these pretense and points, I trust thou to speak this day upon this verrie, and the fate of a fouldier: by which only, in this N war-service the Common-weal hath stood preferred. Finally, where C. Sempronius, and where our legions be? Whether thou were forlorn thyself, or whether thou forookedst the Consul and the army? And to conclude, whether we have lost or won the field? To these demands, Tempamius made (as they say) no fine Oration, but a grave pithy speech like a fouldier: not full of fill-pries, nor shewing any gladness for the fault of another, and answered in this wise: How great skill (quoth he) of martial feats, and what insufficiency is in C. Sempronius, it is not for me a fouldier to judge, not yet to make any esteeme of my General: but it was for the people of Rome to determine thereof, at what time as by their suffrages and voice, in a solemn Election, they chose him Consul. And therefore ye are not to enquire of me, and to be informed, either of the policies of a General Captain, or virtues and duties of a Consul: deep points to be examined, weighed, and discourse by great wits, reaching heads, and high minds. But for that which I with mine eye saw, I am able to make report and testify; namely, That before himself was excluded out of the battel, I beheld the Consul fighting manfully in the vanguard, encouraging his men earnestly, and even amongst the Roman Standards, and Pikes of the enemies; busily employed, After which I was caried from the sight of my fellows, howbeit by the fire, noise and shouting, I well perceived, that the conflict continued until night. Neither was it possible (as I thought) for them to break through unto the Hill which I kept, by reason of the multitude
A "of enemies between. As for the army, what is become of it, I know not: But I suppose, that "as I myself in an extremity and fearful case, defended myself and my men, by advantage of the "ground: so the Consul for to save the army, took some more safe place to encamp in. Neither "think I verily, that the Volscians stood in better terms than the Romans fortune was. And the "darkness of the night (no doubt) caused error and confusion on every side, and in all places. After which speech when as he bethought them, not to hold him any longer, wearied with travel, and taint of his wounds: he was with exceeding praise both of his valiant service and also of his modest speech, licent to depart. "Whiles these things thus passed, the Consul by that time, had manished by the way of Latiumus "as far as to the Temple of 'Quintus' thereto were wains, draught-beasts and hopper horses lent from the City, to receive and cafe the army, toile out with fight, and tried by jorning all night. Within a while after, the Consul entered into the City, who endeavoured not more, to put the fault from himself, than to extol Temperanius, and give him this due deferred praise. Now whilsts the City was sad and heavy for this hard hap, and angry also with the Captains: behold, M. Pofhumitus, who before had been accused, was now presented unto the people, for to wreak their choler and malice upon. He had been a Tribun Military in place of a Cof., at Cere, and now was condemned, & a fines on his head of thousand Aces of brass. But as for Titus Qtinuus, his fellow in government, because that among the Volsci he had served fortunately as Consul, under the conduct of Pofhumitus Tiburtius the Dictator: and likewise at Fidenes, as Lieutenant of C the other Dictator Mancoenius Aemilus, and laid the whole fault of that other time from him himself: upon his colleague before condemned: he was found guilty and acquit by all the Tribunes, It is said that the freth remembrance of his father Cincimatis, late a right worshipful citizen, helped him much: Yea, and Capituleus Quintus a very aged man, did him no hurt, who humbly besought them that they would not suffer him, having but a while in this world to live, for to be the easier of to heavy news unto Cincimatis. The Commons made Tribunes of the commonalty, Sex. Temperanius, A. Sellius, Sex. Anti Huns, and Sex. Pompeius in their absence: whom also the Horsemanship had chosen for their Captains or Centurions; in the former exploit, by the advise and counsel of Temperanius. But the Senators, because now for hated of Sempronius the name of Clemens misliked and offended them, determined that military Tribunes with Consuls authority, should be created, So D there were chosen L. Maucius Calapinious, Q. Antonius Morends, L. Pappius Magillanus. "In the very beginning of the year L. Hortensius the fifth Tribun of the commonalty, accused C. Sempronius the Consul of the former year. And when as his other four fellows in office, in the sight of the people of Rome befofe him not to trouble their guides Captains, in whom nothing could be blamed or found fault withal, but adverfe fortune: Hortensius could hardly abide, but thought it was but to prove and try his relocale constancy: and that the party accused, trusted not upon the prayer and intercession of the Tribunes, which only for a shew was pretended, but upon their support and asfiance. And therefore turning one whilst to Sempronius himself, demanded what was become of that hasty courage and flamack, so ordinary in those of Senators calling: and where was that magnanimity which refled and relied upon innocence? since that he ha- E ving been a Consul, was fain to shelter and throw himself under the shadow and protection of the Tribunes? Another while directing his speech to his fellow Tribunes: but you my Masters (quoth he) what will ye do? If I prosecute mine action against him still, and convict him in the end: Will ye take from the people their right and overthrow the authority of the Tribunes among the Commons? When they again laid and inquered, that the people of Rome had absolute power to do what they would, both with Sempronius, and all others: and that they neither would not could abridge the people of their judgment. But if (lay they) our prayers in the behalf of our General, who was to us in stead of a father, may not avail, then will we together with him change our weed for company. Nay, God forbid (quoth Hortensius) The Commons of Rome shall never see their Tribunes arrayed in foiled and mornfule apparel. And as for C. Sempronius, I have now no F more to say to him, since that he hath carried himself so, whilsts he was General, as he hath gained thou much, as to be to dearly beloved of his followers. Neither was the kindnees of those four Tribunes more acceptable to the Commons and Nobles, than the good nature of Hortensius, who at their reasonable request, was so easy to be pacified and intreated. "It was no long time that fortune Favowed upon the Aequians: who embraced the doubtful victory of the Volscians, and took it as their own. The next year after, when Ca. Fabius Vabal- mans, and T. Quintus Capituleus, the son of Capituleus, were Consuls: by the leading of Fabius, unto whom was allotted that Province, nothing was done there worthy of remembrance. For when as the Aequians had made feblemance of a barrel, and brought their army only in fight, they were in fearful wate then discomfited, and shamefully fled, mimiing no matter of great hon- Gor to the Cof, And therefore was he denied triumph. But yet because the ignominy of the loss which happened by Sempronius was partly allayed, it was granted that he might enter Oviant into the City. | A General was fad to enter Oviant into the City, when ordinarily without his army following him, he went on foot, or rode on Horseback only, and the people in their Aclamations for joy redoubled Ove or Ova. So that Oviant is a much as Ovian: Howevcr, some think that Ovian took the name of sacrificing a sheep. But he rode in triumph, when his foulers attended him in his chariot crying for Triumph, in this he carried a branch or were a garland of laurel, in the other of Myrtle. So that the Ovation was a less honor than the Triumph, And it was granted granted to inferior persons, and for meaner desert. Whereas, none usually might triumph, unless he were Dictator; Cof, or Pretor, and had slain in field 5000 enemies at the least, won much spoil and pillage, and augmented the State of the Roman Empire. Like as the war was dispatched with less ado than they feared: so in the City, after a calm and peaceable state, there arose between the Commons and Nobles, a world of discords and troubles more than they expected. Which began upon occasion of doubting the number of Quellos. For when the Consuls had pronounced, that besides two Quellos or Treasurers of the City, there should be other twain ready to attend upon the Consuls, for all services and charges belonging to war: and when the Nobles also with all their power had approved it, the Tribuns of the Commons entered into a contention with the Consuls, and required that some of the Quellos (for until that time they had been created from out of the degree of the Patrizij only) might be likewise of the Commons. Against which demand, at the first, both Consuls, and also the Nobles, laboured with might and main, but afterwards having granted thus much. That as the use and practice was in creating of Tribuns with Consuls authority, so in like manner, in the Election of Quellos, the people should have their free liberty to chuse. And seeing they gained little thereby, and could effect no good, they wholly let fall their former matter, about increasing the number of the Quellos. But although it were thus by them given over, the Tribuns took it in hand again, and let it on foot: yea, and other feditious actions besides very often sprang forth, and among the rest, those also concerning the Law Agravia. Upon which troubles, when as the Senate was of mind, that there should be Consuls rather than Curular Tribuns created; and by reason of the Tribuns stepping between with their negative voyce, no decree of the Senate could passe, the government of the Commonwealth was devolved from Consuls to an * Interreign, but not without exceeding great debate: for that the Tribuns kept the Patrizij from meeting and packing together. Now when as the greater part of the year following was spent, with much strife and contention between the new Tribuns and certain Interregens, whiles one while the Tribuns stayed the Nobles from attending together about the chusing of an Interregent, and another while crossed the Interregent for granting out any Act of Senats or warrant, for the election of Consuls: at the last, L. Pappius Maglidianus, being declared Interregent, sometimes rebuked the Nobles, and sometimes blamed the Consuls, and said: * That the Common-wealth neglected and forsook all men was taken into protection of the Gods, and guided by their care and providence: nothing upright and false only, upon the true observed by the Victuarians, and the flow speed or small that the Equanis made to war. From whence, if any trouble should happen to arise, it is your will (quothe be) and pleasure belike, that the state should be surprized and affailed, while it is within out any Magistrate of the Nobility. For neither is there an army ready, nor yet a Captain to raise an army. What think ye to put back forain war abroad by civil discord at home? Which if they both should come together, there were no other remedy through all the Gods in Heaven should set to their helping hand, but that the Common-wealth of Rome should utterly be inhabited. Yet rather remit every one you somewhat of the rigor of your full jurisdiction, and (for the love of God) take some indifferent course to join in unity: the Nobles for their part, by luring Military Tribuns to be created in lieu of Cofli; the Tribuns again by no more than tending and inticing their negative, but that four Quellos may be chosen by the free voyces of the people, from out of the Commons and Nobles; one with another, First therefore was the High Court held for choosing Sovereign Tribuns: and Tribuns there were created in Curular authority, all of the Nobility; namely, L. Quintus Cincinnatus the third time, Sex. Furius Medullius the second time, M. Maudius, and A. Scipionus Atratinus. When this Tribun latin named, was president of the Election for Quellos, and the son of Antistius A Tribun of the Commons, and a brother besides to another Tribun, one Sex. Pomphilus for the dignity; among certain other of the Commons: neither all their own means that they could make, nor all the voyces they could procure, were able to prevail, but that the people preferred persons to the place according to their gentry and high birth: namely, whole fathers and grand-fathers they had been Consuls. All the Tribuns of the Commons formed and chafe at this, but especially Pomphilus and Antistius, being set on fire at the repulse of thei their friends, * What should this mean (say they) that none of the Commons, neither in regard of their own merits, nor considering the injuries at the Nobles hands nor yet for desire they might preend to the first hand of that authority, which now was lawful, and never heretofore: that none of the Commons (I say) was created, if not a Military Tribun yet not iomuch as a Quello? What, that neither the fathers prayer in the behalf of his son, nor a brothers suit in favour of a brother, being Tribuns both of them, invested in that sacred authority, and which first was erected for the maintenance of common freedom, could ought at all prevail? Sure there is some fraud and jugling in the matter: and A. Scipionus, hath in the Elecution nced more art and cunning than truth and fidelity. Complaining that by his injuries and indirect dealing, their friends had taken the field. When as therefore they might nor by any violence touch his own person and attack him, being fenced with innocence in this Action, and secured by vertue of the office which then he bare: they wreaked their svels and discharged their choler upon C. Sempronius, the consen gentanim of Atratinus by the brother: and with the help of M. Canuleius, one of their colleagues, arrested him for the ignominions service in the Volscian war. Ever and anon, also the same Tribuns made some words and motion in the Senate-house, concerning the division of Lands, and revived the law Agravia.

The singular condemnation
A. Agrarius (which C. Sempurnius at all times most sharply and eagerly had withstood, supposing as it fell out indeed, that the accused person should either by giving over the cause, be left recovered of the Nobles: or if he stood to it till until the time of judgment drew nigh, he should dispute and offend the Commons. But he chose rather to be the object of the displeasure and malice of the people, that were opposite and bent against him, and so to wound his own private estate: than to betake the common and public cause: and persisted resolute in the same mind till; that these should no longer obstructive be general, that might win and procure favour unto those three corrupt Tribunes: For it is not land and living (quoth he) that they shooat for, for the benefit of the Commons: that is not their looking; but their drift is to work and procure displeasure unto me: and therefore I will turn my part, abide that itmemp and repose with a resolute Mind. And the Commons that is not their looking; but their drift is to work and procure displeasure unto me: and therefore I will turn my part, abide that itmemp and repose with a resolute Mind. And the

B. Senate ought not to elect either of me, or of any citizen else to highly, as to buy the sparing of one man to dear, even with the harm and damage of the whole state. The day of judicial tryal came. When he had prepared for himself, and seemed nothing daunted at the matter: yet, for all that the Nobles could do, who tried all means, but in vain, to mitigate and delay the heat of the Commons, condemned he was in thirteen thousand feet. The same year Poblianus a Veial Num, was called in question for2 Nicholas and sent to prison, for the benefit of the Commons: that is not their looking; but their drift is to work and procure displeasure unto me: and therefore I will turn my part, abide that itmemp and repose with a resolute Mind. And the Commons that is not their looking; but their drift is to work and procure displeasure unto me: and therefore I will turn my part, abide that itmemp and repose with a resolute Mind. And the

C. A Virgin girtless for any deed done: but scarcely of good name and fame: by reason that she was suspected for her apparel and going more light and garish in her attire: yea, and for her wit, more itnected and pleasant, than became a maid, and nothing repugnant of the speech of the world. Her tryal was put over to a farther day, and she (after she had twice pleaded) in the end was acquitted: only the high Priest by the advice, and in the name of the whole colleged, bounded her, and gave her warning to leave her sports, taunts, and merry conceits: and in her rayent to be seen not so gay as devout, and wear her garments rather faintly than lightly. The same year was

Cames, inhabited at that time by the Greeks, taken by the Campanians. The year following had military Tribuns with Consuls authority, Agrigita Menenius Lanatus, P. Laucknus Tricipitis, S. Naunius Servilus. A year, by the happiness and good fortune of the people of Rome, more notable for a danger escaped, than for any harm received. Certain bond-servants had conspired to fire the City in divers places afar, for their intent, when the people should be busy occupied, here and there, to have their houses, then by force and arms to

D. invade the City and Capitol. But Jupiter turned away and disappointed their wicked design. For by the preaching and information of twain, the rest of the malefactors were taken and executed. But those that disdained and resolved the conspiracy, had ten thousand pound in brass money (which was in those days thought to be great riches) weighed them out of the City chamber, and freedom besides, for their reward,

After this, began the Athenians to renew war: and word was brought to Rome by credible persons, that certain new enemies also, to wit the Campanians, joined together in counsel with the old. These Athenians were good neighbours: for once a year ordinarily, they used to put the City of Rome to the pains of waiting with them, and not mits. Embassadors then were sent to Lacones, who brought double answers from thence: whereby it appeared that neither at that instant they were ready to war, nor yet were like to continue long in peace. The Tusculans were charged, to take good heed, and have an eye that way, that no new slips and troubles should arise: at Lacones, there came Embassadors from Tusculum, to L. Sergius Eideus, M. Papius Magellanus, and C. Servilus: the son of Q. Servilus Prenius: (by whom being Dictator, Eideus was won) who were Military Tribuns in Consuls authority the year following. These Embassadors brought news that the Laccians were out, and in arms, and joying with the Athenians army, had forraged the country of Tusculum, and encamped themselves in Agudum. Then was war proclaimed against the Laccians. And when by a decree made by the Senate, that two of the Consular Tribunes should go to war, and one manage the affairs of Rome; there arose a contention on a Sunday, among thesaid Tribuns. Every one thought himself the most just and most sufficient man, to be General of

F. the war, reducing the charge of the City, as a bale, dishonourable, and thankless office. As the Senators mused and wondered, to see amongst thofe that were fellows in government to undertake a strife and contention: then Q. Servilus: *Seeing that (quoth he) there is no reverent regard, either of this honorable home, or of the Common-wealth: the father his countenance and dared Majestly, and ended this debate, Myton with any lot calling shall govern the City as President, God grant, that they which love war do well, may manage it with more discretion and confond than they with it. At for a general master to be levied out of all the people indiscriminately, that was not liked of. So ten Tribunes were drawn by lot, out of which, the yonger fore were preft forth to war under the conduct of the two Tribuns. The strife which began to be kinded among them in the City, through the fame detestful of sovereignty, brake forth and

G. grew much hotter in the camp. In nothing agreed they, striving whole opinion should stand: each one would have his own way: his own commands obeyed and none else: one despised another, and were divided one of the other: until at length, upon the Lieutenants reproop, they grew to this point, and this order was taken: That they should each other day, rule one a-lone by himself alone. Which news being brought to Rome, it is reported that Q. Servilus, a man for his years and long experience right skillull, prayed of the immortal Gods, that by the variance and discord of the Tribuns, the Common-wealth inflaine not more harm than they had received at Veiose. As as if there were no doubt, but that some great loss and overthrow was ready ready to happen, he was instant upon his son, to levy soldiers and to provide munition for war, He neither proved he a false and vain Prophet. For by the leading of Lucullus, whole day it was to rule, when as the enemy under a colour of fear, withdrew unto the tents, and to terrify them thither upon a foolish hope to win the camp, even under the very camp of the enemies in an uneven ground of disadvantage, they were suddenly charged by the Equians, discomfited and chased down the valley; and many in their fall, which was greater than the flight, were trod under foot and slain, and with much ado that day kept they their own tents. The morrow after, when as now the enemies had beaten a great part of the camp, they shamefully fled away, at the back gate, and forsook the camp. The Captains Lieutenants, and the strength remaining of the army, which kept to their ensigns and colours, went to Tuscullum; Other that were scattered here and there about the fields by sundry ways, made haste to Rome; and reported there the overthrow to be greater than indeed it was, Lcis was the trouble and sorrow, because men looked for no better issue and success: and also for that, there was help and succour (which they were to have an eye unto in so fearful a case) provided by the Tribun aforesaid. At whose commandment, when as the tumult was by the incontinent Magistrates appeased in the City, epitales were sent out in haste: who brought word that the Captains and the army was at Tuscullum: and that the enemy had not removed his camp. And then (which encouraged them most of all) by the Senate decree, Q. Servilius Priscus was chosen Dictator, a man whose Providence over the Common-wealth, the City as other times afoe, no in the event of that war had experience of: for that he only suspected the contention of the Tribuns afore this unhappy foil. Who having nominated Gene- ral of the Horsemen, his son (as some say) by whom being military Tribun, himself was declared Dictator (for others there be that write how Servilius Hals was that year General of the Horse) went forth with a fresh army to war, and having joyned unto him those which were at Tuscullum, he pitched his tents, two miles from the enemy. But see the fruit of good successes. The pride and negligence which had been amongst the Roman Captains, went from them to the Equians. Therefore in the first beginning of the conflict, when the Dictator with his Horsemen whom he sent against them, had disordered and put out of array the foremost ranks of the enemies, then commanded him the ensigns of the legionary footmen with all speed to follow hard upon: and one ensign-bearer of his own, who made some stay, he flew with his own hand. Then were they so earnestly set to give an hot charge, that the Equians could not abide their force: and being in flight overthrown, when as they fled all amain to the camp, the assault thereof was both shorter and with less ado, than was the battle. When the camp was taken and spoiled, and that the Dictator had given the pillage unto the footmen: and that the Horsemen which chased the enemies from the camp, had brought word back, that all the Lavicans were overthrown, and a great part of the Equians were fled to Laviscus: the day following was the army also led thither, and the Town compassed and beleaguered about, scaled, and sacked. The Dictator having brought home to Rome his victorious army, upon the eights day after he was chosen, gave over his office. And in very good time, before there was any edition stirred up about the Law Agraria, by the motion of the Tribuns of the Commons, for the division of the Lavicans Lands: the whole body of the Senate appointed that a Colony should be sent to Laviscus. So there were sent from the City M a thousand and five hundred to inhabit there, and two acres apace given them of land. After the winning of Laviscus, there were created Military Tribuns with Confals authority, to wit, Agrippa Memmius Luccatius, and L. Servilius Strato, with P. Lucretius Tricipitum (all three the second time) and Sp. Postumius Graffius: and the year following A. Sempronius Afratus, the third time, and the twain. M. Poppius Mutilus, and Sp. Nautilus Rustullus the second time: for these two years there was peace abroad, and discord at home about the Laws Agrarias. They that troubled the people, were Sp. Mecilis, who now the fourth time, and Metilius, who the third time were made Tribuns of the Commons, both absent. And when they had published their Act, That all Lands conquered from the enemies, should be divided by the poll: by which Ordinance, the possessions of a great part of the Nobility became confiscate, (for since their City was not fortified and built in a strange ground, there was in a manner no Land lay to it, which had not been purchased by the sword; neither enjoyed the Commons any, but that which either had been sold or alligned to the Commons) this seemed to be a bone cast between the Nobles and the Commons, to let them together at strife and contention. Neither knew the Military Tribuns any way to take count of this case, albeit one while they assembled the Senate, and another while in private conference with the Nobility. Then Appius Claudius (the nephew or grandson of notorious Appius the Decemvir, created for the making of Laws) the son of all the Council of the Nobility, made (as it is reported) this speech, and said, 'That he would impart unto them at which he had received by tradition from his ancestors, to wit, an old devise, and appropriate to his house, for that his great grandsire Appius Claudius, had showed unto the Nobles of the only way, to abate and take down the Tribuns power; namely, by the coming between 'and negative voice of their fellows. For men new come up, and new to promotion, might soon by the authority of the chief rulers be brought from their purpose, and made to change their mind, if otherwheres those great men in place would use some speech unto them fitted and framed rather to the time and present occasion than respective to their own high place and dignity: for evermore the heart and courage of men, is according to their degree and wealth. And when they see once their fellows postrifed first afore them of the caufe, and thereby crepe whom in all the favour with the Commons, and that no room is left for themselves to have any part thereof, they will be willing enough to encline and defend unto the Senate, and take their part: by means whereof they might wind into the love and good grace of that universal and late state, and particularly with the principal Lords of the Nobility. Which speeches, when they all had approved, and especially Q. Servilius Priscus, who praised the young Gentleman, for that he was not grown out of kind, nor degenerate from the rotation and race of the Cloudy, then every man was set about this business, to see whom of the Colleague or company of Tribunes they could win and draw to cross and stop the Act for going forward. The Senate now being broken up, the chief of the Nobles caught hold of the Tribunes, and were in hand with them perceiving-exhorting, and affuring them, that they should every one of private gratify not only, but also the whole body of the Senate in general: and never gave over, until they had procured six of them to interpose their negative, and thus crossed the Law. The morrow after, when as of purpose a matter was propounded before the Senate, about the sedition which Metellus and Metellus had raised, by a Largess of dangerous consequence: such speeches were by the principal of the Nobles delivered, that each one for himself confessed, that now they were to seek for counsel, and law no other help nor remedy but in the authority of the Tribunes: to the protection and safeguard of which Magnificity, the Common-wealth betook her self, and fled for succour; as being belet with danger, like some poor private person, and had no other means to save her self: saying, That it would be both for themselves, and also for their authority an honorable thing, if it might appear, that the policies of their Tribunship were not more employed in molesting the Senate, and making discord among the States than in retitling the peevish wilfulness of their colleagues. Whereupon arose a great noise through the whole company of the senators, whiles out of all parts of the County there assembled, they called upon the Tribunes for their helping hand. Then after silence made, they (who for the favour of the Lords of the Senate, were made beforehand to their cause) declared and confessed, that they were ready to cross that act, by their fellows published, seeing the Senate judged it to be prejudicial to the Common-wealth. These Tribunes for the order of their good service, were by the Senate highly thanked. But the Authors and Patrons of the Act abjured, calling together an assembly of the Commons, when they had inveighed against their fellows more virulently, terming them betraiers of the Common-wealth, and slaves to the Nobles: and uttering bitter speeches gave over their section and flite.

Two grievous wars had continued all the year next following (wherein P. Cornelius Cossus, C. Valerius Parnus, Q. Servilius Caepio, and M. Furius Vibulanus, were military Tribunes in Coll. authority) but that the Venetian war was defeated by the superfluous fear of their own Princess; whose grands. Tribes (overflowing the banks) had spoiled and overthrown all the villages and houses that stood thereupon. The Aequians likewise by reason of their loss received three years before made no great hurt to aid and assist the Volans a people of their own nation, For they had made certain rodes into the Latin Country, confining upon them, and wasted upon the inhabitants, lately there placed. Which trepails by them done they hoped to have been able, by the banding and affiliation of all the Aequians; but being forsaken of their allies they lost both their Town and territory, only by siege; and one light skirmish, and never fought for it any memorable war, L. Scipio also Tribun of the Commons, assayed to make an Act, that there might be sent to Vols as well as to Latin, Colones to people it: but by the negative of his Assidiences, who shreded, that they would not suffer any Statute of the Commons to pass without the assent of the Senate, it came to nothing.

In the year following, the Aequians having recovered and won again Vols, and brought a Colony thither, fortified the Town with a fresh power, at what time were Tribunes Military in Consul's authority at Rome, Cn. Cornelius Cossus, L. Valerius Patus, Q. Fabius Vibulanus the second time, and M. Posthumius Regillensis. The war against the Aequians, was committed to this Posthumus, a man of a crooked disposition, as his victory shewed more than the whole course of the war. For having levied an army in half, and brought it before Vols, after some small skirmishes, he tamely the Aequians and at length entred the Town. And when he had done with the enemies, he began to quarter with his own soldiers: for whereas during the time of the affall, he had given out by Proclamation, That they should have the discharge after the Town was once won: he brake promise with them. For I am induced to believe that this was the cause rather why the army mutined and was discontented, than for that this in a Town lately laked before and in a new Colony there was found less spoil than the Tribun made boast of. But this displeasure and anger once conceived was made the worse after that he returned into the City: for being sent for by his fellows, upon occasion of the Tribunitioneditions, there eloped him an indiret speech. I must needs say, and without all fence, wit, and honesty. Which he let fall in an assembly of the Commons wherein it hapned, that as Scipio, a Tribun of the Commons, was preferring the law and saying withal, That he would propose an Act that Colones should likewise be sent to Vols for that they were worthy to have both the Town and Lands of Vols, who had by sword and their conquest the time. Posthumus caught the word out of his mouth: And that shall my soldiers, dearly abide (quoth he) because they be more quiet. Which word being overheard offended not to the Comy present there in place assembled as the Lords of the Senate awhile after. Moreover the Tribun aforesaid an active man, and eloquent withal, having among his adversities met with a proud humorous spirit, and an insolent and intemperate tongue, which walked...

The Oration of Sestius against P. Fufumus.

Pufumus roaned to death by his own folediers.

An inquisition about the murder of Pufumus.

In the beginning of the Comitiis year, the Senate made a decree, that the Tribunes with all speed poftc should propose unto the Commons, concerning the inquisition of Pufumus his death: and that they should make his Commissioner and Judge; whom they would. The Commons by the consent of the whole people, gave the Comitiis commission to thee done, and performed accordingly. Who notwithstanding, that with exceeding moderation and lenity, they did pass and ended the matter, by punifhing a few, who (as it was credibly thought) made themfelves away; yet could they not for all that bring about, but the Commons took it very handsomely, and in the highest degree, laying, That the Acts and Ordinances, which had been pro pounded concerning their weal and commodities, thoje lay a long time asleep in the deck, and nothing done: but an order granted for their bloody death, that was prefently put in execution, Of so great force and importance it was. Now this had been the fittet time, that after their mutinous fentencies were chaffed, the division of the Volane territory, fhojuid have been offered unto them for to comfort their poor hearts again. By which deed (no doubt) their hot defire and longing after the law Agrarics had been abated, which tended to difpoefis at length the Nobles of the common grounds, which they injuriously were difeaf'd. But this indignity fluck in their fomacks, and was taken neerer to the heart. when they faw the Nobility to thinly O bent, not only to keep the common grounds in their hands, which they h'd by force: but also unwilling to divide among the people to much as the waft and void grounds, lately gotten by conquif from the enemies: but that it was like, within a while (as all the reft) to be a booty, and divident; to be shared among a few.

The fame year were the legions led by Furius the Comitiis, againft the Volickons: who forraied the borders of the Hernicks. But finding not the enemy there, they wan Ferentium, whither a great number of the Volickons had retired themselves. The booty there was lefs than they hoped for.
A. A petition

B. A famine

C. for: by reason that the Volsciars, seeing small hope of keeping the Town, trundled up and carried away both bag and baggage in the night, and quit the Town: which was won the morrow alter, being left well near deinitute and empty. All the Lands were given freely to the Hernicks. When this year was pulld in good quiet by the modesty and peaceable carriage of the Tribuns, then in place: there succeeded another Tribun of the Commons, L. Cicerius, when Q. Fabius Ambustus and C. Furius Paculus were Consuls. Whiles this man in the very beginning of his year, was busy in furring new edifices (as if he had been a task impoed upon his name and Usage) by proposing of the Agrarian laws: behold, there arose a petition, more fearful than hurtful, which turned away mens minds, from their publick affinities and accustomed contenotions, to tend their houles, and to care for the cherishing of their bodies. And (as men verily think) the fickness was leis dangerous than the seditions were like to have been. When as the City was now excited, as it were, and well escaped, with the sicknes only of many, and death of few: presently after this petition year, followed (as it is commonly seen) a great dearth of corn, by reason of the neft- of tillage. M. Popilius, Aretinus, and C. Numius Rutilus being Consuls. This famine would have been more grievous than the plague, had they not provided well for corn, by sending forth their Embassadors to the neighbourations all about, inhabiting along the Tuscan Sea and the Tyber, for to buy grain. Proudly were the Embassadors prohibited all commerce and traffique with the Samnits, who held at that time Capua and Camcis: but contrary-wife bountifully were they relieved by the Tyrrans or Potentates of Sicile. And such was the willing endeavour of

D. Hetatus, that great store of victuals came down the Tyber. In what deolution the City was during this affliction, the Cof, tryed by this: that when they could not furnish an Embassage, but with one Senator they were compelled to adjourn two Knights unto them, And setting aside the sicknes and death, there was no trouble either at home or abroad for those two years. But when these storms were once overcome, and that care past: then began again the old troubles witherwise with the City had usually been disquieted: diffension at home, and war abroad.

E. When M. Aemilius and C. Valerius Paetus were Consuls, the Aquanitians made preparation for war, and banded with the Volsciars. Who albeit they took arms by no publick commision: yet such as would of themselves serve for hire or wages, followed the Wars. At the bruit of which enemies (for they were already come over into the Country of the Latins and Hernicks) whilsts Valerius the Conul murthered his men and levied fouldiers: M. Mettius a Tribun of the Commons, and a publisher of the Agrarian laws, opposed himself against him, And when as by reason of the protection and assistance of the Tribun, no man would be compelled to take a fouldiers oath against his will: suddenly news came, that the Cattle of Corvinus was by the enemies forced. This ditiono thus receiv'd, as it was a canse that Memenius was hated among the Noblemen, so it gave to the rest of the Tribuns, who were already framed and prepared to withstnd and the law Appurting more just cause to reitit their college. The matter being thus for a long time prostrated by much debating, the Consuls called both God and man to wittness, that whatsoever flame or lobs, either had been already received, or were like to be fustinied by the enemies: the blame should be imputed to Memenius, who hindered the murthering. And Memenius profetted again aloud, that if the unlawful Landlords, would surrender the tenure of the common fields which they unjustly detained, he would not stay the matter. Then the nine Tribuns, by letting down a decree between them, made an end of the iticte: and pronounced by authority of their college, that they would affit C. Valerius the Conul (all contradiction of their college notwithstanding) to award any penalty redtire or chastisement, upon them that refused to be enrolled for warfare. The Conul, being armed with this decree and warrant after he had called some few to be had away by the neck and laid taft, that called upon the Tribun for help: the rest for fear were sworn to serve. Thus the army was led forth to the Cattle of Corvinus. And although the fouldiers were as odious to the Conul, as wickedly bent against him, yet at the very first coming, having manfully and judiciously disposed the garrison, they recovered the fort. The fouldiers who were flipt away from the hold, and

F. were plundered, by their negligence gave the Romans an opportunity to enter and to surprize it. A good boost there was: by reason that they had continually gotten prizes, and laid up all there at in a place of forste, Which being told in portale the Conul commanded the treaures for to bring the money into the common Chamber of the City: giving out their words withall, that the army should then have part of spoil, when they denied not their service in war. Hereupon both Commons and fouldiers were more angry with the Conul, And therefore when as by a decree of the Senate he entered the City Octavius in a petty triumph, the fouldiers according to their licencions manner (in that case permitted) followed after with songs and sonnets, answering one another in rude time and go as meter by alternatve dates. Wherein the Conul was greatly bali'd, but Memenius the Tribun, his name was set out to the height his praises were bestowed and extoll'd: and at every time that he was named the affectionate favour of the people that blow in the streets appeared, by clapping of hands and great appluim driving much to exceed the songs chant by the fouldiers. Which caused the Nobles to look to it, and troubled them more than the miscapt fouldiers of the fouldiers with their Conuls, which is an ordinary and usual faction among them. And Memenius (who doubted has been one of the Military Tribuns, if he had done so) was excluded from that dignity by an Election of Conuls. So there were created

G. Conuls, C. Cornelius Coëtius, and C. Furius Medullus the second time.

H. Never took he Com, the matter more to the heart, that the Election of Tribuns escaped their hands:
hands: which grief of theirs in the Election of Quelteors, they both shewed and revenged. For this was the hilt time that the Quelteors were made of the commonalty: so that in chusing of them, there was but one place left for C. Fabius Ambivius, a Nobleman: and 3 of the commonalty, Q. Silvius, P. Aulus, and P. Pipius, were preferred before young Gentlemen, of most noble houses. I find that the periwaders of the people to use their full liberty in behoving their voyces, were the three Iedij, (deceded of that house, which ever was most militantly bent against the Nobles) who were for that year chosen Tribuns of the commonalty, and possell the peoples heads with a world of great matters; after which they gaped greedily: but so, as they flily gave out and said, They would not sit at all, if the people had not courage enough, so much as in the election of Quelteors, which only the Senat had left indifferent to the commonalty and Nobility, to effect that which so long they had desired, and now by law was warrant. Thus the Commons assur'd themselves hereby of a mighty great victory: and esteemed not the dignity of Quelteorship to be the end and type of honor, but that thereby they seemed to have made a way and overturer for new riten upraters, to be advanced to Conulfips and triumphs. The Nobles contrary-wise, formed not for that their dignities were made common and imparted to other: but for the utter losse thereof: protesting that if things went so on end, they would neither get, nor bring up children any more; who being put from their Anceftors place, and seeing others in possession of their dignity should be disabled for bearing rule and authority in the State, and be good for nothing but only to be made Priests for Mars, and Flamines for Jupiter, employed about nothing else but to sacrifice (foresoth) for the people. Thus on both parts were their minds netsed and provoked, K whilsts the Commons took heart, and had three champions of great reputation to back them, and maintain their caufe: and the Nobles, seeing all would prove like to the Quelteors Election (if it lay in the peoples choice) addressed themselves to the Election of Conuls, which as yet was not so free, and indifferent both for Commons and Nobles. Contrary-wise, the Iedij persifled still, and urged the point, that in any hand Tribuns Military shou'd and must be created. For now it was more thanhtime that the Commons had their part in offices of State. But no Action hither to belonging to the offices and charge of the Conuls had been presentned unto them, by the hinder-whereof they might wring from them, that which they defired and fought for. But foon, how even then, in wonderful good opportunity, word was brought that the Volscians and Equians were depart'd out of their own Conulfips, and made an expedition into the Latin pale for to rob L and spoil. To the which war, when as by vertue of an order from the Senat, the Conuls began to mutter: the Tribuns laboured tooth and nail to hinder it: giving out that this occurrence contum't happily on their sides and the Commons. Three there were of them, and all most quick, active and courageous men: yea (and for commoners) of good birth, and worshipfully defend'd. Whereof twain took in hand, by their continual travel to attend and watch the Conuls, to work them awork, and either of them to hold one occupied: the third, was appoinst to entertain the commonalty: and in all assemblies, with their Orations, one whilsts to rein them in, another whilst to give them the head, as occasion required. But all this whilst, neither Conuls went through with the mutters, nor the Tribuns with the election which they defired. But afterwards when fortune began to incline to the Commons side, Messengers came with news, that whilsts the fouldiers that M lay in gaftion at the Castle Cornuenta, were flept aside to get a bootie, the Equians having flain a few warders that kept the hold, entred it: and that all the fouldiers were flain: some as they ran into the fort again, others as they were scattered in the fields. This thing falling out so crofs agaft the whole State, gave strength yet unto the engagements of the Tribuns. For being dealt withal, that now at length they would scarce from hindering the war, nothing would prevail: for that they neither gave place to the publick calamity and necessity, nor yet regarded their own private peril of displeasure: and they obtained in the end that an Act of Senat was granted for to chuse Tribuns Military. Howbeit with this extreme proviso, it was capitulat'd: That none of them who had been Tribuns that year of the Commons, should be eligible and propelled: no, nor chosen again Tribuns of the Commons for the year following. Whereby no doubt, the Senat N noted and pointed out the Iedij, whom they charged to seek to be Conuls, for a reward of their feditious Tribunsip. Then went the muttering forward, and preparation of war, by content of all the States.

Sunday Authors write diversly and make doubt, whether both the Conuls went to the Castle Cornuenta or whether one of them stayed behind in the City for to hold the foresaid Election. In this they disagree not, but set down for certain: that when they had assailed the Castle a long time without effect, they were compelled from thence to remove: and that Verruca in the Country of the Volscians by the same army was recovered, and that great forraging there was, and driving of booties both in the Country of the Equians and also of the Volscians. Now at Rome, as the victors of the commonalty refid'd in this, that they had the Election which they desired: so in the issue and success of the Election, the Nobles had the better. For besides all mens hope and expectation there were three Tribuns Military chosen with Conuls authority, all of the Nobility, C. Fulvus, Tullius, Cn. Cornelius Cn. Servilius, and C. Servilius, Holo. Men lay that the Nobles used a subtile practic and cunning device, which even then the Iedij charged them with: to wit, that by inter-mingling a many of unworthy and accost competitors with others of mark and quality, they had alienated the peoples hearts from the commoners, seeing them to be men of no worth, and loathing the notable balance that appeared in their persons.
After this, tidings came, that the Volscians and Equians were it that the Cattle of Carnuntus which they held and guarded till, put them into some hope: or their garrison and fort lost at Veramo drove them into anger were up in arms, with alliance ready to make war: that the Antias were the principal and chief in this intended action: that their Embassadors had solicited the people of both nations, rebulking their cowardize, for keeping within their walls, and fulfilling the Romans the year before, to forrage and drive booties in their territories, and the garrison of Veramo to be surprised and lost. Moreover, that not only hosts of armed men were sent against them, but Colonies also were planted in their frontiers and marches: and that the Romans not content to divide their lands and goods among themselves, had bellowed upon the Hernks.

The town Fercinum, which they had won from them. At these.-- speeches they were kindled and set on fire: and in all places whither they went to solicit, the younger and able men in great number were levied. So the youth and manhood of all those nations, gathered together to Antium, where they encamped themselves, and expected the enemy. Which tidings being brought to Rome, caused more fear then need was. And the Senate presently (which in all fearful occurrences was ever their last remedy and refuge) gave order that a Dictator should be created. Which thing Julius and Cornelius, two military Tribuns (they say) took in great displeasure. And hereof enlivened much heart-burning and distention, whiles the L. of the Senat of one side complained in vain of their grievances. That the Tribuns Military would not be ordered by the authority of the Senat: and at the last had recourse to the Tribunes of the Commons for helping withal that the very

C. Consuls power upon the like occasion had been by their authority overruled and fet down. And the Tribunes of the Commons on the other side, rejoicing at the discord of the Senators, made answer again, and said, "That for their parts, they were not able to yield any account at all, who were of no reckoning themselves, being reputed neither in the roll of Citizens, nor yet so much as in the number of men. But if so be (say they) dignities and honors were communicated to us, then would we provide and take order, that by no pride of any magistrate whatsoever, the Senators decrees should be made fruitless and disabled. And in the mean whiles, seeing the Nobles were exempt from all reverence of laws, and regard of magistrates, let them of themselves also execute the Tribunes authority if they would. This discord falling out so unhappily, when so great war was in hand, occupied and poffed men heads a long time: whiles Julius and Cornelius had one after another, thus reasoned and discoursed: That seeing they themselves were Captains good enough for the conduct of such a war, it was not meet that the honour once bestowed upon them by the people, should be made void and taken from them. Then Servilius Hula, who also was a Tribuni Military spoke and said: "I have been silent thus long, not for that I was doubting full in mine opinion, or to seek what to say. (For what good Citizen (quoth he) would have his advice by himself, and go from the publick Council?) but because I had rather, that my brethren of their own accord should give place to the Senators authority, than to suffer the Tribunes power to be called for, against them. And even now also, if the case would permit, I would willingly give them time and space to retract their too obstinate, pervertive and peremptory opinion, But seeing that the necessities of war, wait not upon human counsel, I will have more respect and consideration of the Weal-publick, than of the favor of my brethren. Whrfore, if the Senate permit ill of that mind and resoloution of theirs, I will the next night following nominate a Dictator. And if any one withstand me in this, I will ask no more, than the power and vertue of the Senators. At which speech of his, having won desired praise and thanks of all men, he declared Publius Cornelius Dictator, and was himself by him nominated General of the horsem en. A singular example to teach as many as beheld him and his Colleagues, That otherwheres favour and honor soonest fall to them that least desire the fame. The war was small and nothing memorable, but in one cafe and flight battel were the enemies overthrown and slain at Antium. The army upon this victory went to the Volscian Country, won by force the Castle upon the lake Fucinum, and within it took three thousand prisoners: having chased all the rest of the Volscians within their walls, not able to keep their frontiers. The Dictator, after he had performed this war in such fort, as only he might not seem to neglect his wanted fortune but keep it still in ure, returned into the City with greater felicity than glory, and resigned up his place.

The Tribunes Military, making no words at all of the chusing of Consuls (for anger, I suppose, that a Dictator had been created published the election of Tribunes Military. But then the Senators were in greater care and perplexity, seeing their cause betrayed even by rofe of their own company, Wherefore, as in the former war, by foiling in the battle of the Commons for competitors: they had caused even men of good worth to be deposed: so, now by procuring the principal of the Nobility, both for honour and for favour, roft and for the dignity, they obtained all the places to themselves: so as no one Commoner could be chosen. So there were created four, who all having been born that Magistracy, L. Furius Medullinus, C. Flaminius Patinus, Cn. Publius Volumnius, and C. Servilius Hula. This man was chosen again to the place, as well in regard of other vertues and worthy parts; as for the late favour which he won by his rare moderation, and singular carriage of himself.

In that year, for as much as the time of truce with the Veientian Nation was expired, they began by Embassadors and Heralds of Arms to challenge of them amends and restitutio, Whom as they entered into their territory, the Embassage of the Veientians encountered in the way requiring them not to go forward to Veii, before they had presented themselves to the Senat of Rome, Who Who being thither come, obtained of the Senate, that for as much as the Veientians were civil discord among themselves, they would not claim any amends at their hands. Lo, how far they were from seeking their own vantage by other men's diftreets and calamity. Also at the Volscians hands they intimated damage by los of their garrison at Verrucia. But (see what a thing it is to lack the time) for whereas the fooldiers betraied there, by the Volscians and fending for aid in due time, might have been reltued if speed had been made, the army which was sent for succour, came too short, and after the fray was ended. Only this expiit they trie: The enemies, who after their fierce massacre committed upon the garrison, were gone abroad dragging for to rafe booties, were by them overtaken and put to the sword. The caufe of this flackness was imputed to the Senate, rather than the fooverain Tribuns: who because intelligence was given, that they in the garrison refuffled and defended themselves most manfully, little considered, That there is no prowess of man whatsoever, but by valour again it may be overmatched. Most brave and valiant fooldiers they, that neither whiles they lived, nor after death were unrencarded.

The year following, when P. and Cornelius both innamed Cofius, C. Fabius, Ambrosius and L. Valerius Potterus were Tribuns Military in Consuls authority, began the Veientian war by occasion of a proud and arrogant answer returned by the Senate of the Veientians: Who commanded that the Embassadors which came to claim amends, should take this for their dispatch: That unless they departed preently out of the City and Country, they would serve them as Latys Tolosannus had done others before. The Senators of Rome hardly could digest that: and therefore decreed, K that the Military Tribuns should propose unto the people as speedily as might be, even the day before to morrow, concerning proclamation of open war, and fending defiance to the Veientians. Which as soon as ever it was noised and publifhed, the younger fort and men of service, murthered and muttered in this manner: "That as yet they had not fully ended the war with the Volsci ans: that even of late two whole garrisons were lost, and their throats cut, and the fores kept still with danger and great hazard. There is not (say they) a year pasteth over our heads, but one field or other is fought: and as if we had not work and trouble enough already, there was now intended new war with a most mighty nation confining upon us, and which was like enough to raife against us all Hainstorm. And as they were forward enough of themselves to conceive thus, and utter these speeches, so the Tribuns of the Commons were not behind to buzze more matters into their heads, and set all on a light fire: Who gave out till, That when all was done, the greatest warring was between the Nobles and Commons: and that the Commons on purpose were to be oilted out with travel or warfare, and expos'd to the enemies for to be murdered: and that they were to be kept far off from the City, and as it were confined and sent out of the way: left by being quiet at home, and minding their freedom and Colonies, they should confult and devile, both how to dispose of the common grounds, and to give their voices freely. And ever as they could meet with any old beaten fooldiers, they would hold them with talk, take them by their hands, reckon up how many years they had done service in war, fall to telling of their gashes and scars, asking them what whole place they had left in their bodies to receive new wounds, and what blood was behind to spend and flied, in the quarter of the M Common-wealt? When as by iterating these and fuchlike speeches, both in their private talk and conference, and other whiles in their publick assemblies, they had turned clean away the hearts of the Commonalty from taking war in hand: the forefaid A\ had propos'd, was put off until a farther day, and lay till for the time. Which no doubt, had been nipt in the head, and never would have paff'd farther, in cafe it had been referred and Subject to the hard opinion and conceit of men, as then they fliould have affefled. In the mean whiles agreed it was, that the military Tribuns should conduct an army into the Volscian country. Cn. Cornelius alone was left at Rome. The three Tribuns, after that they perceived the Volscians in no place encamped, and nothing minded to try a battell, parted themselves three ways to waft and foare the frontiers. Valerius he marched to Antium, Cornelius to Ecerce. And every way as they went, they spoiled all before them, both houle and field, and all to amuie & keep the Volscians occupied that way, But Fabius without any forgattering at all, came directly to affault Anxur, which was the service most defir'd. Now Anxur was that, which at this day is called Taracina, a City leated upon mountains. And on that fide Fabius made them of affault. But there were four cohorts under the leading of C. Servilius Hala sent out to fetch a compass: who having gained the hill that over-looketh and commandeth the town, from that higher ground, with a mighty flame and outcry assaile the wall, where it was dismiffed of guard to defend it. At which fudden alarm, they were amaz'd who manned the wall of the baie towne against Fabius: and forfear'd them to fet ladders to, and to scale. By which means every place was full of enemies. And upon the walls for a good while there was nothing but killing as well thole that flied, as thole that refi'd armed and unarmed, one with another. So that, albeit they were too weake, yet forced were they to flioe: because in yeilding they saw no way but one. But upon proclamation once made that none but armed men fliould be killed, all the multitude besides willingly were diffarm'd. Of which number there were upon 25000, taken alive. From the faccage Fabius kept the fooldiers, until his Colleague were come: faying, that Anxur was taken as well by thole armies, which had driven away the reft of the Volscians from the deience of that place, as by themfelves. Who being come, the three armies jointly raf-facked it, & had the pillage for their labor of that rich towne, that had gathered wealth a long time.

Which
A Which courtesies and bountifulness of the commanders, was the first thing that reconciled Commons and Nobles together. Over and besides this munificence of the Rulers, the Nobles also began in a moit happy hour to be liberal unto the multitude. For before that either the Commons or Tribunes made the motion, the Senate decreed, that soldiers might have their pay out of the City chamber; whereas before that time, every man in that service had borne his own charges. Next was there any thing, by report, so joyfully accepted of the Commons: who ran by heaps together to the Council house: took the Senators by the hands as they came forth, and laid their hands upon them. They were now truly called Patres. Fathers, confessing that now the day was come, that in the quarter of to bounteons a City, there was no man would so long, as his breath lasted, spaire either their limb or life. Seeing that this commodity they should have to help them, namely, that during the time that their bodies were employed, and busy occupied in the defense of Commons, well, their private estate should stand at one yet, and not decay. And forasmuch as it came of themselves, and never moved by any of the Tribunes of the Commons, nor called for and carried, it had, intrusted, by their important speeches, that was in, that multiplied their joy and made the boon itself much more acceptable. But the Tribunes of the Commons (who only had for their part in this common joy and concord of all States) came in with their opinion, and said, that it would not prove so joyous and happy to the Nobles in general, as they supposed: that this concord and order taken, was at the first sight better then it would be found in the public order and execution. For how could that money possibly be made and raised but by levying a trible or payment of the people? they were therefore liberal; but of other men's purses. But admit, or say, that the rent would bear it; yet thence neither could not would endure it, who were past war-service, and lived upon their pensions and annual salary: who would grudge and repine, that others hereafter should serve in war for more gain, then they had in their time done; who having been charged with the pay of their own service, should now again be put to contribute to the wages of others. With these words they moved part of the Commons. Lai of all, when there was a levy exacted, the Tribunes also proclaimed, that they would bear as many out, as would not contribute to the soldiers pay. The Nobles continued still to maintain that which they had well begun, and were the first that opened their purse, and for that as yet they had no silver coin: some of them carried gross pieces of brass in Wains to the treasure house, and made a goodly show of Contribution. When as the Nobles had most faithfully paid according to the rate of their wealth, the chief of the Commons also, friends of the Nobility, as it was afore agreed, began to lay their penny to theirs: whom when the common form was both to be committed of the Nobles, and to be admired and reverence of the soldiers as good Citizens: they all upon a sudden, relating the Tribunes assistance, began to strive who should pay first, And the decree or act being once passed, of proclaiming war against the Veientians, the new Tribunes Military led an army to Rome, conferring much upon voluntary soldiers. Now the Tribunes were T. Quinctius Cincinnatus, P. Quintius Cincinnatus, C. Julius Tullus the second time, A. M. Decius, L. Furinis Medallanus the third time, and M. Renthia Mancus. And there were the first that besieged Fies.

B About the beginning of which siege, when the Tusciens held a Counsel in a column affinely at the Temple of Vesta, they could hardly agree upon this point. Whether the Veientians should be defended by general war of the whole Nation, or no. The year following was the siege not so hot, by reason that some of the Tribunes, and part of the Commons were called away to the Volscian war. The Tribunes Military in Coll. authority, that year were: C. Varrus Post in the third time, M. Sertinius Fidenus, P. Cornelius Malogimus, C. Cornelius Costus, C. Fabius Ambulfus, Sp. Nautilus Rutilius the second time. With the Volscians there was a right field fought between Fercusnianus and Ecariscus wherein the Romans had the day. Then the Tribunes began to lay siege to Artena a Town of the Volscians where, by reason of a falling forth by them attempted the enemies were driven back into the town, and the Romans took occasion and vantage thereby. To break in with them well mellow, and so they won all, live only the Castile. Into this fort naturally fenced, a good company of armed men betook themselves: but beneath the Castile, many a man was either slain or taken prisoner. Afterwards was the fortress besieged also. Neither could it by assent be forced, for that there was a guard sufficient to man it, considering the bigness of the place; nor gave the assailants any hope of yielding, for before the town was lost, they had conveyed all their publick booth of corn into the Castile. So that the Romans had for very weariness men departed from thence; but that a boldmam betrayed it unto them: who let in certaine soldiers at a steep high place, and thence they won the fortresses: for when the warders were by the Castile itself, the rest of the multitude with hidden sight were soon overcome, and yielded. Thus, when both the Castile and town of Artena was sacked and spoiled, the legions we C brought back from the Volscians, and all the Romans power employed against Fies. To the traitor aforesaid, there was given besides liberty, the pilage of two households for a reward. And he was named ever after Servilius Romanus. There be that think Artena was a town of the Veientians, and not of the Volscians; the occasion of which error is, for that there was a town of that name between Core and Fies. But that town the Roman Kings destroyed: and it belonged to the Corees. And not to the Veientians: but this other, whereof we have reported the destruction, was in the country of the Volscians.
The Fifth Book of T. Livius.

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Flavius upon the fifth Book.

The siege of Veii, the soldiers had made them for to winter in. Which being a new kind of service, struck a blow in the Tribunes of the Commons, who complained that they had no rest from wasp's fire, so much as in the winter season. The security of Rome began first to serve upon their own houses, when the Alban lake overflowed, a certain Prophet or Wizard was taken captive from the enemies, who could interpret that strange wonder. Furius Camillus, after ten years' siege, now Veii: he translated the image of Juno from the temple to Rome. The tenth part of the spoil and usury he gave to Apollo, the same Camillus being Tribunus militaris, whilst he laid siege unto the Faliscus, sent back again to their parents, their enemies that were betrayed unto him: Whereupon the Faliscus yielded themselves, and so by his righteous and just dealing, obtained victory over them. When one of the Consuls C. Julius was deceased, M. Cornelius was substituted in his place. Which was never done again afterwards, because in that five years' space, Rome was taken by the Gauls. Furius Camillus, being induced by L. Apuleius a Tribunus of the Commons, departed into exile. When as the Senate a people of the Gauls, besieged Cæcinius, and the Embassadors sent from the Senate to conclude a peace between them, and the Clusii, fought themselves in person against the Gauls in the Clusii the camp. The Senators hereupon made quarter, and with a cruel army came against the City of Rome: and after they had defeated the Romans at the river Allia, they were Masters of the City, all but the Capitol, into which the able and serviceable young men of the City took themselves. The elders with their ornaments of state belonging to the office that each one had born, they now sitting in the porches and turaries of their houses. And when they were now gotten up to the top of the Capitol, by the back side of the hill, they were dispowered by the gogling of Geese, and were turned downwards, principally by the valor of M. Manlius. Afterwards when through famine the Romans were forced to covenant and grant for to give them the sum of 1000. pound weight of gold, and for that to buy their redemption from the siege: Furius Camillus, who was created Dictator in his absence, came with an army, while the gold was in weighing: and drove L. the Gauls out of the City, after they had been perplexed of it six months, and killed them. A chapel was built to Locutius: in that place where before the taking of the City, there was a wise heard, that the Gauls were coming. Wherein it was purposed and propounded to remove to Veii, because the City of Rome was burnt and razed: that cause by the advice and authority of Camillus was crossed and dispatched. The people was moved there to the rather, by occasion of the Custom by a Centurion, who being come with his band of soldiers into the Forum, was heard to say thus, Stand Souldiers, here will be our best abiding place.

The fifth Book of T. Livius.

When peace elsewhere was obtained, the Romans and Veientes were at war, with such mutual malice and hatred: that it seemed, whether part were vanquished, should come to final destruction. The assembles the election of the Rulers of both Nations, far differed one from the other. The Romans augmented the number of Tribunes Military in Consulis authority, for eight of them (so as not as fore) were created: M. Annius Mancinus the second time, L. Valerius Pisonis the third time, Ap. Claudius Crassus, M. Quinctius Varus, M. Julius Titius, M. Poppilium, M. Furius Camillus, and M. Poppilium Allius. The Veientes contrariwise, being weary of suing for dignities every year (a cause sometime of civil discord) made themselves a King. Which offended the people of Horatia: who as they abhorred all regal government, so they hated the person of the King N him. He had aforetime oppressed that nation, in regard of his grandees and pride withall: in that he had violently put down their solemn plays, the intermission whereof was held unlawful and deceptable. For upon a time, in an anger that he received a reprooch, and by the sufferages of the twelve Nations, another was preferred before him to be the high Priest, in the very midst of their solemn Games and sports, he took from them the very Players and Actors, wherof a great part were his own servants. That people therefore given to superstition above all others, and so much the rather for that they excelled in the skill of religious observing the same, decreed to deny the Veientes their aid, so long as they were governed under a King. This decree was suppressed and not spoken of at Veii, for fear of the King, who would have perished himself in that cursed rumor, for a lower of sedition, rather then an author of news. The Romans, albeit they heard that all was quiet from Horatia, yet because they were advertised that in all the Dictors and Councills of that Nation, the question was on foot and much debated, made their fortifications at Veii, so as they should not two ways: some looked towards the City against allaliess and eruptions of the townsmen, others towards Horatia, to stop all insurgenctes that haply might come from thence. But the Roman Captains having greater hope in long siege, then in quick assault, began to build wintering harbours (a strange thing to Roman Souldiers.) Their intent was all winter time to keep continual war. Which after it was told at Rome, to the Tribunes of the Commons.

A Commons (whonow a long time could find no matter and occasion of troubles and alteration) they leapt forth into the assembly of the people,ounding and inciting the minds of the Commons, and ostenoting, "That this was the only matter, why a let pay was appointed for the foundlers: and that they were not ignorant, that the gifts of enemies would prove to be belineared with poison: That the freedom of the Commons was bought and sold: That their young men were left away far off, and as it were banished from the City and Common wealth, so that now they had not so much spare time as winter nor any leaon elie of the year, for to visit home and see into their estate. What think ye (say they) is the case of continuing this warre? No other verily should they find it but this, left by reason of the frequent number of those young men, in whom the whole strength of the Commoity consisted, there might be something dealt in, and effected, concerning their commodities. Over and above they complained how they were much more hardly used, then the Venetians. For as for them they spent the winter within their own houses, defending their City, fortified both with good walls, and also by natural situation of the place, but the Roman foundlers abode by it full in labour and travel, thronged under booths of poor hides, overwhelmed with snows and Moles, not laying away their harness and weapons so much as in winter: the ordinary time of retreat from all wars both by land and sea. This manner of hard bondage neither the Kings, nor those proud and imperious Conuls (before the Tribuns authority was ordained to take them down) nor yet the Lordly ruling Dictators nor the insolent and unpitiable Decemvirs, ever empipt them to dwell in continual foundleries, as these Tribuns Military do: who execute upon the Commons of Rome, an abitute and kingly authority. What would they do another day, when they were Conuls or Dictators indeed, who now but representing only the Conuls government (as Vice-Conuls) are so cruel and unreasona: But we are well enough served, and justly have decreed no leas. For that was not so much as one place for a Commoner amongst eight Tribuns. Afore time, the Nobles were wont with much labour and toil, to fill but three rooms: and now they go eight or nine a rank together, to obtain all charges and dignities of State and Government; and in that thong, a Commoner cannot have a place amongst them, to put his Colleagues in mind (if he did nothing else) that they that go to warre were free men yet, and Citizens with them, and not bondilaves. Who in winter at the leat, ought to be brought again to their houses and homes, and once a year visit their loving parents, their sweet children, and bel beloved wives: to make some use of their liberty, and chafe their Magistrates: These and such like speeches, while they boldly uttered and multiplied, they met at length with an adversary that was able to match them, Appius Claudius, left for the purpose at home by his brethren in office, to restraine the Tribuns seditions: a man ever from his tender youth trained up in the broils and contentions of the Commons, Who certain years before (as we have said) gave shrewd and unhappy counsel to dissolve and put down the Tribuns authority, by the contradiction and inhibition of their own Colleagues. This man being not only in wit prompt and ready, but also exercised by long practice, made at that time this or such like speech: If ever double were made, O Quirits, whether the Tribuns of the Commonalty have for love of your good or their own particular vantage, been always the authors and beginnings of discord and dissension, this year I know assuredly, ye need no more stand in doubt. And as I rejoice ye are at length come to an end of this your long wandering, so I congratulate both you, and the Common-wealth for your sake, that this error is cleared, and especially in the midst of your prosperity. Is there any man makes question now, that the Tribunes of the Commons were not offended, nor took much at the injuries at your hands received (if it have there been sometimes been any) as at the bounty of the Nobles, towards the Commons, in allowing pay to those that serve in war: What think ye elie either they feared then, or would at this day disturb and disquiet but only the concord and agreement of the States? Which they suppose tending moh, and is insufficient, to abolish and overthrow the Tribuns authority. And verily, as noughtly Artifians or lewd leeches, seek for work full, and would be ever doing: so they likewise desire to have something or other out of frame and amiss, in the Commonweal, that to the repair and cure thereof, they might be ever sent for and employed: Fo whether do ye (and speak truth) maintain or impugne the Commonalty? Are you the adversaries or the advocates of that serve in the wars? Unless peradventure this be your laying, Whatsoever the Nobles do, it milliketh us be it for the good of the common people, or to the prejudice and damage. And even as matters forbid their own servants and slaves, to have any dealing at all with strangers, and think it meet and reason, that they medle neither hot nor cold with them: even so forewarn ye the Nobles from all commerce and entertainment with the Commons: to the end, that neither we by our courtsey and liberalitie, should allure and win them: nor they again become dutiful and obedient to us. How much more ought you (I pray you) if there were any spark (I say not of civility, but of common humanitie and good nature in you, rather to favour, and as much as lieth in you, foster and cherish, as well the gracious kindness of the Nobles, as the willing service and obedience of the Commons? Which accord, if it were perpetual, who would not undertake to warrant, that this Sciterny and Empire within a while, might prove the mightiest and most renowned of all those States that border hard upon our confines? As for this purpose intended and plot devised by my Colleagues, whereby they would not have the army withdrawn away from the siege of Veii, before the service were brought to an end.

The Oration of App. Claudius.

For this time, I lift rather to and speak of the present condition and state of theire, that are employed there in warfare, which Oration of mine, if it were pronounced, not before you only, but also in the camp, and there canaided and framed of, by the very army it self; I suppose, would seem equal, and be received for good and reasonable, Wherein, if nothing else should come into my head to speak, I would content my self, and rest satisfied with the only speeches given out by the very adversaries. They said of late, That pay was not to be allowed to the fouldiers, for that never before it had been allowed. How then can they now be offended, and to make content, if they who have some new commodity coming to them, be enjoined also new labour proportionably? For never lightly is there travel any where without gain, norgain commonly. I fay without travel and employment, pains and pleasure, things of themselves in nature un-likely, yet by a natural kind of society I know not how) are linked together. The fouldier's former time) thought much to betow his labour and service upon the Common-wealth, at his own pro-\ner charges; yet was he glad with all his heart, that one part of the year, he might look to home, husband his land, and get maintenance to find himself and his, both at home in City and abroad in war. Now, taking his contentment, and is well pleased, that the Common-wealth is gainful to him; and with joyful heart receiveth his wages. Let him likewise be content, with patience to forbear his house and family (since he is at no great charge) somewhat longer than ordinary. Might not the Common-wealth, if she would call him to a reckoning, jujly say: Yearly pay thou half, perform therfore thy yearly service? Dost thou think it reason, to receive full \K wages for the whole year? and to be employed but six months for it? Much against my froom, O Quirites, enforce this point, and dwell still in this one part of my Oration: for in this wife ought they to reason that have mer-ecenary and hired fouldiers, but with us we will use them as fellow Citizens, and think it meet likewise that they entertain him kindly, and speak unto us as to their native Country. Either it behoved us, not to have begun the war at all; or else to proceed forward, now it is begun: yea, and for the honour of the people of Rome, to finish it with all speed possible. And finished it will be, if we pres upon our enemies thus befieged: if we depart not afore we have accomplished our hope, by the winning of Veii. And surely, if there were no other cause but this, even the very flame and indignity of the things, might force us to continue siege unto the end. In old time the whole power of Greece laid siege full ten years to one City, and that for one only woman: How far (good god) from their own home, how many lands and seas between? Are we then loth and weary being within 200 miles of our dwell-\ing place, and almost in the sight of our own City, to endure the toil of one year siege? Be-cause (for looth) we have but small caite given us to war: and not griefs enough that might jucly provoke us to abide and see the end. Seven times already they have rebelled: In peace they never were true, Our Country have they spoiled and wasted a thousand times. The Fide-\nats they have caufed to revolt from us. Our inhabitants there by us placed, they have flain; and against all law of nations they were the principal insturments of that unworthy and unhuma:-\n murder of our Embassadors, All Hetruria would they have railed up against us, and at this day about it they go, And when our Embassadors came to demand amends, they had like to have run upon them and killed them. And ought we then with thefe kind of men to fland at a bay and to war coldly and by leisure? But if we will be enmity as this cause us not: do these things (I pray you) not enmity move you neither? Their City is environed and beleaguered with deep trenches: blocked with mighty entrenchments, whereby the enemy is pent up and pinned within his own walls. His fields he cannot till, and what so ever was afore till'd, hath been destroyed by war. If we disloge and withdraw our army back, who doubteth, but that they (not for desife only of revenge but upon necessity also and constraint to prey of other mens goods, having left their own) will invade and overrun our country? So that by this means we deare not the war, but bring it within our own borders and confines. But now as touching that which properly indeed concerneth fouldiers (of whom our good Tribuns of the Commons would now in all N\the halfe seem to have no great regard, from whom erewhile they would have wreted their wa-\ges:) but what is that (Ifay?) A trench they have cut, a rampart and platform they have raised, (matters of exceeding travel and labour) so far about: entrenches at the first a few, but after as their army encreased, they have crested very thick in every place. Forts they have built, not only to command the town, but also looking toward Hetruria, to impeach any relief, if any aid should from thence come, What should I speak of the rolling frames and towers, the man-\tiles and other Fabricks? What should I speak of the Tarraces, Tortoises, Rams, and all other engines of assault and battery? Think ye it meet, that after so great toil and pains taken, now that the works at length are brought to an end, these things should be left and abandoned, that against summer should we be nee to begin again, and sweate after the fame? How O match less travail rather is it to keep these munitions already made? to be instante, and constant to endure, and abide? yea, and to rid our hands of all the care at once? For Surely we may soon dispatch the service, if it be plied throughly and followed on till without fail: and if we ourselves by these interminations and refpetts between, make not a long piece of work of it, and draw our hope at length. Thus much of the labour and loss of time. What else? Considering thefe to many Parliaments, these Diets and Concles continually in Tuscany, about sending aid to Veii, can we forget the danger that we incur by deferring the War? Indeed (as things now A "now presently stand] I confess the Tusculans with the Veientians are angry, they hate them and deny to lend: and for any thing they do, we might win Veii out of hand. But who dare courage, that if the war be delayed, they will hereafter be of the same mind? Seeing that if the Veientians have any reit and breathing time given them, they are like to lend other their Em-blages, and those more honourable than heretofore. Also the King who newly is set up and created at Veii (the only thing that now offendeth the Tusculans) in proëts of time, may be changed for another governor, either by agreement of the State (thereby to reconcile the hearts of the Tusculans) or of his own accord who will not peradventure that his princely regiment should be hurtful to the safety of his subjects. See how many things, how many inconveniences follow and ensue upon that course and manner of proceeding. The loss of the fabric and fortifications, with so great labour already prepared and achieved: the imminent and present waiting our own borders: the Tusculans war instead of the Veientians. These your devices, O ye Trib-uns, are much what like to his, that offering a sick man some kind of meat or drink, for the very present to gratifie him withal, to please his palat and to content his tale, maketh his discase, long, and peradventure incurable: who might have been recovered out of hand, in case at once he would have resolutely endured the rightcure of a skillful Phyitian. And truly, it was not material to the managing of this war in hand, yet would it import much to martial discipline, that our fouldiers should be acquainted, not only with the sweet smell of a victory achieved, but also if occasion required longer time, to abide this tediousness: and to wait for the end of their hope, be lieve not to long: and if war be not finished in summer, to stay for winter: and not as summer birds by and by in the fall of the leaf, to look about and seek for houting, harbour, and covert. Consider, I beseech you, and live. The love and pleasure of hunting carrieth men into mountains, woods and forrests; through frosts and snow, after ther game: shall not we then use the like inherence in the needful exploits of war, which patimes sports, and delights, are wont to draw and catch out of us? Think ye the bodies of our fouldiers to effeminate, their hearts to tender and delicate, that they cannot for one winter abide in a camp, and forbear their home, but must needs war as men at sea, watching times and feasons, and observing the quarters of the year? Cannot they endure both parching heat and chilling cold? They would breathe and be abashed very, if a man should therewith charge them and they would stand stiffly D in this, and avouch. That they had both in body and mind manlike inherence and patience: that they were fouldiers as well for winter as summer: and that they let not the Tribuns awork for any patronage of cowardice and shelter of idleness: but remembered well enough, that their forefathers were not underlade for fear of fun-burning, nor had their honles over their heads for taking cold, when they first created and ordained that magistracy of Tribuns. This rather is beleeming the valour of your fouldiers; this fitteth well the name of Romans, not to have their eye upon Veii only, and this warren in hand, but to seek for fame and glory both by other exploits, and also with other nations in time to come. And think ye that there would ensue hereupon a small crack of credit, and hazard of reputation? Would ye have the neighbor nations confining upon us, conceive this of the people of Rome: That's a City could receive their E first breath, and abide their affiance for a very small while, it need not after to fear any more: Or rather should not this dread and terror of our name spread all abroad, both far and near. That no wearisomeness of long siege and affiue, no violence of bitter winter, is able to raiie the Roman army from any town once by them invested? as knowing no other end of war but victory? and whole manner of services not by way of violent force more then of obline continance, which (in all other military occasions) to in behing of Cities is most needful: the greatest number whereof, being either by strong bulwarks and other fortifications, or by natural situation impregnable, yet by famine, by hunger and thirst, proceed and tract of time only doth force and overthrow. As it will (I doubt not) Veii at length: unless the Tribuns of the commonalty fencour our enemies: unless that the Veientians find that relief and aid at Rome, which F they seek in vain throughout all Latium. For can there ought happen to the Veientians to wish for, as that first the City of Rome should be full of variance, and then the Camp (as it were by a contagion from thence) as full of mutinies? But contrariwise I assure you, amongst the enemies, so good order there is, and government, that neither the wearisomeness of long siege, nor yet the loathing of Kingly rule, hath caused any fier or commotion among them. No, nor the denial of help from the Tusculans hath one whit troubled and dis tempered their minds: but die he shall forthwith, that is the author of sedition. Neither shall any man there be suffered to speak those words, which are spoken here amongst you without any punishment or controlling.
He deters the bataanido, to be dry beaten and well cudgelled that foraken his Colours, or departeth from his guard and quarter. But here, in open assemblies, they that perüade and G counsel not one or two fouldiers: but whole armies to leave their Standards and Ensigns, and abandon the very camp, have audience with applause. Inomuch, that whatsoever a Tribune of the Commons speaketh, although it were to betray the City, and undo the whole State, yeare used to hear and give good ear to him and being ravished and carried away with the sweetnesses of that authority, ye suffer under it to lurk any mischief whatsoever. There remaineth no more but this, that the words they give out here with open mouth, the same they might iterate in the camp among the fouldiers, to corrupt the army, and not suffer them to obey their Captains. For to such licentious liberty they are grown at Rome, that they fear and reverence neither
Now was Appius with his Orations good enough for the Tribuns, and able to meet them at every turn: But see (a thing that no man would have thought) a lois and, or if received before Vei in de App us to have the better hand of the cause, wrought a greater unity among the States, and kindled an ardent desire to aflail Vei more hotly, and to besiege it with more resolution. For when they had raised up a mount near unto the City, and approached in a manner to the walls thereof, with their rolling towers and rooted mantles, whiles (Thay) they were not so vigilant in the night season to tend and watch these Fabricks, as they were house and cannily in the day time to rear and plant them; behold all of a sudden the enemies opened a gate, and amazed in great numbers, especially with burning firebrands, let all on a light fire: and in the space of one hour continued both the mount and the mantles, which had cost so long time in making, and many a man besides that came to help (but in vain) by sword and fire lost his life. Which being reported at Rome, made all men heavy and sad, and caused the Senators to take care and fear, how upon this accident, they might possibly prevent and lay, either commotion in City, or mutiny in camp: doubting left that the Tribuns would have intimated over the Common-wealth, as if they had gotten a great conquest. At what time, that they were by calling Gentlemen and to assembled, and had no horses of service assigned them from the City, after some consultation together among themselves, suddently came into the Senate, and having liberty granted of speech, promised to serve in the wars with horses of their own. After that the Senate had right honourably thanked and given them most gracious words, the news thereof was no sooner bruited through the market place and whole City, but behold, all on a sudden the Commons came running into the Council house, laying, that as they were then to serve as footmen; so they offered their service to the Common-wealth extraordinarily without murmuring; whether they should be led, either to Vei, or to any other place whatsoever. And if they were conducted to Vei; they would not return again (they say) from thence, before they had won that City from their enemies. At which words, the Senators so exceedingly joyed above measure, that hardly they could temper themselves. For they took no order, as they did by the Gentlemen and horsemens afores, that they should be praised by the mouth of the Magistrates thereto appointed, nor called them into the Council house, there to give them an answer, neither could they keep themselves within the Council house; but every one of them in his own behalf, so well as he could signified from aloft, both by word of mouth, and gesture of hand, unto the multitude standing in the Comitium, a general joy conceived laying, That the City of Rome in that concord and unity would be happy, invincible, and perpetual: commending the horsemens, praising the footmen, extolling and magnifying that very day, and confenting that now they had surpassed the courtesies and bounty of the Senate. So that Nobles and Commons both, for joy were kept mott, until the Senators were recalled into the Court: where a decreed was made, That the Tribuns Military should assemble the people, and give thanks both to horsemens and footmen, and promis in the name of the Senate, that they would be mindful of their affectionate kindness to their Country; and to signify that it was their pleasure, that they all, who had offered extraordinary service so willingly, should have their pay notwithstanding: yea, and for the horses also there were assigned a certain rate and proportion of wages. This was the first time that the Gentlemen began to serve on horseback for money. This voluntary army marched to Vei, and not only repaired again the works which had been destroyed, but also went in hand to erect new. And from the City was provision of victual brought, with greater care of conveyance than afores, that nothing might be wanting to an army so well delerving of the Common-wealth.

The year following had for their Military Tribuns in Comitium authority, C. Servilius Hala the third time, L. Servilius, P. Virginatus, Q. Sulpius, A. Mancius the second time, and M. Sergius the second time. In these Tribuns time, whiles every mans care was bent to the Venetian war, the fort of Aquae being neglected, by occasion that the garrison soldiers were disband and ranged much abroad, and commonly received Volcanic Merchants into the town, was suddenly surprized, by reason that the warders of the gates were betrayed. Les company of soldiers there were slain: because that all of them (besides those that were sick) found themselves occupied and traded all the country over, and in the Cities adjoining, like to lawlesse lackies that follow the Camp. Neither was there better success at Vei, wherein rested the chief care now, of all their publick affairs. For not only the Roman Captains were more angred one at another, than courageous against the enemy: but also the forces of the enemies were encreased by the hidden coming of the Captains and the Falsv. Which to nations of Hetruria, because they inhabited next, supposing when Vei should be forced and lost, that their turn would be next to be ward upon by the Romans: and the Gaulians besides, upon a special grudge and old quarrel of their own, for that aforetime in the Fidcan war, they had intermeddel and interested themselves, sent their Embassadors to and fro, and by binding themselves by a solemn oath one to the other, came unlooked for with their power to Vei. And by chance they assailcd that side and quarter where M. Sergius a Military Tribun had the charge of a force. Who gave a great alarm and caused exceeding fright: because the Romans supposd certainly that all Hetruria was raised out of every part, and there present, with all the power they could make. The same imagination animated the Veictians also within the City, to make a sally. So was the Camp of A the Romans attacked on both sides. And while they ran together up and down, and turned their ene"gins every way, and could hardly keep the Veientians within the strength of their fortresses, nor yet re# purge the violence of their own fortifications and ramparts, and defend themselves from their foreign enemies behind: their only hope was to have help from the greater states: that the legions in sundry places might make head, some against the Ciponas and the Falisci, others against the talf of the townmen. But Virginiaus had the charge of that main camp, one that bare a pr"vate grudge and inward malice against Virginiaus, and was hated again of him. This man, when word was brought that most of the Fabricks and bulwarks were suffocated, that the ramparts and trenches were won, and that the enemies on both sides charged boldly, kept his soldiers well appointed in arms: saying, that if there were any need of help, his Colleagues should lend unto him, if he would. And he for his part was not so arrogant and insolent, but the other was as peevish and willif, Who becaufe he would not seem to seek into his adversary, nor crave aid at his hand, chose rather to be vanquished of his enemy, than to over-come him by help of a fellow-Citizen. Thus between them for a while the poor soldiers went to rack, and were flain. At the last, forfaking their ramparts, a very few of them escaped into the mine camp. But the molt part, with Virginiaus himself, went through to Rome. Where when he had laid a laying hand upon his fellow in government, it was thought good that Virginiaus should be sent for out of the camp: and that in the mean while their Deputy, and Lieutenants should command the forces. Hereupon was the matter debated in the Senat, and the two Tribuns kept a cautioning and resolving: and many hard terms were dealt between them. Few there were that tendered the common good, but took part either with the one or the other, as each of them were fancied and beloved. Howbeit the I.L. of the Senat thought good, howsoever that to shameful chance hapned either through the default, or unlucky fortune of the Captains not to expect the ordinary full time of the election, but that presently there should be new Tribuns military created, to enter into their office on the Calends of October, To which opinion when they were all agreed, the other Tribuns military nothing gain said it: But Virginiaus and Virginiaus (for whole fake it appeared that the Senat was weary of the Magistrates that year) at the first made men & befought them noto digitate and discredit them toward and afterward afield to crofs the decedentiy that they would give over their place, before the Ides of December, which was the fest and final day of entering yearly into new offices. Amid this business, the Tribuns of the Commons, who had kept silence even against their wills, so long as men were at unity and the affairs of the City prospered, upon a sudden brake out and threatened sharply the two Tribuns Military, that unless they would submit themselves, and reit in the authority of the Senat, they would commit them to ward. Then C. Servius Hada, a Military Tribun, ftood up and said, 6c Avior you and your threats, O ye Tribuns of the Commons, in good faith, I would gladly see once that there were no more power and authority in thee here, then will I and content in you. But who feeth not that there is no driving against the authority of the Senat? And therefore hold ye content: and forbear you to seek opportunity and occasion upon our variance to offer wrong. And my brethren for their parts shall either do that which the Senat thinke good: or else if they shall continue indifferent still in their constunity, I will presently nominate a Dictator, to force them to leave their office. This speech was approved with a general accord. And the Senators being glad that without the terros and affrightments of the Tribuns authority, there was found out another greater power to bridie magistrates: the two military Tribuns aforesaid were weighed with the consent of all parties, and had a new election of military Tribuns, to begin their government on the Calends of October: and before that day they resigned up their places. Thus were L. Ful cius Potius the fourth time, L. Furius Camillus the second time, L. Anuciis M. fumercus the third time, C. Cornelius Cofmus the second time, C. Fabius Anphiffus, and L. Julius Titius, Tribuns military in Commons authority.

In whole time many worthy Acts were performed both at home and abroad. For not only they had war in sundry places at one time, namely, at Veii, at Capena, against Falisci, and with the Volsci, to the end that Ayunt might be won again and recovered from the enemies: but at Rome also, what about matters and paying the tribute for soldiers pay there was much trouble. Besides, there was some variance, about taking in certain Tribuns of the Commons to the left: and the two arrangements of those, who a little before had governed in Confuls authority, caused no small stir. But the principal care of the Tribuns military, was that the mutters should go forward. Neither were the younger and serviceable men only preit forth, but the elder also compelled to give their names, and to keep watch and ward in the City. But look how much greater was the number of soldiers, so much more money they needed for their payment. And the fame was levied by a contribution: but unwillingly of as many as carried at home. For that besides the levy they were enjoined to become soldiers also, in defence of the City and to serve in person for the Commonwealth. These things, grievous as they were of themselves, so by the seditions Orations of the Tribuns in their assemblies, they seemed more grievous and heavy. Who argued and discoursed thus: That wages was appointed for soldiers to this end, only what by warfare, and what with exactions and impositions, they might undo the Commons, and make an end of them at once forever. One war (say they) hath now continued three years: and the time, on set purposes, ill managed: that it might be drawn out the longer. Again, in one mutter there were "armies encolled for no fewer than four wars, whereas to bearded boyes and old crafti Then offenders, Krave L Rome, and others, were taken up and haled forth. Now there was no difference of winter or summer: so as the poor Commons at no time can have any rest. Who now at last are taxed also and racked to the uttermost, so that after they have brought home with them their bodies overstayed with travel, weakened with wounds, and last of all, wasted and spent with age: and finding all things at home unattended by reason of the long absence of the masters and owners, they must be lain to pay tribute even out of their poor decayed quick flock, and repay again with great unity to the Common-wealth, their wages received in war, as it were upon interest.

Between the masters of one side, and the levy of soldiers pay the other side, and their minds occupied about greater affairs, at the election of Tribuns of Commons, the number could not fully be made up: Whereupon there was great labour made, that into the rooms that were void, there should be some of the Nobility taken in and admitted. When that could not be obtained, yet to impeach and overthrow the Tribuns law, it was effectuated or brought to pass that they should assume unto them for Tribuns of the Commons, C. Lucerius, and Marcus Attillus, by the might and practice no doubt of the Patruiti. It happted, so that the same year C. Trebonius was a Tribun of the Commonwealth, who would seem to undertake the patronage and defence of the Law Trebonia, and discharge it as a duty to that name and house belonging. He spake alone and said, ‘That whereas the Tribuns Military had won that, whereof some of the Nobles had born the reproach in their first suit, and that the Law Trebonia was disannulled, in that certain Tribuns of the Commonalty were taken into their fellow, not by suffrages and free voices of the people but by the rule and commandment of the Nobles: and that the matter was come to that pass, that either

The invective speech of C. Trebonius against Sergius and Virginius.

The Commoners, or their favourite and followers were to become Tribuns of the Commons: that their sacred laws were taken from them perforce, and the Tribuns authority wrested from out of their hands by violence: all these inconveniences he complained to have happted through the fraudulent practice of the Nobles: and the mischief on law and treachery of his own companions in office. Thus whereas there grew great heart-burning among them, and that not the Nobles only, but also the Tribuns of the Commons, as well they, which were elected, as they that were electors, were hardly thought of by the people: Then three of the Company, P. Curiatus, M. Maturius, and M. Tiberius, being some few days turn, like to fall upon Sergius and Virginius, (the Tribuns Military of the former year) and by serving process, giving them a day to answer, turned from themselves the anger and displeasure of the Commons, upon those two persons desiring openly, ‘That whatsoever were grieving for the mutters and the Tribune, whatsoever thought the war long, and the continual sordid and tedious, whatsoever forrowed for the damage and discomfiture received at Vienna, whatsoever for the loss of their Children, Brethren, Kinsfolk or any of their alliance had heavy and mournful hones: to them they offered liberty and power to vent their publick and private grief, upon those two guilty persons and offenders, Sergius and Virginius, the very caustic of all the mischief and calamities that were happtened. For why? the adversary charged them with no more then was confecrated by the very parties: who finding themselves both faintly, laid the blame one upon the other: whereas Virginius reproached Sergius with running away and Sergius laid treason to Virginius his charge, in that he denied his help in time of need. For to say they were both of them so inconsiderate and M fools only, were to speak beyond all compass of belief. But much more likely it was, that there was some packing rather, and that the matter was contrived, and practice of set purpose, and by an ordinary and common fraudulent plot of the Patruiti. By whose means both at the first the Venetians got opportunity to fire their works, thereby to draw out and prolong the war, and also now the army was bought and sold, and the Roman camp betrayed to the False. And all this to no other end, but that the youth and flower of the City might wax old at Vienna, and that the Tribuns might not propose and conflick with the people about the distribution of lands, or any other commodities of the poor Commons, or in frequent and full assembly of Citizens intend and follow their publick actions, and with the conspiracy of the Gentry and Nobles. Moreover there is already (say they) a prejudice pesed against these Nobles, offendors, both by the Senat and people of Rome, and also by their Colleagues. For as they were displaced and depoited from their office, by an Act of the Senat: so when they refused to give over, they were for fear of a Dictator forced by their own companions to resign up their government: and the people of Rome had created other Tribuns Military to enter into their charge not upon the usual day which was in the Ides of December, but forthwith in the month of October; as who would say, the Common-wealth had not been able to stand any longer, if the men had remained till in place. And yet for all this, these persons thus convicted and for-condemned by so many prejudices, come now to be judged of the people: thinking they are sufficiently quit, and discharged, yes, and have suffered punishment enough, in that they were two months sooner then ordinary, made private persons: and perceive not, that thereby was taken from them the power only to do any harm, and no punishment inflicted upon them. For as much as, even their very Colleagues, who had not offended, were likewise discharged as well as they: Let the Quirites therefore and people of Rome, take that heart to them again, which they had upon the late overthrow, refresh and bleeding now, when they behold the army running in fearful flight, some wounded and some, arriving at the gates, blaming no fortune, nor any of the gods, but only their two brave leaders. And as for us, we know assuredly that there is not one of all them here presently assembled, who that day cur-Afed not in his heart and detested the head, the house, and whole estate of L. Virginus, and M. Sergius. Neither is it convenient, that upon whom, every man prayed that the anger and vengeance of God would light against them now when they both may and ought, they should not extend their full power with rigour. Since that even the very gods never lay hand themselves upon sinners and offenders: but it suffiseth that they arm the wronged and oppressed persons with means and opportunity of revenge. The Commons upon these speeches moved with indignation, condemned these two offenders in 10505, brazen After a piece: notwithstanding that Sergius pleaded for himself, blamed the common fortune of war, and laid all upon fortune: and Virginus beheld them (but both in vain) that he might not be more unhappy, and speed workcft, than abroad in war. Thus the peoples wrath being diverted upon these two, obstructed and darkened the remembrance both of the assumption and admitting of the Tribuns aforesaid, and of deciding and dispersing the Law Tribunia. The Tribuns thus having got the upper hand, to the extremity the Commonalty might have a present reward for awording this dooms publish the Law Agraria, and forbid the levying of the Subsidy for lounders pay: seeing there was need of pay for so many armies: and sped so well they had, in the management of wars, as they were likely to come to an end, without any warings at all. For at Vei the pepy camp which was lost, being recovered again, was fortified with strong bulwarks and furnished with good guards. The Tribuns Military, M. Ennius and Q. Fabius had the charge there, and as for M. Ennius in the Fallican, and Cn. Cornelius in the Capenit Country they could meet with none enemies without their town walls. But they drove away booties, and waited their marches, by firing their villages and their corn: but as for their towns, they neither assaulted nor beleaguered them. But in the Volcian country, after their territory was waived, above also was affluent (but in vain) for that it was situate on high. Whereupon Valerius Patius, who had the charge of that province, seeing that force would not prevail, began by trench and rampart to lay siege to it, and invent round, The affairs of war abroad standing in these terms: there arose domestical strife and sedition at home: and the same was followed more earnestly and with greater ado, than the wars were managed without. And when by reason of the Tribuns there could no subsidies and excises be gathered, nor money for lounders pay sent to the Generals, and that the lounders called on them hard, and were haftie for their wages: the camp also had like to have been troubled and infected with the contagion of those civil mutinies. During these heats and angry fits of the Commons against the Nobles, albeit the Tribuns of the people did. That now the time was come of establishing their freedom, and translaying the chiefest dignity from the Sergii and Virginii to the Commons, such as were men of valour and action: Yet they prevailed no more then thus, that one only of the Commonalty, (as it was to make entry and take possession in the right of that dignity to wit, P. Licinius Calenus, should be created Tribun Military with Consul authority: the rest were all of the Nobility, Pub. Maelius, and P. Titius, P. Melius, L. Porius Medullinis, and L. Popilius Fabianus. The very Commons themselves marvelled that they had obtained so great a thing, and not only who was created, a man that aforetime had never been in place, and born nomagicy, yet an ancient Councillor of State, an elderly person and well kept in years. Neither as yet is it for certain known, why he first and above all others was chosen a meet man to have hanged, or make esay of this new dignity and promotion. Some think, that for his brother Cn. Cornelius his sake, who had been the year afore a Tribun Military, and had given to the horsemen triple pay, he was through favour drawn in and called to so great honour. Others, for that himself had picked out a convenient time, and made a plausible Oration, that both Nobles and Commons liked very well, concerning the agreement and unity of the States. The Tribuns of the Commons rejoining highly for this their victory in the Election, remitted and called in the inhibition of the subsidy or imposition aforesaid, the thing that most of all prejudiced the service of the Common-wealth. By means whereof payments were made in all dutiful obedience, and sent it was unto the army. Then within short time was Aureus (in the Volcians Country) recovered: by occasion that on a feftival holy day, the watch and ward of the City was neglected. This was a year notable and famous for the cold and snowy winter, so as the high ways were choked up, and Tyberis was un navigable: Howbeit, by reason of provision brought in aforesaid, the price of corn arose nor. And for because P. Licinius, as he entered his government without any troubles, and with greater joy and concurrence of the Commons than indignation of the Nobles: to also ruled and executed it all the year long: accordingly their teeth watered at the next election also, to make Tribuns military of their own body. Only M. Vettiius, of all the Nobility that stood in first for the dignity, had a place among them. But as for the other Tribuns Military in Consular authority, all the Centuries in a manchase Commons to wit, I. Titius, P. Maelius, Cn. Gemmulus, and L. Attius.

After this hard Winter, either by reason of a deliberate temper and disposition of the weather, suddenly changed to a contrary, or upon some other hidden and unknown cause, there followed presently a contagious and dangerous summer, by occasion of a pestilence, notion to all kind of living creatures. Of which incurable malady, when as neither the reason could be found, nor any end thereof seen, the Books of Sibylla were by a decree of the Senate perused: and Dumnivs appointed for Divine Rites and Ceremonies. By celebrating a Lection (then first instituted in the City of Rome) to appease and pacific Apollo, Latona, and Diana, Hercules, Mercury and Neptune: starved them (as it were) for the space of eight days together: and for that purpose they let out three three beds or banqueting tables, with as magnificent and stately furniture as could be for that time possibly devised. Which solemnity was privately also performed. All the gates and doors through the City flood wide openal forts of viands were set out abroad to be seen in common: open house kept for all comers, one with another, as well unknown strangers as their acquaintance, with all friendly welcome, and entertainment. Kindly, and courteously would they talk and devise, even with their adversaries: all chiding and railing was laid aside and put under foot. The prisoners also for that time were enlarged, yea, and confidence made afterwards, that any should be laid or kept in irons, unto whom the gods had vouchsafed that gracious meed.

But all this while much trouble there was, and many alarms before Veiit, by reason that three wars were joyned now in one. For when as at all once the Capenats and the Forciti came in manner as afore, about the fortifications and trenches of the Romans, for to rescue the besieged, they were forced to make head, and hazzard a double battell against three armies. But the beef help they had, was the remembrance of the late condemning of Sergius and Virginia. Therefore having conducted by a neater way, their forces from the greater camp (which before lay fitting and would not come to succour) they set upon the Capenats backs, as they turned against the rampart of the Romans. The battell there begun, made the Forciti also afraid: in which altrift of theirs they suddcnly fall’d out of the lesser hold, in so good time that they forced the enemies to turn their backs, all quaking for fear, And having got the upper hand, they followed the main of the victorie, and in the chase made a very great slaughter and destruction of them, And not long after, the foragers that walked the land of the Capenats, as they ranged abroad here and there, encountered the residue and remnant of this battell, as if fortune of purpose had prevented them to their hands, and swept them up clean. Also many of the Veientians as they fled back into the City, were cut in pieces before their very gates: whilsts they within for fear left the Romans at once should rush in, made the gates fall and shut the hindmost of their own men, There were the achievements of this year.

And now approached the Election of the Tribuns military, whereof the nobles had in a manner a great care then of the war: as who saw now that the soveraigne rule was not only parted with the Commonalty, but weener on their own behalf quite left. Therefore altho’ of that purpose they had prepared most noble and excellent men to stand in suit, whom to pass by and let slip, they thought the people would have been ashamed: yet nevertheless they themselves (as if they had been the parties that stood) tried every way, and not only fought the help of men but also crazed it at the hands of the gods: making it great struggle and a matter of conscience: and alledging that the elections for two years past were not according to the will of Gods: as appeared by this, say they, that in the former year there was an intolerable winter, and such as stunned some heavy judgements from above; how also the year following, there were no prodigious tokens showed anywhere, but even the very events and effects thereof, were seen and felt: namely, the petitition both in Country and City, through the very indignation, no doubt, of the gods, for that in the fatal Books of Sybils it was found out, that they ought to have been pacified, for the diverting away of that pendent influence. As if in those solemn assemblies which ought in the name of the gods & religiously to be held, the gods thought it an indignation and unefti thing, that M. Valerius the first time, M. Valerius Maximus, M. Furius Camillus the third time, L. Furius Medallius the third time, Quintus Servilius Fidemus the second time, Quintus Sulpius Camerensis the second time. Howbeit in this year no great exploit worthy of record, was performed at Veiit under these Tribuns. All the service that was, consisted in forraging and waiting. The two Lord Generals raised huge booties, to wit, Pa天生 from Fidemus, Camillus from Capena: leaving behind them nothing whole and untouched, that might be spoiled by fire or sword, In this mean time, many fearful prodigious tokens were reported, the most part whereof were slenderly credited, for that of each there was but one only author; and because there were no foot-letters, by whom they might make proclamation therefore (since that the Turboons were now professed enemies) they were altogether neglected. But one especialy there was, which all men had an eye and regard unto, namely, for that a certain pool within the Alban forest, without extraordinary rain from above, or any other occasion which might make the thing seem less miraculous and wonderful, was risen unto an unusual height. Certain Orators therefore were sent to the Oracle of Delphi, to know what the gods signified by that prodigious token. But they, as good would, met with an interpreter of the Delphins nearer home, to wit, an ancient Veientian, Who (upon a time, when as the fouldiers, both of the Romans and Turboons, let fly one at the other tumults, and scoffs from their fl batter and guards) thus spake in prophetic tongue: That until the water were drained and let out of the Alban pool, the Romans should never be masters of the town of Veiit, Which saying of his was at the first esteemed as a foolish word rashly let fall from him: but after, it began to be much talked of, so long, until a certain Roman fouldier out of his ward, enquired of a townsman that watch’d next unto him (for now by reason of long war they had entercourse of speech one with another) what he was who had cast out such an ambiguous riddle of the Alban Lake? When
A When he heard that he was a fourth-rate, being himself also a man not without some sense of religion, he trained that wisard forth to communication, pretending that he would gladly be resolved himself, as touching a particular prodigious object that troubled his mind: & therefore requested him at his good leisure, to take so much pain as to confer with him, and give him countell about the ex postition and diverting the danger thereof. Now when they were both gone a good way from their fellows, unarmed, and without all fear and suspicion one of the other, the Roman being a lively tall young man, caught the feeble old fellow in the flight of them all, and notwithstanding a great deal that the Tuscans made (but all in vain) had him away: & was brought before the General, was then afterwards to Rome unto the Senate. And being demanded what the meaning of that should be, which he had prognosticated and prefaged concerning the Albanseke, answered thus: “Certainly the gods were offended with the people of Veii that day on which they put this into his mind to bewray the fatal and inevitable destruction of their State and country: and therefore that, which as then he being flattered by divine inspiration had prophesied, neither might he call back again and unpeak: and besides, happily by concealing those things, which the immortal gods would have to be published, there might be committed as great fin, as by divulging mysteries to be concealed. Thus therefore (quoth he) is it written in the fatal books of fortunes, and thus in the Tuscans learning, too us is delivered, That when the Alban water overflowed, if then the Romans with due and religious ceremonies let it out, they should have the victory of the Veientians: but before that the gods would not for sake the walls of the Veientians.

Then went he on Dili, and there was what was the solemn and right matter of deriving the water, But the Nobles supposing authoritie to be the light of credit, and not of sufficient account in to weighty a matter a beleved, resolved to expect the Embassadors. and the answer of the Oracle of Apollo. But before these messengers were returned from Delphi, or any expiation tonsed out for this Alban miracle, the new Tribuns Military with Consuls authority, L. Julius Tribulus, L. Ennius Medallinus the fourt time, L. Sergius Fidenas, A. Posthumius Regilensia, P. Cornelius Malogenerus, A. Manlius, began their government.

In that year there arose running enemies, the Tarquiniens, they seeing the Romans buited with many wars at one, with the Voliscians at Anxur, who laid siege to the fort there: with the Enquians at Labeces, who assaulted the colony of the Romans: besides, with the Veientians the Fracattians and Capitanus: and that within the City there was no greater quietsness, by reason of variance between the Nobility and Commons: supposing, I say, that hereby they had good opportunity to do some injury and harm, they fended forth certain bands of foolders lightly appointed, into the territory of Rome, to toagogue and make spoild that the Romans would either put up that wrong at their hands without revenge, because they would not charge themselves with a new war: or encounter them and make head with a small power and the same but slender and disfumed. The Romans was more offended at the indignity of these bravadoes, then they cared much for the spoi les done by the Tarquiniens. And therefore they neither made much ado about the matter, nor drove it out any long while. A. Posthumius and L. Julius levied a power without any ordinary matter (for letted they were by the Tribunes of the Commons) even in a manner of voluntary fordliers, whom they had procured with good words and comfortabe speeches. And passing throughout the country of the Cenifer by crois & crooked ways, surprised the Tarquiniens upon the ladder, as they returned from plundering & laden with great prizes. Many they knew, all they caled of their loading, and thus having recovered the spoils of their lands, they returned to Rome. Two days were allowed for the owners, every one to own his proper goods: & on the third day, such goods that were unknown (whereof the most part belonged to the enemies) were fold in post-sale: and that mony which was made thereof was divided among the foolders. All other wars, and especially the Veientian, had doublefull lify. For now the Romans despiting of all mans help, regarded and expected only the course of destinies and the will of the gods. By which time the Embassadors were returned from Delphi, bringing the answer of the Oracle, agreeable to the former answer made by the wizard, with was taken prifoners and irran in this forme:

wrome O Romans that the Alban water be not kept too long in the pool. Beware therefore not to discharge it selfe into the sea. Let it stirr and wear the fields therewith, by sundry rivuletts or streams flow fast waist is and draw it dry. Then assuredly the enemy wills remember that out of that City which so many years thou hast besieged, victory is promised to thee assuredly, by those destinies which now are revealed. And after the war ended and leisure was, let they bring unto my temple, an ample and honorable present: and perform the sacred ceremonies of thy country according to the old custom, and renew those a fresh which have of late been neglected. Here grew this captaining prover been said to be greatly accounted of: and the Tribunes military, Cornelius and Posthumius, began to take his counsel and G advice, about the procuration of the Alban miracle, and to appeale to the gods indus order. And found it was at last where it was the gods blamed the neglect of ceremonies & for letting the ancient solemnities and sacrifices: and that certainly it was nothing else, but that there was an error committed in creation of the Magistrates: and they so created, had dedicated the Latin holidays wrong and celebrated the sacrifices in the Alban mount amole. The only purging or expiation whereof was, that the Tribunes military should give over their office, and that they should take new Auplices against the flight & singing of birds, and to proceed to an Intereign. All which things were according to a decree of the Senate performed. Whereupon there inte-

Gentlemen! I am grieved to see the gloomy clouds that gather over Rome; I am grieved to see the dark shade that is cast over the top of the Capitoline. But I will not allow these clouds to obscure the light of truth, nor the shade to hide the beauty of virtue. I will not allow these circumstances to prevent me from speaking out, and from setting before you the truths that I hold dear.

You have heard of the great calamities that have befallen our city. The war with the Gauls has caused us great loss of life and property. The peace with the Carthaginians has not brought the hoped-for benefits. The war with the Persians has not brought the expected victory.

But I will not allow these circumstances to prevent me from speaking out, and from setting before you the truths that I hold dear.

A fright at the last alarm, were fled from Veii: and taught his foolders not to fear their enemies moit, but likewise to stand in awe of their own Commander. And after he had published to take matters upon a certain day, himself in the mean while rode pott to Veii, there to encourage the hearts of the foolders. From thence he returned to Rome, for to levy a new army: and there was not one that refused to leave under his standard. For even the youth of the forranners both Latins and Herniels, came & offered their service in that war. Unto whom, when as the Dictator had in the Senate house yeelded thanks, and that all things now were in sufficient readiness, by a decree of the Senate he made a vow, that when he had won Veii, he would incomintly celebra the great games, and sacrificing and conicert at anew, the Temple to dame Minerva, which stole time had been

B dedicated by King Servius Tullius. Thus when he was gone forth from the City, and his army on foot, with greater expectation of the people then hope: first he bought a field with the Falicilians and Capitola in the Country of Nepet, [called this day Nepet] where he ordered all the exploit with as great dexterity and policy as might be: and as it commonly falleth out he iped as well and fortune favoured his designs. He not only defeated his enemies in battle, but also drave out of the field, and gained a huge booty, whereof the greatest part came to the Treasurer his coffers; and somewhat (though not much) was given to the foolders. From thence he marched with his armes to Veii, and there he caused more leoncs and battillons to be made, and to hand thicker together. And having made proclamation, that none should fight without special command, he withdrew the foolders to the making of trenches and rampiers, from their skirmishes that they made of them selves, and that rashly between their camp and the wall of the town. The greatest work of all the rest and most laborious, was the undermining that was begun into the Caftle of the enemies. And to the end that this work should not be interrump't, nor yet the continual labour till under the ground might over-toll them, he divided the pioners into fix parts, and each of them wrought 10 hours round by turns, so that both night and day, they never gave over before they had wrought a way to the Caftle. The Dictator seeing now the victory as it were in his hands, and a most rich City ready to be taken, and that there was like to be much usage, as never had been the like in all the wars put together afofte: left that he might incur either any muny or anger of the foolders in pinching and iacent parting of the pillage, or displeasure and discontentment of the Rulers and Nobles of Rome, by to prodigall a largesse in sharing all: dispatched his letters to the Senate, to this effect, "That whereas by the goodness of the immortal God's, his own policy and direction, and the travell of his foolders, the City Veii was now in a manner at his devotion: what they would advise, should be done with the rich spoils thereof; There were two divers opinions that mightily distracted the Senate: the one of the old P. Licinius, whose mind being asked of his sons, 'Spake from (by report) and said: that his opinion was, that there should a proclamation be published abroad among the people, that whatsoever who would be partaker of the booty, should go to the Legaour before Veii. The other of Ap. Claudius, who finding fault with this new prodigall unequall, and undivided largesse, in that they thought it unlawfull and unfruit, that the treasure got of the enemies should come once at least wise to the common purse of the City, which had been emptied to often by resoll of war: was of advice, "That the foolders should have their pay out of it, that the Commons thereby might be called, in the charges of theliberty levied of them: for to should every mans house equally feel the safety and part of that benefit, and the hands of idle percons remaining at home in the towne, gredy now of rifling, and who would be fingering of Pillage, should not pluck from the hardy warriors their due rewards. For as much as it is usuall seen, that as the vaillantest man commonly aimeth at the greatest part of spoil, and perill to the more coward always reacheth at the biggest part of the spoil, and hath his hand deepset therein. Contrariwise, Licinius, alleged that such mony laid up would be always supped and odious, and would miiltle matter unto the Commons of criminations & finding one fault or other, whereof seditions and commotions may arise, and would give occasion of new laws to be pretended: and therefore better it were: that by this gift and boon the hearts of the Commons were won and reconciled: who being spent and eaten out by reason of their charges of so many years, here with might be well relieved. And that they ought to lift the fruit and sweetness of the booty out of that war, in which they had spent their years, and were waxen old men. And that it would be more welcome and acceptable, that every man should be his own carver, and with his own hand catch from the enemy what he could, and bring it home with him, then if they should receive much more by a great deal at the discretion and pleasure of another. And the Dictator him self: (saith he) had avoided no more as he could, the displeasure, hatred, and offence that might arise thereof, and therefore pulled it off to the Senate: the Senate ought likewise see the matter is put to them, to let the Commons alone therewith, and permit every man to have such share as the fortune of war will allot him. This advice which made the Senate gratious with the people, was thought to be the fatter and better of the twain. Whereupon proclamation was made, That whatever would have part of the spoile of Veii, should shew his selfe before the Dictator in the camp. So there went a huge multitude, that they filled the camp againe. Then the Dictator after sacrifice done, and advice taken of the lucky signes of birds, went forth and commencing his foolders to take arms and weapons in hand, spake these words and said: "By thy conduct and the influence of thy divine power O Jupiter Apollo, let foremost to the winning of the town of Veii, & now to thee I vow the tenth part of the spoiles thereof."

P 2 And
And they writall (6 Queen Juno) who at this hour doth inhabit within the compass of the flie, I beseech, that thou wouldest vouchsafe, to follow us after conquete into this city, ours now, and thine within awhile: whereas thou maist be shrined in a Temple meete for thee, and the grandeur of thy majesty. Having made these prayers, with exceeding multitude he invi-eted the city, and satisfied it round on all parts to the end that they within might have left percei-\(00\)vance of the peril intended towards them from the undermining. The Veientians little knowing that they were betrayed, partly by their own prophets, and partly by the Oracles abroad, and that some of their gods were invited and bidden to part of the spoil and aecage, and other by vows and prayers trained and called out of their own city, began to look after the temples of their enemies & their new habitations; little weening that this was their last day, & fearing nothing less than that their walls should by undermining be overthrown, and that their Castle was full already of enemies; every man for himself ran armed to the walls, marvelling what the matter should be, that whereas for so many daies space no manifest oocurred of the Romans Leaguer, then of a sudden (as if it were in a wood rage) they ran upon head! to rashly to the assault. But hereto beoleth a tale, That when the Veientian King was at sacrifice, this voice of the Southsier was overheard out of the mine under ground, That he whose hand was to part the inwards of that sacrifice should obtain victory, and moved the Roman fouldiers, to break out of the undermining, and to catch up the entrails and bowels, and carry them to the Dictator. But as in things of so great antiquity, it sufficeth me, that those which carry some likelyhood of truth, be received for true: fo for soable matters fitter indeed to make a shew in a flagge play (where people take delight in such miracles) then to be fadly beieved, it will not quit for the pains either to vouch them, or disdain them.
The mine or cave at the same time (no doubt) full of chosen fouldiers, yielded forth all at once armed men into the Church of Juno, which was in the castle of Venetian, and some of them let up on the backs of their enemies that were on the walls: others pluck up the portcullis of the gates: some of them, from the houfes the women and servants flung down ftones and tiles, call fire abroad. So that every place was full of cryes and voices, partly of them that frighted others, and partly of those that were affrighted, with a confused terror of women and children.
When as now in a moment, the armed fouldiers were thrown down from the walls every where, and the gates let open: whiles some entred marching in array, others camed the naked wals, the city was filled with enmies and skirmishers there were in every place. After great filaface and execution committed, the fight began to quall: and the Dictator commanded the Beddis to proclame and give commandment, to spare the unarmed. Thus the bloodshed ended. Whereupon the unarmed people began to yield: and by permission of the Dictator the fouldiers ran to the spoile. Which being brought in fight of the Dictator, of greater price and value a good deal, than either was hoped or looked for: it is said that he stretched forth his bands towards heaven and praised, That if his own fortune and the felicity of the people of Rome were thought by any God or man to be excessive, the envy belonging thereeto might be mitigated with as small privy lods of his own in particular, and with as little common calamity of the people of Rome in general, as might possibly be. And it is recorded, that in this manner praying and worshipping, as he turned himself about, he flippd forward and caught a fall. And as men afterwards judged by that which fell out, it was apposd that the ominous token prefaged the condemnation of Camillus himself; and the ruin of the city of Rome, which hapned within a few years after to be forced and fakcd. Thus was that day spent in the slaughter of enemies, and in rifting of that moft wealthy city. The morrow after, the Dictator fold in portiale the bodies of as many as were freeborn. That many only came into the common treasury not without some anger and repining of the Commons. And as for that bootie and spoile which they brought with them away, they coursed themselves beholding therefore, neither to the General Bimiel (who to colour and execute his own negociad had referred the matter to the Senate wherein he might have used his own liberty and discretion) nor to the Senat: but unto the house of the Livius, whereof, the fion propounded the matter before the Senat, and the father was the author of so popular an overture.

When as now worldly and earthily riches, were carried forth and tumbled out of Veii by heaps, then began they to remove and have away the sacred gifts and oblations of the gods with the gods themselves, but after the manner of devout worshippers, rather than of greedy spoilers. For chosen there were out of the whole army, certain youths in the flower of their age, who having their bodies clean washed, and being arrayd in robes, had in charge to carry Queen Juno to Rome, and entred into the Church with great adoration and reverence: and at the firft very charily and religi-only laid hand upon her, for that (after the Tuscan manner) there used none to handle that image but the Pretol of one certain tribe. After this, when as one of them, whether it were upon a certain divine inspiration, or in some youthfull sport, call out these words, Wilt thou march to Rome dame Juno? Thereitt with one voice cried aloud, That she gave a nod, and seemed thereto to give af-tent: whereupon this also was added to the tale, that she was heard to say, I will. But for certain it is reported, that she was littered out of her footfall, with the help of a small lever, and that as the willingly was displaced, so she was easily removed & translated, and so safe and sound conveyed into the mountain Avenue, there to abide and remain forever; which was the place assigned unto her by the vows of the Roman Dictator. And there Camillus according to his vow, dedicated to her afterwards a temple. This was the final end and fall of Veii, the richest City of all the Tuscans,
The fifth Book of T. Livius.

A which even in the last and utmost calamity shewed her mightiness, and having been besieged round about continually the space of ten summers and winters, and in that time done much more annoyance and hurt then it received, was now at last through the necessity of want by force of legge and secret undermining, then won by force of availat and violence.

When riding came to Rome of the winning of Veii, albeit both the prodigious fights that were seen, had been expiat by sacrifices, and that the sacrifices of the Prophets and the men, yet the

Oracles of Apollo were well known: and that to far for as men counsel and policy might help, they had chosen for General M. Furius, the most noble captain and warrior of all others: yet considering they had there waited to many years with variable fortune, and received in any loties and overthrowes, their joy was exceeding great; as if a thing had hapned unlooked for. And before that the Senat could make a decree, all the churches were full of the dames of Rome giving thanks to their gods. And the Senat ordained by an act, that supplications should continue for four daies, the like as never had been before time in any war. The Dictator also was met upon the way as he came home by all degrees and estates in great number, and was more welcomed and honoured then any man afore time, to that day. And the triumph far exceeded the usual manner of the solemnity to that day belonging. But most of all was he himself all goodly to be seen, entering into the city in a charriot drawn with white steeds. And that was thought an honour, not only eminent for the quality of a citizen, but hardly beeming the condition of any man whatsoever. For they made a matter of confidence, that their Dictator should be equal with Jupiter, and the sun, in respect of their horses: for which only cause especially, the triumph was more glorious than gracious, and taken in good part. Then assigned he & let out to Queen Juna a church in Anxur, and dedicated another to dame Matata, and so having achiev'd and performed those divine and human deeds, he resigned up his Dictatorship.

After this began some speeces about the Present to Apollo. Unto whom, when as Camillus said that he had to the tenth part of the spoil: the Priests & Prelates thought good that the people should discharge their confidence in that behalf: there could not ready mean be found how to command them to give back again the spoil, that the due portion thereout might be set apart for the holy olation. At the length they grew to this point, which was thought the easiest course of all; that whoever would accuse himself and his house in confidence, should, after he had made an entisment to himself of his own share in the spoil, bring the value & price of the tenth part into the common Chafe: that thereof might be made a golden oblation, meet for the state of that Temple, becomming the power of that god, and answerable to that dignity of the people of Rome. Yet even this contribution alienated the hearts of the people from Camillus.

A mid these affairs there came Embassadours from the Volscians and Equeians, to treat for peace, and peace obtained they, rather because the city, wearied with continual wars, might now take rest and be at quiet, than for any defects of them that sued for it. After Veii was taken, the year following had fix Tribunes Military in Consils authority, two, Quintus Flamines, namely, Cossus and Cestus, M. Valerius Maximus the second time, C. Fabius Ambustus the second time, L. Emilius Malminius the second time, and Q. Servilius the third time, Unto the Cornelius fell out by lot the Volscian war to Vetus and Servillius the Capenas. Who neither assailed their cities by force, nor wentied them with siege but forrosg the countries, and drave booves away of such things as were in the fields, nor trespassed other fruit, nor any fruitful things besides, escaped their hands. This disquiet and calamity subjeged the Capenas: who thereupon sued for peace, and had it granted. But amongst the Volscians the war continued still. In the meantime, at Rome there were lunny feditions. For the appeasing whereof, it was thought good to lend a Colony to Volsci, and thither three thousand citizens were appointed in checkroll. And Trinimvari were thereto choyn, who divided to every man three acres of ground and a half, and one twelfth part. That began to be defiled, because they thought it but a poor comfort offered to stop their mouths withall, and to put them beside a greater hope. For why should the Commons be sent away into the Volscian land, seeing there was Veii within their eyesight, a most fair city, and the land about more pleasant.

Fifful and large than that of Rome? And as for the city it self, they preferred it, either for the site, or state of private or publick buildings and other places, before the city of Rome. Moreover a motion also was made (which, after that Rome was won by the French, was more hotly followed) concerning a General Transmigration and removing to Veii for ever. Many, they intimated, that Veii should be inhabited, partly by the Commons, and partly by the Nobility: saying, That the people of Rome might well enough inhabit two cities joynly in one state of Commonwealth.

Against all this, the LL. of the Senat laboured what they might, and plainly said, they would sooner dye in the fight of the people of Rome, than any of those matters should passe. For why? if there were now in one city so much distraction, what would there be in two? Would any man be found, as to prefer a conquerred city, before his own country that had conqured the same? and suffer Veii after it was won to be better eate then it was before, even when it was at the bell? Finally, well might they be forstaken at home in their own country by their citizens, but to forsake their country and citizens, they would never be brought by any force whatso.

ever. They would not follow to Veii, T. Servilius as their founder, nor the amongst the Tribunes of the Commons persuaded this and left their god Romulus the son of a god, the first fockfather and the beginning of the city of Rome. While these matters were in hand, with foule flux and much debate and variance (for the nobles had won to their opinion some of the Tri-
That when there was an outcry made to begin the quarrel, and to set them together by the ears, the chief and principal Senators first came forth to the multitude, and offered themselves to be laid at, bitten and slain. In regard of whole age, dignity, and honour, they forbearing to do violence, were likewise for shame flaid in their mood, for any they like attempts besides. Camillus taking vantage hereof, ever and anon in all places, made speeches unto the people, and said: "That it was no marvel truly, that the city was in a rage and madness, which being charged with a vow, made more care of all things else, then to discharge their confidence thereof, and be it performed. As for the collation and gathering of a small donative, rather then a tithe, he said nothing of it; it seeming that every man privately bound himself thereto, and the body of the people bold freed; But one thing there was that his conscience would not suffer him to hold his peace. That out of that booty only which was of moveable things, the tenth was appointed to be levied: as for the city and ground that was won, which also was comprised within the vow there was no words at all made. When as the debating of this matter, which to the Senate seemed doubled and hard, was put over to the Priests and Prelats: their college calling to them Camillus, thought good, that whatsoever the Veientians had before the vow made, and whatsoever after the vow, came into the hands of the people of Rome, the tenth part thereof should be consecrated to Apollo. So both the city and the lands were valued; and mony taken forth of the city chamber. And the Tribunes military Consular enjoyed therewith to buy gold. Whereof there being not store enough, the dames of the city, having their assemblies and meetings by themselves for to consult thereabout, by a common decree made promissi to the Tribunes military, and brought into the exchequer their own gold, and all the ornaments and jewels they had. This was acceptable a thing, and as well taken of the Senat, as ever any had been: and for this liberality (men say) they had this honour granted unto them, as to ride to church and to plaise in hanging or ship-coaches, and as well on working days as holidays, to be at their wagons. When the gold was of every one received by weight and prised to the worth, that they might again be paid mony therefore; it was agreed that a standing cup of gold should be made thereof, and presented as an obligation to Apollo at Delphi. So soon as they had eafe and disburdened their minds of this religious vow, the Tribunes of the Commons began sedition anew. So as the multitude was incited and stirred up against all the peers, but above all other against Camillus; charging him, that what by conflicating and confecrating the booty of the Veientians, he had brought it to nothing. Tho° nobles that were absent they blamed and they cried out against mightily, but of such that were present in place, and offered themselves unto them in their anger, they had some reverence. Now so soon as they saw the matter in question to be deferred and continued past that year, they chose again for the year following, those Tribunes of the Commons, which were the authors of that at and law. The Nobles likewise endeavoured the same for those that should oppose themselves against the law. So the Tribunes of the Commons a good part of them were chosen the very same again. But at the Election of the Tribunes Military, the Patrijif after very much ado got at length, that Furius Camillus was created. They made semblance and pretended, that they would be provided of a Generall for war, but indeed their purpose was to be furnished of an adversary to withstand the acts and proceedings of the Tribunes. Together with Camillus were made Tribunes Military in Consuls authority. L.Furius Mедullius the first time, C. Аemylius, L.Valerius Publicola, Ср. Posthannius, P. Cornelius the second time.

In the beginning of the year, the Tribunes of the Commons flared not untill M. Furius Camillus was gone against the Falisci, as his charge required for that war. And by delays afterwards the matter was well cooled. As for Camillus, whom of all other they most feared to be their adversary, he was gazed great and glorious, by his service against the Falisci. For when as at the first, the enemies kept themselves within the wals, thinking it the safest way; be by wafting their country, and setting fire upon their villages, forced them to come forth of their town, howbeit they feared to betoe bold, and to go far forward: and encamped themselves a mile and leffe from the town; reposing their safety and security in nothing else, but in the dangerous and hard passage, the wajes all about being rough, ragged, and floiny, in some places straight and narrow, in other up hill and down hill, Camillus having taken an prisoner out of the fields, and being guided by his direction, late in the night diloged his camp, and betimes in the morning at break of the day, shewed himself upon the higher rounds a good deal. The Romans on three sides fell to forfitie by trenching and calling rampiers, whiles the tiff of the armie flood ready ranged for the batell. And whereas the enemies affaid to hinder the work, he discomfited them and put them to flight, whereupon the Falisci were so frightened, that as they fled amain in dispos, they passed beyond their own camp, which was nearer; and made as fast as they could to the town. Many were slain and many wounded, before that in this affray they could hit upon the gates. Their camp being taken, the booty thereof came into the Quellors coffers, with the great grudging and anger of the fouldiers. Howbeit yeolding to the severity of discipline and good government: the fame virtue which they had hated before, they now honoured and held in admiration. After this was the city besieged, and towers and platforms raised about it. Otherwheres also, as occasion was offered, the townmen would rally forth and attack the Romans camp, and make light skirmishes. Thus the time passed without any great good hope of either side: for that they within the town besieged, had of their former provision more store of corn & other necessaries than they that

A they lay at siege without. And it seemeth they would have had as long a peace of work there, as they had at Veii, had not fortune yielded to the Romans General, both a trial of his approved vertue in war and also ipecy, victorie.

It was the manner among the Faliscians, to entertain for the government of their Children, one that should teach and instruct them in school, and withall bear them company whersoever they went: and many children together (as the guide continued till even to this day in Greece) were committed to the charge and tuition of one man. As for the Nobles and principal men (sons of this City (as is usually every where else) a speciall man had the teaching of them; such as one, as wasthought most learned and the greatest clerk of all other. This man, having in time of peace begun to bring the children forth before the town side, to direct and exercise themselves, gave not over his wonted manner now in time of war. And using still to train them abroad one while nearer, an other whilsts further off from the gate: it fell out so, that one day what with paitime, and what with pleasant talk and discourses, he drew them forth then he accustomed: and seeing his time, went forward as far as the enemies corps de gard, and for to forth on ill he had brought them within the compass of the camp, and even to Camillus his pavilion. Where to this wicked intended act, he added also a more gracelrose speech, saying, "That he yielded* Falirij into the Romans hands, in that he gave them those children to do with what they would, whose parents were the rulers and commanders of the city. Which words when Camillus heard, thou comest not (quoth he) lewed writhe as thou art, with thy lewd and cursed present, either to a people or to a captain like thy selfe. We have not indeed with the Faliscians any league at all, by covenant of man concluded and established: yet by nature, there is and will be till a kind of unity or societie between them and there. There are laws due for war as well as for peace: and those have we learned to observe no leffe justly, than valiantly. We best arms not against that filthy age, which usually is sparing in raising and lacking of towns, but against armed men, and those who being, by us neither harmed nor provoked, have assailed the Romans camp at Veii. And yet these enemie (as bad as they be) like as thou hast for thy part exceeded them in a new and strange kind of wickednesse: to will I conquer. I doubt not, by least that the Romans professe: y be vertue, by travell, by hardy fight: like as I have done Veii already. After this he cursed him to be stripped naked, and so with his hands bound behind him, he delivered him to the children, for to bring him back to Falirij; and gave them rods withall, whereby they might whip and drive this trasnest

B to the City. At which sight the people at the first came running together: and then the Magistrats called a Counsell to sit upon this strange occasion. But fee what a change it wrought in their hearts. They who a while before were with hatred and anger so cruelly set, as that they withered in a man to be deftoried with the Veletians, then to accept of peace as the Capenas had done: now throughout the whole city required to be at accord with the Romans. No talk in the Market place, no speeche in the Counsell house, but of the faithfulness and truth of the Romans, and of the justice of their General. And with one general consent of all, Embassadors were sent to Camillus, into the camp. And from thence by permission of Camillus to the Senat of Rome they went, to deliver up Falirij: and being admitted into the Senat house, in this wife (by report) they spake. "In that victory fright honourable) which neither God nor man can chuse but allow: are we by you and your General overcomen and vanquished, and here we render our selves into your hands: supposing this (than which a conquerer there can be no thing more honourable) that we shall live better under your government, than under our owne proper laws and liberties. The event & issue of this war, hath afforded to mankind two worthy examples to follow. Ye for your part have made choice to observe faithfulnesse in war, other then to aschieve a preuent conquest: and we again, by this your faithful dealing induced and provoked, have willingly yielded unto you the victorie: conferring our selves now presentely to be your liege & lawfull subiects. Send whom you will to receive our armor, our holliges, our town with open gates. Neither shall you ever repent of our allegiance nor, we think much of your rule & government. Camillus had thanks both of the enemies and of the citizens. The Falisci were charged with mony for that years pay, that the people of Rome might be freed of their libdssy. Thus when peace was granted, the army was brought back again to Rome.

When as Camillus was returned after this conquest of his enemies into the City, with much better commendation, than whereas in triumph he rode in a chariot drawn with white horses through the city, as being now famous for his just dealing and faithfulnesse secretly the Senat was satisfied for very reverence on the part of his enemies, and could no longer bear, but without further delay to acquite him of the vow he made. So there were sent L. Valerius, L. Sergius, A Manlius as Embassadors in one galley unawasted, to present unto Apollo at Delphi by way of obligation, a standing cup of gold. Who not far off from the narrow seas of Sicily, were encounterd & borded by certain Liparenian Pirates or men of war, and had to Lipara. Now the manner was of that city, as common rovers use to do) for to divide the prize among them, Happily the chief officer or Magistrat for that year, was one Timarchides, a man more like to the Romans than his own countrymen. Who having himself some reverent regard of the name of Embassadors, and the present of the god to whom it was lent, and the occasion thereof: polished the multitude allo (which also rightly remembred their governor) with due religion and pricks of confidence. This head ruler brought the Embassadors into their lodging, & entertained them courteously at the cities charges, waited them with the convoy of a sufficient fleet: accompanied them in perfon to Delphi, and from thence conducted them...

them home again safe to Rome. Whereupon by an act of the Senat, there was a contract made with him of simony and mutual entertainment, and gifts bestowed upon him at the cities cost. The same year there was doubtful war with the Equeus, so it was uncertain both in the army and at Rome whether they had won or lost at the victory. TheGenerals for the Romans, were of the Tribunes Military, C. Emyius, and Sp. Poblimius. At the first they warred both together, but after, when the enemies were in fight discomfited, it was agreed, that Aemilius should keep Verrugo with a garrison, and Poblimius wait the borders. Where, as he marched somewhat negligently with his army out of order, as presently after field won, the Equeus let upon him, and having put him in fear chased him to the hills next hand. The fright whereof came from thence to the other garrison also at Verrugo. Poblimius, after that he had retir'd his men into safety and assembled them together, and there in an Oration greatly blamed and cried out upon their fear and running away; and that they were discomfited by a most dastardly fugitive enemy; the whole host cried out with one voice, that they deferred to be told of it, and confess'd that they had committ'd a foul fault but they themselves would make amends therefore; and promised that the enemies should carry it neither to heaven nor hell, nor joy long therewith. Requiring that he would conduct them presently to the enemies camp (which inight was right upon a plain) protestimg to refuse no extremity of punishment, if they were not matters of fill before night. He then commanded them, and willed them to refresh their bodies, and to be ready at the relief of the fourth watch. Now lay the enemies likewise in the passage, to intercept the Romans, as they fled by night from the hill, even in the way which leadeth to Verrugo. And before day they encounter'd together (but you must think the moon shone all night) and saw how to fight, as well as day light. But the noise being heard to Verrugo, it strike so great fear amongst them, thinking the camp of the Romans had been assailed, that for all Aemilius could do to hold them, and to beleech them to the contrary, they fled scattered unto Tusculum. Whence the news came to Rome, That Poblimius was slain, and his army left. But he riding about the host (after that in the morning betimes the day light newed them that followed space on every side, that there was no fear of ambushments and follayings) charged them with their promises, and set them in such a heat, that the Equeus could no longer abide their violence. Then flew they the enemies in the chase every one, and made havoc of them as they fled, more like men that do things in fury and rage then by plain valour. And presently from the Tidings from Tusculum (which put the city in a vain and cauful night) there came from Poblimius letters, with lawfull importing news, that the Romans had the victory, and the Equeus the overthrow.

Because as yet the actions and futes forefai'd of the Tribunes of the Commons could come to no end; but the Commons laboured to continue the Tribuneship in them that were the mainstays of the law preferred, and also the Nobles endeavours to make those rulers again that had opposed themselves against the same law. But as the Commons in their own election prevailed and had the better; so the Nobles were revenge'd of them again for this grievcce they took, by an Act of the Senat, that Consuls (hated Magistrates of the Commons) should be created. Thus after fifteen years were Consuls elected, L. Lucrius Plautius Servius Sulpicius Camerinus.

In the beginning of this year, when as the Tribunes of the Commons befifir'd themselves freely to go through with their law, for that none of their brotherhood was about to deny and nip the M. same; and while the Consuls for that very cause refil'd them as carelessly, and the whole city was here, about aluated: the Equeus won Vicia, a Colony of the Romans, seated within their own country. Most part of the Colonors (because the town being by night betrayed and won, yielding unto them free passage to escape away on the back side) fled safe to Rome. So that service befall unto L. Lucrius the Consul; Who went with a power and vanquish'd the enemies in flight, and with victory returned to Rome to a greater conflict a good deal. Anius Virginianus, and Quintus Pomponius, two Tribunes of the Commons the two years past, were accu'd; for whose defence it was for the Credit of the Senat, that the Nobles should agree and flock close together. For no man laid to their charge either dishonest behaviour in life, or corrupt carriage of themselves in their office, but only this, that to please and gratifie the Nobles, they had let themselves N against the Tribunes law. Howbeit the anger of the Commons went beyond the favour of the Senat, and (that which was a most shamefull precedent) they (giltitde the men) had fine set on their heads of ten thousand pounds of brasse coin: Whereat the Nobles took great displeasure. Camillus openly blamed the Commons for this their wicked part; who now letting themselves against their own patrons perceived not that by a pervert proceeding in judgement against their Tribunes, they had lost their liberty of opposing themselves with their negative voice: and take that away once, and farewell all authority of the Tribunes for ever. For where as they hoped that the Nobles would endure the unbridled and licencious liberty of that office, they were much deceived: for if those hard courses of the Tribunes might not be restrained by help of the same Tribunes, the Nobility would find some other weapon to fight withall. He rebuked the Consul also, for that they suffered those Tribunes to fail of their protection and safe conduct, who had done and said nothing but by the authority and warrant of the Senat. Whiles openly he used to make the enemies and such orations to the people, he thrust himself only more and more into men's anger and displeasure. But to stir up the Senat against the foresaid law, he ceased not till: willing them, that when the day came of proposing the law, they should come into the Common Hall, with no other mind but this, to remember they were to fight for god and coun-

A. ry, for the temples of the gods, and the very foile wherein they were born. And as for his own felt privately, if it were lawful for him amidst these civil troubles of his native country, to think upon and respect his own proper glory, it was right honourable for him, to the city which he had won, people, and retorted unto: and daily to behold and enjoy the memorable monument of his own glory: to see before his eyes the very City, whereof the counterfeit was born in the pomp of triumph: and that all men else should read in the films of his noble acts.

But he thought it a shamefull and abominable thing, that a City left and forsaken of the immortal gods, should be inhabited: and that the people of Rome should dwell in captive soil, and to make this exchange, to leave a natural country which hath conquered, for that hath been conquered.

B. quered With these persuasions & exhortations were the chief rulers excited the Nobles old and young, came in multitude, when as the law should be propounded into the Hall. And as they were dispersed and forced into Tribes, every one taking hold of those of his own tribe, began to beleach them even with tears, not to forsake that Country now, in the quarrell whereof they and their fathers had fought most valiantly and happily: shewing herewith every one and anon the Capitoll, the Temple of Vesta, and other Temples thereabout of the gods: that they should not therefore drive the people of Rome, as exiled and banished out of their native soil from their own home and hoilegods, into their enemies City, not bring the matter thus about, that it had been better that Vemin had not been won, rather then Rome should be abandoned. Because their dealing was nothing but by way of prayer and persuasion, and in their prayers much mention and naming of the gods, the mott part of them were touched in confidence: so as more Tribes nipped that one law forgoing forward, than gave their voices to approve it. Which victory was so joyful to the Nobles, that the morrow after, by the motion of the Cola decree was made, That amongst the Commons should be a division of twenty acres for a man out of the Valentiens lands: and not for householders only, but that consideration and reckoning should be had also in every house of all free born persons: to the end, that they should be willing to breed up children to the like proof; and for the hope of like commodity. When the Commons by this bountyfull gift and liberality, were well pacified and filled, there was no stir at all to hinder the election of the Conulis. So there were created Conulis, Lu. Valerius Postius, and M. Manlius, who afterwards was dismissed Capitolini.

Thefe Conulis set out the great solemn games and plays, which M. Furins, the Dictator had vowed in the Valentiens war. In the same year the Temple of Juno Regina vowed by the fame Dictator and in the fame war, was dedicated. And it is reported, that the dedication thereof was celebrated with exceeding great retort and forward endeavours of the dames of Rome. War there was (but not greatly to be spoken of) Aigidium with the Equians, for that the enemies were in a manner discomfited before that they joyned battle. Valerius because he followed full and killed the enemies in chase, was allowed by decree to triumph at full: and Manlius, that he should enter into the city only Ovant, in petty triumph. The same year arose a new war with the Voliscians against whom by reason of a famine and pestillence that grew about Rome upon exceeding drought and heat, an army could not be led forth. For which cause the Voliscians puffed up with pride,joying unto them the Sibilarites, invaded first the country about Rome. Whereupon war was proclaimed against both nations: Cumlius the Censor departed this life. In whole room M. Cornelius was substitutit. Which after bred some tempe of Religion, for that Rome in that five years space was taken. So that never after that is there any Censor chosen into the place of the deceased: And the Conulis also being lick and thereby disabled to governo, it was thought good to take new counsell & advice of augurs or tokens of birds by an Interregnum. When as therefor by an act of the Senat, the Conulis had resigned their office, M. Furins Camillus was created Interregnum. Who named after him P. Cornelius Scipio: and he afterwards Lu. Valerius Postius to be Interregnum. By whom were made six Tribunes Military with Conulis authority: that in case any of them should be sick and eafe, yet the Common-wealth should have governours enough. The first day of June they entred them into their office: namely, L. Lucretius, Servius Sulphius, M. Aemius, Lu. Furins Medullianos the seventeenth time, Agrippa Furins, C. Aemius; the second time, Of these L. Lucretius and C. Aemius had in commission to go against the Voliscians: but Agrippa Furins, and Servins Sulphius against the Sibilarites. And first were the Voliscians fought withall. A great war in respect of the number of enemies: but for the conflict and battell, nothing fierce and sharp. For their army at the first encounter was put to flight, and eight thousand foildiers were by the Roman horciten environed, whereupon they threw their weapons away and yeelded. The ridiers of this war caused the Sibilarites not to adventure upon flight: but they kept themselves armed within the walls, and stood upon their guard. The Romans then all abroad drave booties both out of the Sibilarites Country, and the Voliscians, and no man withstood their violence: to long until the Voliscians wearied with war, and traced granted unto them for twenty years, upon this condition, to make restitution again to the Romans of their goods, and to pay the fouldiers for that year their wages.

The same year one M. Cadinius, a commoner, gave notice to the Tribunes that in the new Canley, where now there standeth a Cheppel above the Temple of Vefiath there was in the lift time of the night a voice heard, louder than any mans, willing that the governours might have intelligence, that the Gaus were coming: This by reason of the balance of the author (as commonly it is seen) was not credited: besides, they were a nation far remote, and therefore les known and of small account. Thus were not only the advertisement of the gods despised, when as their fatal time of de
This nation (as it is reported) allured with the sweetness of corn and wine especially (dainty chaffer and a new delight in those days) passed over the Alps, and possessed those countries which had been for some time a Cicuniae inhabited. The voice goeth, that there was one Aratus of Cilicia, who had brought wine into Gaul, to entice that people withal, upon an anger and displeasure that his wife had been deflowered by one Lucumo (whole guardian Aratus himself had been) a young gentleman of great might and power, and whom Aratus could not chaste and bring within without the aid of foreign forces: This man was the Gauls guide in passing over the Alps, and the principal instrument to let them work for so to assail Clusium. I would not for my part deny, but that the French were brought to Clusium by Aratus or some other Cilicius: but more certain it is, that they who assaulted Clusium, were not the first that passed the Alps. For the Gauls two hundred years before they assaulted Clusium and won the City of Rome came over into Italy. Neither fought the Gauls first with this nation of the Cilicians, but long since, and oftentimes, with those that dwell between Apennines and the Alps. For, the Cilicians had all sovereign command, both by land and sea, before the Roman Empire was erected. The names of upper and lower sea, wherein Itaries was compassed about, as it were an island, may be a sufficient proof, how great and puissant they were; seeing, that the one is by the general name of the Nation, called Italians, the Cilician seas the other the Adrianick of a town of colony or the Cilicians called Adria. The Greeks do call the self same seas that (A Tyrrhenos and the Adriatick seas. Thence and both seas, inhabited those countries, consisting of no other but, as the Prince at the first beginning, and held in possession all those parts beyond the Po into the Alps, except that Angle only of the Venetians, that are seated about the Gulf of the Adriatick sea. And double, the Nations about the Alps, especially the Rican, had their beginning then whom the very country it self made savage, fo they as retained nothing of old, but the found of their language, and the fame broken and somewhat corrupted. Now for the coming of the Gauls over into Italy, thus much we have learned. In the days of Piusus Tarquiniius King of Rome, the Ciles which are a third part of the Gauls, were under the rule of the (B) Britonis who chose King over the Ciles, named Ambigatus, a great potentate and mighty, both in regard of valour and vesture, and also of his own private wealth and publick way: for that under his reign, Gaul was to fertile of corn, and grew fo populous, that the exceeding number of the people could not well be governed. This man being of great age, and desirous now to disburthen his Realm of that pesterling multitude, declared that he would send Bellofus and Sigevus his fitters sons (two forward young men) to seek adventures, into what lands ever the gods and goddesse should by their token direct them; giving them commission to gather what number of men they would, to the end that no nation might withstand their coming. So it fell to Sigevus lot, for to enter the forest and woodland country of Hercinia. Bellofus his fortune was a good deal better, to take his way (by the gods guidance) unto Italy: and he levied of the Britonis (A) Aventi (f) Samoni (g) Helvi (b) Ambardi (c) Cenotri and (d) Attrexi, those that might be spared out of those Countries, and letting forward with a mighty power of footmen and horsemen, came unto the (f) Treffo, now stood the Alps, against them in their way, which I marvel not were thought & inperable impassable, having not as yet any way made over them, (so far as any constant record makest date) unless we lift to believe the tales of Hercules. Now when as the Gauls there, were hemmed in as it were on every side with those high mountains, and that they looked every way about them, how they might get over those high hills reaching up to the heavens, and so pass - (as one world say) into another world; they were amazed and there went no further, upon purpose of conuenience, for that it was reported, that certain strangers seeking land to inhabit, were by the people of (m) Sabii set upon and asalled. These firs-gens were the (n) Moscellae, who taked from Placia the Gauls supposing to be a fortunate passage of their felicel/helped them forward, and took part with them: so as what place first they get after they were landed, they fortified within the wide or broad forrests. They themselves passed through the Country of (o) Taroni, and over the strights of the Alps, called (p) Julia: and having vanquished the Gauls in light manner from the river (q) Ticinum, hearing that the Country wherein they abode and jetted, was called Infabrum (after the name of a territory and thine of the Hedion) they following and embracing the lucky name of that place, so conformeable to the other of their own, builded The Clunies terified with this new war, advising well both their number and the uncustomed looks, and visages of the men, which they had not seen afore, and the strange armament withall: & hearing besides that the legions of the Tufcans both on this side the Po and beyond, had been oftentimes by them discomfited: Albeit in the Romans they had no interrest at all in regard of any league or alliance, only this, that they had not maintained their kinsfolk the Veientes against the Romans, sent their Embassadors to Rome, to crave aid of the Senate. Ay they obtained none. Embassadors were there sent three, the names of M. Fabius Ambuscus, who in the name of the Senate and people of Rome should treat with the Gauls and perforce with them, not to set upon the confederates and friends of the people of Rome, namely, such as at whose hands they had received no wrong: staying moreover, that if they would put the Romans to it, the Romans were to defend "Gauls by war, howbeit they thought it better, if it might be, to have no wars at all: but that the them a new-comen nation should grow into knowledge and acquaintance, rather by peace than by war. The embassage was mild and mildewed enough, but the Embassadors themselves were over fierce & hotly, and more like Gauls than Romans. Who having done their message in the assembly of the Tufcans, were there most answered. 'Although the name of the Romans was but of late heard of; yet they, yet they were perfwaded that they were hard men, at whose hands the Clunies in their fear, longing and requested succour. And whereas they choose rather to defend their allies by way of embassage, than by open war, they likewise neither disdained nor refused peace which they offered: If the Clunies would grant the Gauls (which wanted ground to inhabit) a part of their marches, whereof they held in possession more than they did well people and ac- copy: Otherwise, no peace would be had. And hereof would they have an answer while the Romans were in place: and if they were denied ground, they would also fight even before the Romans face, that they might make report at home, how much the Gauls went beyond other men in valour & Chivalry. And when as the Romans demanded again what right they had to require ground of the owners or to threaten war? For what interest or title had the Gauls to Tufcan? They again loudly made answer: that they carried their right in their swords, and that valiant men were Lords of all the world. So they were on both sides to set on fire, that they ran to their weapons & skirmish'd with the Tufcans, then against all law of nations (a thing that defiled the destruction of the Roman City) the Embassadors took arms. Neither could this be so secret but it was known. For even before the enigames of the Tufcans, there were seen three most noble & valiant knights of the Romans for to fight: so far exceeded the valour of those strangers above all the Clunies. Moreover and besides, Quintus Fabius riding out of the barcell on horseback charged his captain of the Gauls, as he fiercely assailed the enigames and ballet of the Tufcans, ran him through and line him: and as he rifed and disarmed him, the Gauls took knowledge of him: and throughout the whole hoft notice was given, that it was an Embassador of the Romans. So leaving their quarrel against the Clunies, they founded the retreat, and threatened the Romans. There were of them, that thought good presently to advance forward to Rome: but the elder fort prevailed, that there should be sent Embassadors first to complain of the injuries, and to require that for the law of arms broken, the Fabii should be yelded unto them. When as the Gaul Embassadors had declared their message according to their commisson, the Senate nothing liked of the Fabii deed, and thought the barbarous Gauls required nothing but just and reason. Howbeit, suit of friends and private respects, would not permit to make an act of that, in personages of so great mark and nobility, which they deemed meet and requisite. Therefore to the end it might not be impo- sed to them & they blamed. If peradventure any toll or overthrow should hap unto them by war- ring with the Gauls: they referred the hearing and dissembling of the Gauls demands unto the people. Where might and favour so much prevailed, that even they who were in euolution to be punish'd, were creased for the year following Tribunes Military in Consuls authority. At which the Gauls being offended (as good caufes they had) with open threats and menaces of war returned again to their company. There were with the three Fabii P. Scipio, Longus, Quintus Servilius, the fourth time, and P. Servilius Malpinensis. When as now to great danger was towards and near at hand (see how to name blinded men eyes, when as the will have her way and not be hid- red) that City which against the Fidenat & Veient enemy & other nations bordering therby, shed the utmost help, and oftentimes made a Dictator: now being threatened with a strange enemy never heard of before, coming to war upon them from the Ocean sea, & the faruent parts of the world, sought neither for governor nor help more then ordinary. Even thole Tribunes by whole rain-dealing that war was first caused, had the managing of all and made no more choice, nor muffling of foulchers than usually had been in common wars: making but a light matter of it and of no consequence, & setting little by, and elevating the ruin of the war. The Gauls in the meantime having heard, how on such purpose those breakers of human law were soon advanced to honour, & how their embassage was deluded and dallied with, all on fire, as they are a nation that way impatient and in anger outrageous) pluck up their standards forthwith and march with all expedition on their voyage. But at whole noise and hurlyburly (as they paved by in each call) when as the towns thereby were put in fear, and ran to their weapons, and the country peasants fled away: they with open mouth gave out and signified, that they went to Rome. All the ways as they joyed, what with horse and men, both in length and breadth, they took up a mighty room in their march. But what with the flame that went before, and the messengers of the Clusses and of other prophets that followed one at the heels of another, this speedy coming of the enemies brought right great fear and terror to Rome. For not withstanding, that they went with a power of men in all half suddenly muster'd, hardly met them at eleven miles end, where as the river Allia running down from the hills of Ccraftumnum, with a very deep channel (not much beneath the highway) discharge them it fell into the Tyber. And now by this time the whole country before them, and all the coasts about were overspread with the enemies, and (as they are a nation naturally given to vain tumults and therein born and bred) with an hideous and dissonant kind of singing (like a black Susan) they filled also about with a fearfull and horrible noise. There the Tribunes Military without getting beforehand a convenient place to pitch their tents in, without fortifying the same with any trench or rampiers, whereunto to them might safely betake themselves, even without any regard of God, whom at last wise they should have been mindful of, if they had forgotten man, without Aspices and bird-tokens, without reconciliation to God by sacrifice, full unhappily and in all hour, ranged their battels divided into wings, for fear of being confounded with multitude of enemies. Yet might not the vanguard answer the breadth of the enemies, notwithstanding they made their ranks and files so thin, that the middle ward of the battelle was weak, & feint Joyning close together. On the right hand there was a little higher ground, where they thought to betower men for supply, which as it gave the first occasion of fearing and running away, so was it the only safety of them that fled. For Brennus the Duke or Prince of the Gauls, fearing exceeding in that small number of the Romans, some strategem, and supposing that the higher ground was for this purpose kept. That when the Gauls should have encountered with the forefront of the legions, then the refeces would charge them both upon their backs and their flanks, displeased and advanced his standards against those in refuge: nothing doubting but if he had once driven them from their hold upon higher ground, on the plain he should soon have the victory, considering that in number he overwent them. See how the Barbarians had not only luck, but policy also on their sides; Contrariwise, the Romans in their camp were nothing like themselves, either for captains or foolders. Their minds were so perplexed with fear and thinking of running away, and so forgetful besides, that the greater part of them chose rather to fly to Veii (their enemies' City) although the Tyber were full in their way, then to take the flight toward to Rome, to their wives and children. For a while, the advantage of the ground defend'd those that were in refuge: but in the rest of the host, so soon as they that were next, heard the shout from the sides, and those that were farthest off from behind, before any frolk strucken, and before they were once touched, they fled from their unknown enemy, in a manner before they saw him. And so far off they were from trying fight, that they answered them not so much as with a counter-shout again. So as there were not any slain in fight. But they were killed behind at their backs, even by occasion of their own felves, who with their hurrlying hindred one another in their flight. About the bank of Tyber, whereunto the whole left wing was fled down, and had flung away their weapons, there was a great slaughter: For many of them that could not swim, and were weak by reason of their weighty corsets and other harnesse, were drowned and swallowed up of the surging whirlpools. Howbeit, the most part escaped late to Veii. From whence they came to Rome, not only without guard to court the City, but not to much as a messenger to bring news of this their overthrow. But from the right wing which kept farrther from the river, and the more under the hill, they all went to Rome. And finding not much as the gates of the City shut, they all fled into the Castle. The very Gauls themselves almonted at so wonderfull and sudden victory, stood still at the first in a great amaze, as who knew not what had hapned, and wist not what to make of it. After wards they feared some ambush, and at length fell to gathering the spoils of them that were slain, and to lay all their armor and harness upon heaps, as their mane is. At last, seeing no enemy nor shew of buttofity, they put themselves in their journey onward, a little before funnetting, and marched to the City of Rome. Whereupon word brought by the foreriders, that the gates were not shut, nor any ward kept afore the gates, nor armed men upon the walls, they stood in the like amaze as before, upon to strange and wondrous a thing. But fearing the night and the situation of a City unknown, they set them down, and rested between Rome and Arno, having sent their epils and facetts about the walls and gates, to understand what their enemies meant to do: in to deregulate a State. The Romans, for that a greater part had taken their way to Veii, then to Rome, and weening that there was none left alive, but those that were fled back to Rome; bewailing and bidding adieu, both to those that were dead those alive, set the whole City almost a weeping and lamenting. But after wards the publick fear almonted them, and took all fencie away of their privie loaners, when they heard once A once that the enemies were come, and within a while, as their barbarous people coaled and ranged about the walls by troops, they might hear their yelling, their howling, and unuttered confus'd hideous cries, so were they held all the time in fulness of mind, until the second day after: one while thinking, that at their first coming they would have imprisond the City, for unless they had to meant, they would have tarried (they thought) at Altartagia, a little before ut-Nletting (because the day was well-nigh done) they supposed they would enter upon them before night. But anon they feared that they dissembled this enterprise until night was come, to the end they might strike a greater fear & terror amongst them, And last of all the day light appor being shown them clean to, as they were in a continual agony, even until the midnight came indeed with them if they so long

B doubted & that now the bloody banners of their enemies were displayed before their gates, Howbeit neither that night nor the day following, was the City in the like fear, as when they fled to Faithfully at Altartagia. For being paist hope that the City could be defended with so small power as remained, they determined that with their wives & children all their serviceable youth, which was meet to bear arms, yes, and the more able men, and strength of the Senate should retire themselves into the Castle & Capitol: and after they had theith brought their armor and corn, from thence as from a defensible place to protect their gods, and the Roman nation, to save from fire and sword (far as they could) the Flamin of Jupiter, the vestal Nuns, and fared images, and holy relics of the City and not to abandon the worship and due solemnity unto them, so long as any were left alive, to do them honour and worship. For thus they conceived, That if the Castle & Capitol, being the seat of their gods, if the Senate, which is the head & chief of their publick counsell, if the hardy and fighting young men remained after that imminent ruin and fall of the City, the les would be the loss of the aged folk, a number. (God wont) left behind of purpose in the City, no otherwiselike but to perish. And to the end that the multitude of the common fort might bear this more patiently, the elders that had triumphed aforetime, and been Consuls, openly gave out and said, That they would live and die together with them. Neither would they with those bodies of theirs which were unmeet to bear armour, and to defend the City, far heavy and pester the company of able and armed men, in this their penury & want of victuals. Thence and such like were the confolations and comfort of the ancients among themselves, now relinquent to end their lives. After which, they turned their exhortations to the companies of the young and infly men whom they followed into the Castle and Capitol, recommending unto their manhood and to their youthfull courage, all the estate remaining of that City, which for the spacee of three hundred and three-score years had in all their wars been victorious, and gotten great conquests. Now when they, in whom all the hope and help were departed, and had taken their leave of them, that resolued fully not to survive the winning and destruction of their City: as the very thing in it self, and the fight thereof was a lamentable and woeful spectacle unto them, to the pious weeping of women, and their uncertain running up and down, following now one another, and now another, and asking their husbands and children, to what end, to what last defal they betook them, was as dolorous a pageant, as could happen to any earthly creature. Nevertheles, a great sort of them accompanied their friends into the Castle, and no man either bad or forbid them. For all though it was good and commodious for the besieged, namely, to diminish the number, and discharge themselves of the feeble multitude, yet it seemd unto them an inhuman and unkind part. The rest of the common people especially, whom so small an hill was not able to receive, and could not possibly be kept in so great a scarcity of corn & victuals, departed by heaps out of the City: and marching as it were in one company together in a row took their way to faneadium. From thence they divided themselves in sundry ways. Some slip into the fields and country, some to the next cities there bordering without any Captains without any common consent, every one following his own hope, his own head and wit now that all public counsell was in despair, and lost remedy. In the while, the Flamin of Quirinus, and the religious Vestal virgins leaving the regard of their own private affairs, confounded with themselves what sacred Images to carry with them, and feeling their strength would not serve to rid away and leave all what to leave behind them and what place was meetest to betrow and lay them up most safely. They agreed at length and thought it best, to put them in small barrels or rundlets & within the ground to bury them in a little chapel, standing next to the Flamin's house: which place for very depredation unto this day, may not for anything be upset upon. All the rest they parted among themselves. And every one carrying her own burden, took the way, which over the wooden bridge ledeth to Juneculum. Upon the ascent or rise of that hill, when L. Albinius (a Commoner of Rome) saw them going as he among other company (which unmeet for war departed out of the City) carried his wife & children in a wagon: he making even then in that hard calamity, a difference yet between divine and humane things, and thinking it an impious part, and void of all religion, that the public Priest with the sacred Images of the people of Rome should go on foot; while he and his were been riding at ease in a wagon,caused his wife and children to alight and come forth, and let the Nuns with their holy Images in their room, and brought them to Secre, to which place they minded to go. All things now being set at Rome (as in such a time could be) in order sufficiently, for the defence of the Castle: the aged persons above said being returned to their houses, waited for the coming of the enemy with hearts prepared and resolved to die. Such of them as had born offices of the chair, to the intent, that they might end their days in the ornaments & robes of their former estate and honour, honour, and according to their virtue and defects: in their most slender garments and habiliments, which they wear when they carried their sacred chariots upon festival dates; or wherein they rode in triumph, now fast upon their ivory chairs in the very midst and entry of their houses. There be that write, how they willingly devoted and bequeathed themselves to die for their Country and Citizens of Rome: and that M. Fabius the High Priest read and pronounced unto them a certain hymn and precept form of prayer, so that purpose. The Gauls both for that now they had refrained from fight a whole night, and to their choler was somewhat cooled, and also because they had not in any pace fought a bloody and dangerous battell with them, nor even at that time won the City by any assault or fire, curst the morrow after into the City, without anger and heat of furious rage, by the gate Callimoc, standing wide open, and so called forward to the common place of assemblies, calls their eyes about them towards the Temples of the gods, and to the cattle, which only preferred some few of war. And there leaving a sufficient guard, left haply from the Castle and Capitol they should be violently assaulted, after they were once unbarred parted, they fell to ravage and pillage; and meeting none at all in the void streets, some rufh by heaps into the houses next hand, others go to those that were inhaughted, supposing them at lest wise to be untouched, full of riches, and fit for to fill their hands. From thence again as frighted by reason of such desolation, and fearing left haply any fraud of the enemy might entrap them as they waded one from another, they returned round in a ring together, into the market place, and the places near thereto. Where, when they saw the Commoners houses fell flat to and locked, and contrariwise the fair yale palaces of the Noblemen and chief Senators standing wide open, they were at a stand, and doubted more in a manner to enter upon the open places than the flat. And they beheld as it were with capping and crowning after a reverend manner, certain ancient porpagnons sitting in the porches and entries of their houses, who besides their ornaments and apparel, above the ordinary estate of men, for a certain majesty which they carried in their comtenance and gravity of vigne, resembled the gods. And when as they turned to them, & flood looking upon them, as if they had been Idols and sacred Images, M. Papirius, one of them, when a Gaul began to stroke his beard (which then they used all to wear long) with his ivory staff (as they say) gave him a rap on the pate, and moved his patience. Whereupon the first that was wounded and to the rest were all killed as they sat in their chairs of state. After this instance of these honorable porpagnons of the Nobility, they fell upon all the rest, and spared no creature: they ransacked their houses, and when they were empty, set fire on them. But whether it were that they were not all of them desirous to destroy the City utterly, or that it was the mind of the Leaders and chief of the Gauls, that for a terror there should be some faire fires (if haply for the love of their houses, that they were besieged, might be induced to yield themselves;) or that all their houses were not burned at once, to the end that the remainder of the City might be as a pavis and pledge to mollify their enemies, and make their hearts to relent: howsoever, I say it was, the fire for the first day (as usually in Cities forced and won) spread not all abroad every where, to make a general havoc. The Romans from the Castle, seeing the City full of enemies, and in every street running up and down, and in all places fresh calamities and miseries one in the neck of another, were not able to conceive the same in mind and spirit, no, nor so much as to have the right eye of their ears; and eyes. For to such place loiter the houts and noise of the enemies, the howling and wailing of women and children, the noise of fire, and the raucous and coughing downfall of houses turned them aside in exceeding fear, thither they bent their minds, their faces, and eyes, as men by fortune let up aloft, as upon a stage or scaffold, to behold the fall and ruin of their Country; referred to save nothing of all their wealth and substance, but only their own bodies: by thus much, more miserable and pitiful above all others that ever were besieged, in that being shut out from their native Country and City, they were besieged and beheld it, and all that they had in the enemies hands. Neither as ill as the day was spent, followed there a better night. Yea & when after this troublesome night the like morrow was come there was no time but misty still fell some heavy object; and one spectable or other of new and fresh calamities. And albeit they were laden and overwhelmed with so many miseries, yet they nothing at all let fall or abated their courage but resolved still, notwithstanding they saw all fired all miname and laid even with the ground, manfully to defend that poor naked hill which they held, and was their only hope left them to recover their freedom. And now seeing the same deportations daily happen they were so injure to misery, that all sense and feeling of their own state and private fortune, they regarded nothing but their armour on their backs and swords in their hands, as the only remnants and reliques of their hope. The Gauls likewise for certain dates, had made war with the poor houses only of the City, and all to no purpose; and when they perceived in all this burning and ruins of the City, fo conquer, nothing now left but armed enemies, who were not, for all so many calamities, one jot terrified, nor their minds once inclined to yield without further force and violence were used; they determine to try them utmost, and to make an assault upon the fortress. So on the morrow morning very early at sound of trumpets, all the whole multitude of them, arranged themselves in the market place. From whence with an out-cry and shout, under the fire of targets over their heads, they approach the Castle. Against whom the Romans behald them, the one unaverted, nor less airy, strengthening their wards and quarters, with a good corps de garde against all Advenues: and whereas they saw the banners displayed, that A that way they opposed their strongest guards: and suffered the enemies to climb up the hill, supposing that the higher they were got up, so much the calmer they might be beaten down. And being come up to the midst of the cliff, there they halted: and then, e from the higher grounds, which of it itself in manner bare out against the enemy, with all their force they charged upon the Gauls, overturned them, and sent them down headlong: as never after that, e ther any part of them, or all together would attempt that kind of service. Being therefore pat hope to get up by force and arms, they make preparation for long siege: whereas until that time they had no mind: both for that the corn which was within they had consumed in burning of the City, and in the mean space, that which was in the country about, was carried and brought to Vei: Whereupon they divided B their Army, purposing with one part thereof, to forage and drive booty's all over the nations thereby adjoining, and with the other to invest the Castle: to the end, that the foragers abroad might bring in corn to serve them that lay at the siege. Now as those Gauls departed from the City, it was their hap and fortune to come to Ardea (where Camillus abode in exile) there to make trial of the Romans valour. This Camillus being more penive in the behalf of the publice calamity, than careful of his own: spending his spirits and wasting his body with crying out upon gods and men: thus fretting and chafing with himself, and wondering what was become of those valiant and hardy men, who under his conduct won Veii and Fabrictis; and who had fought other wars more valiantly always than fortunately: of a sudden he heard that the Army of the Gauls approached, and that the Ardeates in great fear fell to confutation therefore about what to do: and C even as if he had been inspired from God above, he put himie forward and entred into the midst of the people assembled, who herefore, had abstained and forborn such publice meetings and confutations. And thus he said: "You my Matters of Ardea, mine old friends sometimes, and now my new neighbours and fellow-Citizens, for to it is fallen out by your kindnes, and desires, and by mine own fortune and condition: let no man think, that I, forgetful of my own entire am come forth hither into this audience. But the present object and publice danger forceth every man to utter and bring forth in to hear tell a time and business as this, what help he can. And when shall I ever be thankful unto you for your favours and demerits, if now I stand still and do nothing? Or where shall I stand here in feild, if not in war? By my skill herein, I flourished in my Country, and being in war invincible, was in peace by unthankful neighbours D hours and unkind Citizens banisht. And now have ye good occasion offered, and opportunity of ye Ardeates) both to make recompence, for those so great pleasures and benefices, as I times past received of the people of Rome, as your selves do well remember, (and therefore be it spoken without blasphemy and reproaching of any mindfull persons) and also to win great honour of war, unto this City, by defeating a common enemy both. This nation, which thus cometh towards us with a disolute and disordered army, are those to whom God and nature hath given bodies more big and corpulent than strong and able, hearts more stout and cour- reous than constant and resolute whereby they bring with them always into the field more shew of terror than true valour and execution. Whereof the late toil and discomfiture of the, Romans may be a sufficient proof and trial. They won the City when the gates were open unto them: a small power from the Castle and Capitol was ablest withstanding and repel them. And E weary already of the tediousness of siege, they are fain to depart, stragling up and down, and wandering along the country. Their manner is when they have filled their bulles with wine and good victuals, (which they devour full greedily and hastily whereoever they can come by it.) so soon as night cometh on, without any place of defence, without watch or ward to them selves along like brute beasts, here and there by the waters sides, and now upon their good successes, are they more securous and reticulous, than they were wont to be. If ye be disposed to defend your walls, & not all return French, gather your selves together & at the first watch of the night, arm, and to your weapons, follow me to a massacre, and not to a skirmish: for if I do not deliver them unto your hands fast asleep to be hewn in pieces like sheep and oxen, I refuse not to see the F flame end of mine estate at Ardea, that I have found already at Rome. There was not one there, howeveroffered he was, friend or foe to Camillus: but was persuaded that the like warrior was not in those daies to be found again. The assembly being broken up, they refreshed their bodies, ready to fight as soon as ever the Signal should be propounded. Which being put forth, in the beginning and first watch of the night, they were ready with Camillus at the gates. And gone they were not far from the town, but they found, (as it was foretold them) the Gauls camp without Coup de guard, neglected on every side: and with a mighty cry they assil. There was in no place fight, but killing every where: and their naked bodies (as they lay fast asleep) were hacked and cut in pieces, Howbeit, some of those who were fortheft off, being scared out of their couthes, not knowing what violence or from whence it was, took to their heels and fled: other some fled at unawares upon the very enemy. A great part of them being come into the territory of Ardea were by the townsmen who fell out upon them as they were dispers'd, environed and slain. The like slaughter to this there was of the Tuscans in the City off Veii; who had so little pity and compassion, to see a City which well near for four hundred years space bordering upon them, was now surprised by a strange enemy not heard of afore, that even at that very time they made rodes into the Territory of Rome, and laden with booty from thence, purposing to assil even Veii also and the garrison, being the only place and means of relief, and the last hope of the Roman name.
The Roman soldiers that lay in garrison there, had espied these Tuscanians ranging about the country, and gathered together in a body to drive booties at them: and withall they descried their Camp pitched not far from Veii. Where, at first they pitched their own estate; but after, they fell into an indignation and anger that the Tuscanians also, from whom they had diverted the Gauls war upon themselves, should in their calamities thus scorn them and have them in derision: so they could forsooth temper themselves and forbear, but presently let upon them. But being flated perforce by Captain (editio) Centurion whom they themselves had made their Ruler, they put off this exploit until night: Only their Commander and Leader was not to be compared with Cau-silus; else all the service was achieved in the same order, and with as good speed and happy success, Over and befofe, by the guidance and direction of those prisoners which remained unblind over night, they went forward as far as Saline, to another power of the Tuscanians, and in the night following, upon a sudden they made them a greater havoc and slaughter of them, and so in joyous manner with double conquest they return to Veii. At Rome in this mean time, the siege for the most part was but cold and slack, and all quiet on both sides: whiles the Gauls regarded and looked to this only, That none of their enemies should make an escape through their guards. At what time a certain valiant young Roman behaved himself so, as his own countrmen and enemies too had in great admiration. There was a set faciicke or solemnity to be celebrated by the house and lineage of Fabius in the Mount Quirinal. For the accomplishment whereof, Comis Fabiuus Decius in his holy robes, after the Gabine fashion, bearing in his hand the holy complements thereunto belonging, came down from the Capitol, passed through the midit of the enemies corps de K guard, and nothing moved whatsoever was done or said to terrify him, went on forth right to the Mount Quirinal. And when he had there performed and dispatched all solemnities, returning the same way with like constant constenance and comly pace, hoping affolutely, that the gods would be merciful and gracious unto him, whose worship he had not left undone for any fear of death: he retired again to his company into the Capitol: whether it were that the Gauls were Astonished at his wondrous boldness, or rather were touched in conscience with a reverent regard of Religion, wherein that nation is very zealous and devout. At Veii in the mean while they gathered not only heart every day more than other, but strength and forces also; for that not only Romans thirter repaired out of the country, such as either in diturniture of the battell, or for the calamity of the City now taken, had been catteder: but also out of Latin divers of their own accord had flockt thither, to have their share in the pillage. Now they thought it high time to return to their country again and to deliver it out of the enemies hands. The body was strong enough, but without an head it was. The very place put them in mind of Camillus, and a great part of the soldiers were such as had archived prosperous exploits under his leading and conduct. And Cau-silus did indignantly plain: that no god or man should make him give over his government, but would himself, as mindful of his own place, call for a General. So by general consent it was agreed, that Camillus should be sent for from Aosta, but with the advice before of the Senat whic was at Rome. So modest were they in all their carriage, and so precisely observed they (even in their desperate case) the due respect and regard of every action. Now to pass through the wards of their enemies, was an hard and dangerous adventure. To this exploit therefore, Postumus Comisinius, a valorous young man, promised his service. Who being himself upon a bark or corke under him, hauled along the Tyber down the water to the City; and to the next way from the strand, over a steep cliff (which was negligently or not at all guarded by the enemy) he passeth through the Capitol, and being brought to the Magistrates, declareth there his message from the Army.
When he had received the Senates decree to this effect: Imperius, That Camillus should be called back again out of exile by a Ward-leet, or the suffrages of the Curiae: Item, that by the voices of the people he should be created Dictator out of hand, and that the soldiery might have for their Genetall whom they desired: the messenger returned the same way back again to Veii. And Embusadours were sent to Camillus at Ardea, who conducted him to Veii. But I would rather be sree that he departed not from Ardea, before he had certain intelligence of the Act of the Senate, And for that neither without the will of the people, he might change the place whereunto he was confined. nor might he were named Dictator, have the conduct of the Army; there passed an Act of all the Wards, and Dictator he was declared in his absence. Whiles these things were a doing at Veii, the Castle of Rome and the Capitol was in very danger. For the Gauls, either having found out a man-footing that way as the messenger went from Veii, or espied at the cliff of Carnutes, an easie place to climb up: in a clear night sent a man before him, to assy the pillage, & then gave him up his armes, and where upon was first, one he had fitted up, and drew up as the difficulty of the place required, so as they got up to the top with such silence, that not only the Senenels were not aware of them, but also the dogs (a watchfull creature at e-every noile in the right) were not once awakened therewith. But they could not escape the gale, which were confounded into fume, and for all the leaftness of victual were lappd and not killed up. And this it was that saved them all. For with their gagling and fluttering of their wings, M.
Moletus, who three years before had been Consul, a right hardy and noble warriour, was awaked.
Who taking weapon in hand, speedily went forth and raised the rest withall to take arms. And whiles all else made shift in a great fright, he broke the Gauls who now flood upon the top, with the boise and pike of his buckler, and turned them down. The fall of whom overturned them that were were next. Then flew he others, (whiles they were in fear) who laid their weapons out of hand, and took hold of the stones whereunto they clungged close. By which time the rest being come together, some flinging darts, others casting down stones, tumbled their enemies back, and the whole power of them lost their face footing and fell down headlong. This tumult being appeased the rest of the night (to far forth as men might with troubled minds, seeing that even the danger, past diquested them) they gave themselves to sleep. When day was come, the toulidors by sound of Trumpet were summoned to assemble before their Tribunes, and considering there was reward due both to well-doing and mis-doing: Marcus first for his valour was commended and rewarded, not only by the Tribunes military, but also by consent of all the toulidors. Upon whom, they amongst them all, bestowed and brought home his house (which stood upon the Castle hill) wheat-meal by the half-pints, and wine by the quarts. A matter of small reckoning to be spoken of: but in that fcurity, this might be an argument of their love and affection when every man beguiled his own belly, pluckt from himself and the recumbencies of his life, and conferred the same to the honour and recompence of that one man. Then were summoned to appear the seni- nels of that place where the enemy climbed up undescribed. And when as P. Sulpitius a Tribune Military, had pronounced that he would exercise martial law upon them all the toulidors cried out with open mouth, and laid all the fault on one watchman: and so for fear of a mutiny he spared all there; and with their general consent and approbation, he cawed that undoubtful guilty person to be thrown down from the rock. Whereupon they were more careful and circumspect in their watch, both amongst the Gauls (because it was commonly notified that there passed mes- sengers to and fro between Vei and Rome: and also amongst the Romans, for the remembrance of the late danger by night. But above all other miseries that follow war and siege, the famine was fore in both the Armies. The Gauls were plagued with pestilence besides: for that they had pitched their tents in a place lying between two hills, exceeding hot by reason of the fires, and full of imoak, carrying both dust and ashes, when any wind was stirring: which be things that of all others, that nation cannot abide, as being used to wet and cold. Thus being smothered with heat, and therewith filled and choked again, they died with contagious diseases like rotten sheep. And now for idleness that they would not bury them fearfully one by one, they laid the dead bodies on heaps one with another, and to burn them; and made that place famous and no- Table by the name of Buffa Gallia, i.e. Gaulbury. Hereupon, they grew to make some truce with the Romans, and embraced together by sufferance of the Generals. In which parleys, when as the Gauls very often alleged the famine, and upon that extremity persuaded them to yeeld: it is said that the Romans for to put them by that opinion of them, in many places from the Capitol slung out leaves of bread into the very stations and corps de guard of the enemies. But at length neither could their hunger be dissembled nor sustained any longer. Therefore, whiles the Dictator mulcted a power at Ardea by himself, he commandeth the Generall of hornemen L. P. Sulpitius to have away the Army from Vei and make to good preparation, and inmisheth himself to, as he might be able to match his enemies, and to charge upon them. In the mean season the army of the Capitol wearied out with watching and warden, having unmounted all humane miseries beside hunger, which only of all others, nature would not suffer to be over; one looking day by day for succour from the Dictator now at lat when not only their food, but their hope also failed them, and were grown to that weakness, that when they went to keep their guard, they could hardly bear the weight of their armour, they agreed and gave consent either to yield or to ransome themselves upon any condition, they cared not what. Whiles the Gauls also gave forth plainly, and said they might be entreated for a small consideration to give over siege. Then the Senate went together, and gave Commision to the Tribunes Military to bargain and go through with them. So by a parley or treaty had between P. Sulpitius Tribune Military, and Arnius the Duke of the Gauls, a conclusion was made: and that people, who within a short time should be Lords of the world, were valued and esteemed at a thousand pound weight of Gold. This in itself was a most odious and shamefull thing, but was adjoynd therunto a foul indignity. For the Gauls brought forth false weights and uneven balances. And when the Tribunes refuted them, behald, the insolent and proud Gaul would needs have his sward weighed too for vantage, adding this speech moreover, (which was intolerable to the Romans to hear) We worth men conquered and down with them ill. But neither God nor man would abide the Romans to live ranomd. For by good hap, before that shamefull sum of money by composition was paid, before (I say) that some wrangling that fell between, all the Gold was weighed out, cometh the Dictator in the manner, and commandeth the Gold to be had away, and the Gauls to void. And when as they made resistance and pleaded the capitation and bargain, he again replied, and faith, That the composition was not good, nor ought to stand, which after he had restored.

G Dictator had been by an injurious Magistrate concluded, without his commandment and warrant: and withall wameth the Gauls to prepare themselves to fight commending his own toulidors to cast all their bag and bagage down on a heap, to put on their harnets, to make ready their weapons, and by dint of feed, and not by weight of sward to redeem their Country, having in fight before their eyes the Churches of their gods, their wives and children, and the foil whereon the City stood (deformed now with miseries of war) and all things else which they ought by good reason to defend, recover, and be revenged for. Hereupon he marshalled his battell as the ground ground would give him leave, being the plot only of a City half ruinare and lying along, and with all of it self-naturally uneven, Forecalling and providing for all things with special choice and preparation to serve his lodgers turn, as far as martial skill could possibly reach, The Gauls attained at this to strange an accoutrement, betook them to their weapons and in a furious fit of anger rather than with any considerate discretion, they ran upon the Romans, Now had Formos turned her wheel: now Gods help and mans policy affixed the Romans. Therefore at the first encounter the Gauls were discomfitted with as little difficulty as they themselves had discomfitted the victory at Alma. Afterwards also, in another more hot battle in the way of Gades, about eight miles from Rome (to which place they were fled) they were vanquished by the confederacy and leading of the same Caureliam. For there were they slain in every place, their Camp taken, and not so much as one left to bring news of their overthrow. The Dictator having thus delivered his Country out of the enemies hand, returned again with triumph into the City. And in all the sports and pleasant ditties which the Gauls rudely suffer'd after their manner devi'd, he was fill'd Romulus the father of the Country, the second founder of the City, which were no vain titles of commendation.

When he had saved his Country thus in war, he preferred it afterwards again undoubtfully in time of peace, namely in gainlaying their transmigration to Veii: whiles both the Tribunes enforced that matter more earnestly, now after the burning of the City, and the Commons also of themselves were more enclined thereunto, than before. Which was one cause, that after his triumph he reign'd not up his Dictatorship: being requested also by the Senate not to leave the City in so doubtful terms of perplexity. And first and foremost (as he was evermore a most pious devout man and religions) he proposed these things which concern'd the immortal gods: and casteth an act of the Senat to be made, Imperium, that all the Temples, for that the enemies had held and possessed them) should be repaired, bound out new, and purged. Item, that the manner of cleaning them should be searched out of the books of Sybils by the Divinists. Moreover that with the inhabitants of Core, there should be made a league of publick and mutual hospitality, for receiving the sacred images and priests of the city of Rome: by the means and favour of which people, the honour and service of the immortal gods was not forelorn and disconforted. Item, that there should be set out the plagues called Caduplina, for that Jupiter Optimum Maximus had fill'd defeat and preserved his own face, and the Refuge of the people of Rome, in that fruitful time of trouble. And that M. Furion should ordain a guild, or fraternity out of those that dwelt in the hill of the Capitol, for the celebration of those plagues. Finally to the end there should also be some satisfaction and expiation made of that night voice which being the bore-messenger and warning-giver of their destruction before the coming of the Gauls, was heard and yet neglected, a motion was made, that a Temple should be erected in the new conley to Attis Locutus. The Gold which was recovered by force from the Gauls, as also that which out of other Temples in that fearful hurtly-burry, was brought into the chancel or chappel of Jupiter, because they could not call to mind precisely into which Churches they were to carry it again accordingly, was all judged holy and sacred to Jupiter: and order taken that it should be belov'd and laid up under his shrine. And how devout the City was, appeared before in this: That when there was not gold enough in the common chests, to make up the full sum of the ransom that was agreed upon between them and the Gauls, they took that which the matrons and wives of Rome contributed, and all to spare and save the gold appointed to holy uses. The Matrons were therefore thanked, and this honor bestowed done unto them. That after their death they as well as their husbands, should be openly paid in a solemn funeral Oration. When those things were once accomplisht which appertain'd to the Gods, and all that belonged to the Senate for to do: they and not alone, upon the fries that the Tribunes kept with the Commons continually, with their speeches in all their assemblies, soliciting them to leave the ruins of the City and to remove with all they had to Veii, a town readily furnished to their hand: then I say not before, Camillus accompanied with the whole Senate, came up into the common place of audience, and there before the N people spake in this wise. So grievous to me O Qutices, is all contention and variance with the Tribunes of the Commons that while I lived at Ardeia I found no other comfort and solace, in that most heavy and woful banishment of mine but this. That I was far enough off from those debates and jars. In regard whereof, I would never have come again, I affirme but that you called me back both by act of Senate, and also by approbation of the people. And it is not in me any change of mind but your calamity and distress'd estate, that hath forced me to return again unto you. For this was the very point that you stood upon, namely that our country might continue still and keep her ancient place: and not I wis, that I should return and dwell therein again. And even now verily, would I be still and keep silence willingly, but that this事宜 also is in the behalf of my forefathers, the whom I fail (so long is life doth last) for others might be a shameful reproach for our country: the which I fail (so long is life doth last) for others might be a shameful reproach for our country: the which I fail (so long is life doth last) for others might be a shameful reproach for our country: the which I fail (so long is life doth last). And when as the gods and men of Rome kept still, and inhabited the Capitol and the camp, notwithstanding the Gauls were Lords and possess'd of the whole City, is it possible that both Cisle and Capito, after the City is regained, should be forsaken and abandoned of the
A Roman visitors, and shal our prosperous hand over our enemies bring greater devotion to our City, than adversity hath? Verily, if it were so, that we made no reckoning of that religion and divine solemn service, instituted even with the foundation of our City; & that we counted all varities that have been delivered unto us by tradition from our ancestors: yet so evident a power of God hath alighted the Romans, that I must needs think, that men can now no longer neglect the worship of God. For consider with me you either the prosperity or the adversity of these years late past, one after another: ye shall find that as long as we served God and followed his will so long we prospered & went forward; and all the while that we despised the same, we ever went backward and fell to decay. And first and foremost the Vei-en war (recently finished), you hoow many years lasted it? how troubledome and painful was it? And ended it was not before that by the direction and advertisement of the gods, the war was let out of the Alban pool: What shall I speak of this late & strange calamity of our own City? Begun it (and by truth) before that voice which came from heaven was made so light of concerning the coming of the Gauls: before the law of nations was by our Embassadors broken: and before that through the lame neglect of the gods, that fact was by us winked at and put up, which indeed should have been punished and revenged: This was the cause that we were vanquished made captive, not to our famine and suffer'd such indignation punishment both at Gods hand and at mans, as that we are made an example and amazement to the whole world. Then our adversity and affliction put us in mind of our religion and the fear of the gods. We fled into the Capitol, to the gods even to the very seat of Jupiter Optimus Maximus: and when our own priests clave we to how, or the sacred monuments yet and holy Images: some we hid in the earth some we conveyed away into the neighbourhood Towns, and removed them out of our enemies sight. And albeit we were exposed and given over both of God and men, yet gave not we over, nor discontinued the service of the gods, And therefore gave they us our country again, they gave us victory, and the ancient honour of war which we had lost: and upon our enemies heads, who (blinded with co-ventional) in the weighing of gold brake both covenant and fidelity, they have turned all fear-fulness, all flight & slaughter. Considering then, O Quirites, by these great and apparent signs, & testimonies in the course of this world, what it is to serve God, & what it is to displease him, perceive ye not what wickedness we go about to plunge our selves into, being scarcely got forth and escaped out of the shipwreck and peril of our former sin and calamity? A City we have founded, and built, by the will of God and due observation of Anguys and Aulpiices, no corner therein, but full of religion, full of divine Majesty: and for solemn sacrifices, there are set daies when they shall be celebrated, there are places also appointed wherein they ought to be performed. And are ye about then, O Quirites, to leave all these gods both publicke & private? how fortith this deed of yours with that, which lately during the time of the siege, was seen within the: admiration of our enemies, than our own selves in that Noble young Gentleman C. Fabius?
When through the pikes of the Gauls, he departed out of the Cattle, and performed a solemn duty of the house of Fabius, even upon the mount Quirinal? What, can ye allow and like that the sacred ceremonies of private families, should not for so much as in time of war be interrupted: B but suffer now the publicke sacrifices and the Roman gods, in time of peace to be neglected, and the City abandoned? That our high Priests and Flaminins should be left curious and precise in the publicke service of God, than a private Citizen was in the Anniversary feast of his family and kindred? But peradventure some one may say, We will do the same at Secession, or we will fend from thence our Priests hither, for to execute that minitry. Neither of which can be done: faith ing the due observance of holy ceremonies. For, to say nothing in general of all other holy daies and of all the gods besides; in that one high feast and solemn dinner of Jupiter can a Pulvinar be celebrated, or a sacred Table be spread and spread in any place, but in the Capitol?
What should I speak of the eternal fires of Vesta, and of that Image, which is a pawn and security of our imperial state, is kept within the falsgeard of that Temple? What should I speak of those yours Ancient and Sustenamens? O Mars Graculans, and thon father Quirinal: are ye well contented that all these festival and sacred solemnities, which are all of equal time with the City, yea, and of more antiquity (some of them) than the foundation of the City should be fora-ken in a profane place? But see what od's there is between us and our ancestors? They left unto us, to certain solemn feasts and sacrifices to be celebrated in the Alban mountain and in Latiniurn, Was it then matter of conscience and religion that some festival solemnities were brought unto us from our enemies Cities to Rome? And shall we trample the fame from hence, to our enemies City Feis, without a great and bainous offence, that would require expiation? Do but call it to mind you pray, how often out feasts and sacrifices have been renewed and reformed clean, for that some one old accustomed ceremony, either by chance or for want of taking heed, hath been over-flipped and left out. And even of late, what was it else (after the strange miracle of the Alban Pool) reconciled our Common-wealth to di-verfed with the Vei-en war, but the reformation of our divine service and renewing of our Aulpiices? And more than this we as it were in remembrance of ancient religion and devotion, have both brought unto us from foreign gods, and also have instituted and devised new. What a notable and festival day was that in regard of the exceeding zeal and forward affection of the Matrons) upon which Queen Juno late translated from Veii, was dedicated in Aventine? And to Aulis Lornini, for a voice from heaven heard
heard in the new c统筹wee, offered a Temple to be erected. The Capitoline plates have we did to other solemn feasts & thence to have ordained and founded a new guild or fraternity, even by the advice of the Senate. And what need was there, that we should have done any of these things, if we meant, together with the Gauls, to leave the City of Rome? if we abode not in the Capitol (so many months while we were besieged) willingly and without constraint? And if we were for fear of our enemies, held back from going elsewhere? Thus much of our festival daisies and temples. But what shall become now, I pray you of our Priests? Never think ye once of it, what a full deed you are about? As for the Vestal Virgins and Nuns, it is certain, this is their only place, forth of which nothing ever could drive them but the winning of the City.

"The Flamin of Jupiter may not lie forth of the City one night: and will ye make these Priests of Romans to be one Veientians? And shall thy virgins indeed, O Vestas, leave thee now and shall the Flamin dwelling in a strange place, for every night he is absent, taint with so great impiety, both himself and the Common wealth? As for other matters, which we do with great solemnity by the direction of the Augurs (and all well near within the Pomeroy or compas of the City) how can we forget or neglect them? Namely, the Ward-lee or assembly of the Curator of matters of war: also the other of Centuries, wherein ye chuse your Conuls and Military Tribunes, where can they be held (if we respect the will of the gods and regard the Augusti) but in the places accustomed? Shall we remove all these to Veii? or shall the people repair hither from thence with so great trouble and inconvenience, to a defolate City, forsaken of God and man, whensoever they would hold those assemblies? But the present necessity (they will say) forceth us to leave a town that is built with fire, and wholly ruinous, and to go to Veii, where all hands are safe and sound, and not to put the poor Commons to the toils and charge of new building. That this is a pretence and cause rather devised, than meant in earnest, if I should deny nothing, I think appeareth manifestly unto you already, O Quirites, who remember that before the coming of the French men, whilsts you publicke buildings and private houses were whole, and whilsts the City stood upright on foot, this self-same motion was made and debated, as touching the removing to Veii. Consider now ye Tribunes what difference there is between mine opinion and yours: ye are of mind, that if it had not then been meet to be done, yet now verify it were good and requisite: I contrariwise (but marvel not I pray you before you hear what I will say) am of opinion that albeit we might have then gone, whilsts our whole City flourished yet now we were not to leave it thus ruinate & decayed. For at that time we had some cause to remove into a conquered City, namely, Victory, a glorious thing to our selves and our posterity, but this removing now, were reproachfull and shamefull to our selves, but glorious and honourable to the Gauls. For we shall not be thought to have left our country as conquerors, but to have loft it as conquered. And shall it be said, that our running away at Albin, the winning of the City, the besieging of the Capitol hath imposed this necessity upon us, as to leave our house and home and make flats to seek our own exile and departure out of that place which we are not able to defend? And were, indeed, the Gauls able to pull down and rule that City of Rome, which the Romans shall not be thought able to reedifie and set up again? What remaineth now in the state that should come upon us atthesth, with a new power of men, for certain it is that their multitude is incredible, & were willing to dwell here in this City by them conquered & by you abandoned, but that ye gently permit and suffer them? Nay,What and if not the Gauls, but your old enemies the Equians and the Volsci would remove and come to Rome, would you be willing to have them become Romans and your selves Veientians? Would ye not rather, that this defert and wait ground as it lieth, were yours, than to be a City peopled by your enemies? For I cannot see, I assure you, whether of the twain, were more to be defeated. And because (forsooth) ye are loath to fall to building, are ye resolved to abide these mischiefs? Thee shamful reproaches? if through out the whole City there might not be built a more commodious or statly house, than is that cottage there of our founder, were it not better to dwell in cottages like shepherds & peasants, so it be among your facred monuments and household gods, than all at once generally to go into N exile? Our ancestors and forefathers being a mixture of divers countries and no other than herdsmen, finding in these parts nothing but woods and bogs, in a short time built a new City out of the ground: and are we loath having yet our Capitol, our cattle safe, the Temples of our gods standing full to reedifie it now that it is burnt. That which every one of us would have done, if our houses had been fired, resolve we altogether to do in the common carefire of the City? Give me leave a little, What if by some villany, or by mischance here there should be a fireare at Veii & by reason of the wind (as it is oftenen) the flame spread & carried to consume a great part of the City, shall we go from thence by and by, and seek to Fidenus or Gabii, or some other City near at hand to remove unto? Is the very native soil of our country, and this ground which we call out our mother, of no power at all to keep us here, but doth the whole love and affection of O our country, rest in the superficial outside, and in timber and rafter of our houses? Verily, content I will unto you (although I take leas pleasure to remember the wrongs you did me than the calamity which I endured) when I was abient and in exile, to ofen as I thought of my country, all these things ran in my mind: the hills, the plain, the Tiber, the coasts all about, which was daily prospect and this air, under which I was born and brought up. All which. O Quirites, elect them move you rather now with an affection to them for to tarry till in this your habitation, than A than disquiet you hereafter, and torment you for the want and misf of them, when you have once left and forgone them. Nor without good cause both God and man have this place for the building of this City: most healthy and wholesome hills; a very convenient and commodious river to bring in corn and other fruits out of the inland parts, to receive provision of other viuats from the sea-coasts; the sea itself near enough for commodities, and not exposed and open by too much nearness to the dangers of foreign navies: the very heart and centre of all Italy, a place as a man would lay, naturally made, and only for that City to grow and encrease in, And that doth the very largeness and greatness of a City to newly founded, plainly prove.

It is now three hundred threecore and four years, and not above, since the foundation thereof. Amongst so many Nations of great antiquity, this long, ye have made war: and all this while (to lay nothing of particular Cities) neither the Volsciens together with the Etrurians populating so many toons, and those so strong, nor all the Horns so mighty by sea and land, and containing the whole breadth between the two seas, are in war to you comparable, Which being so, what reason have you (in the devil's name) when ye have had sufficient proof already of it to try again new experiments? considering now that albeit your valour and virtue may go with you elsewhere, yet surely, the good luck and fortune of this place can never depart and remove from hence? Here is the Capitol, where sometimes upon the finding of a man's head, answer was made by diviners and wizards, That in that very place should be the head of all punishment, and the imperial fear of the whole world. Here, at what time as the Capitol by the direction of the Augurs should be voided and cleared of all other Chappells Lady Juventas and god Terrors, to the great joy of our forefathers, would not suffer themselves to be stirred out of their place. Here are the fire of Hepha, here be the Scythian come down from heaven, here are all the gods; favorabla & gracious fill into you, so long as hereye make abode, and remain, Camillus in all his Oration throughout moved them much: but that part thereof touching religion (by report) was most effectual. But that which struck it dead, and put all out of doubt, was a certain word that fell out to be spoken fitly to the purpose. For at what time as the Senat a while after was gathered together in the Court Hefilia, to debate about these things and certain companies of fondlers that returned from their guards, chanced in the mean time to march through the market place, one Captain happen'd to speak in the Comitia, and said,

"Pitch down the enemy standard bearer, here shall be our best abode. Which voice was not so soon heard, but both the Senat being come out of the Council House, cried with one accord, That they took that omen for good luck, and happy presage: and also the Commons all gathered thereabout, approved the same. After this, when the foretold Act of transmigration was once clean daith and abolished, the City began to be built confidedly, and without order. Tile was allowed at the common charges: to dig either stone, or new timber, every man had liberty where he could, putting in forfeitures that within the compass of that year they would finish their buildings. The hasts they made, caused them to have no regard of drawing out the streets directly, whiles every man built in the void places without respect of his own or other mens ground. Which is the canie that the out-finks and vaults which first were conveyed through the common streets, now run every where under mens houses, and the form of the City seems th as if it were built at random (as every man could catch a place for himself) rather than distinctly ranged, and set out in good order since them.

The Sixth Book

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Sixth Book.

I containeth the fortune we were against the Equians, the Volsciens, and Tusciens. Four Tribes were added to the former, Stellatins, Sabbrina, Promencina, Amienius. M. Manlius, who had defended the Capitol from the Gauls, which he called with the dehs of those that were in danger of their creditors, and released such as were then imprisoned was commended of aspiring to be king, and thrown down from the cliff Tarpeia. In whose reproach a decree was made by the Senat, that none of the heirs of Manlius should be named Marcus. C. Licinius, and L. Sextius, Tribunes of the Common, proposed a law, that Confels might be chosen out of the Commons, who were created before from among the Nobles only. And after the Senators withstood them with earnest endeavour, yet by reason that for five years since the same Tribune continued the only Magistrates of the City, they went through with that law and got it enacted. And L. Sextius was created the first Consul that ever was of Commons. A second time there posiedlikewise, That no man might possess above five hundred acres of land.
W

That arises from the building of the City of Rome unto the taking of the fame, the Romans have achieved, first, under the government of Kings, afterwards of Consuls and dictators, Decemvirs, and Tribunes Consular, as well in the wars abroad as seditions at home: I have in five books declared, Matters obscure, both in regard of exceeding antiquity (as things that are far off hardly are discerned): also for that in those days there were very few writings and monuments, the only faithful safeguard, and true remembrancers of deeds past: and besides, whatsoever was registered in the Commentaries of the Priests, and in other public or private records, the fame for the most part, when the City was burned, perished with all. But now from henceforward, their civil affairs of policy, and maritall exploits in war, ensuing after a second beginning of the City (asspringing again with more fresh shoots and fruitfull sprouts from the root of the old stock) shall be delivered in more plain and certain manner.

And to begin with all, look by whom the first first was underpropped and set upright, upon him (as chief and principal) it still bare and rested: and that was M. Furius: whom the Romans would not suffer to give up his Dictatorship before one year was fully expired. As for those Tribunes (Consular) in time of whole government the City was lost, they liked not that they should call and hold an assembly for Election of Magistrates the year following. So the matter came to an Interregnum. Now while the City was buie in continual work and labour, about reedifying and repairing their buildings, Q. Fabius so soon as he was out of his office, was by C. Martius, a Tribune of the Commonwealth, arrested to make his answer at a day appointed, Who told to his charge, That he contrary to the Law of Nations, had sought against the Gauls, unto whom he was sent in embassage, and as an Orator only. But he avoided his judicial trial, by his death; and died to just against the time, that many men thought it was voluntary and wrought by his own hands. Then P. Cornelius Scipio first entered upon the Interregnum: and after him M. Furius Camillus the second time. He created Tribunes Military in Consuls authority, A. Valerius Publicola the second time; L. Virginius, P. Cornelius, A. Martius, L. Aemilius, and L. Postumius. These men presently after the Interregnum, were not so soon entered into office: but after all other things, they concerned with the Senate in matters concerning Religion and Conscience. And first of all they committed, that all the instruments of leagues and confederacies, the ordinances and laws after (as were the twelve tables & certain Statutes made by the Kings) should be sought up as many as could be found exact. Whereof some were published abroad, even amongst the Common people: but such as pertained properly to holy Rites, and divine service, were by the Priests and Prelates suppresse: especially, of purpose to hold the minds of the people in a reverent awe of religion and devotion. Then began they to reason and debate about the dismal dates, and the eleventh day before the Calends of August, so notorious for a twofold los: and overthrown, upon which day at Cremora the Fides were all slain, and after at Alba an unfortunate M. field was fought, even to the utter ruin and deolation of the City, they named of the latter misfortune, Alcuens: and set this unlucky mark upon it. That it should be reputed unmeet and inconvenient for any benign as well publicke as private. Some think, because upon the next day following the Ides of July, Sulpicius the Tribune Military could not by sacrifices find any tokens of happy speed, nor obtain the grace and favour of the gods; whereupon three days after the Roman host fell shamefully into the hands of the enemies: therefore, the morrow also after the Ides was interdicted, and men were commanded to forbear and abstain from doing sacrifices and thereon likewise, the day next following the Calends and the Nones, were by tradition held as ominous and dismal as the other.

But long they might not quietly sit about the devising of means to reform the Common-wealth, and set it upright again after grievous and dangerous a fall. For of one side the Volcanians, their old enemies, took arms, intending the final destruction of the Roman name. On the other side, the Merchants brought news, That the Princes and chief of all the Nations of Hatifria were banded and confederate together in a Diet held at the Temple of Pallas: to make war upon them. Besides a fresh and new fear came upon them by reason of the rebellion of the Latines and Hernicks, who after the battell at the pool Regillus, for the space almost of an hundred years, had continued fast in loyal league and amity with the people of Rome. Therefore being thus greatly affrighted on every side, that all the world might see apparently that the State of Rome was not only hated of her enemies but despised also of her allies; it was thought good and resolved upon, that by his direction and rule, the Common-wealth should now be maintained and defended, by whose conduct and guidance it was relieved and recovered: and that M. Furius Camillus should be created Dictator. He being declared Dictator, named Q. Servilius H. Il for Generall of the Horatians. And having proclaimed a law-feast (or vacation from Courts of Law) he took in all the younger fort and servicable men: but so, as the elder people were not left out, as many as were of strength sufficient for service: unto whom he likewise ministered the military oath of Allegiance, and enrolled them by hundreds in the muster book. When he had A had thus levied a power of men, and furnished them with armour, he divided them into three parts. The one he opposed against Hermina in the Country of Vef; another he commanded to be encamped before the City. Over these A. Manlius a Tribune military was made Captain: those which were sent against the Tuscans had L. Aemilius for their Commander, A third part he himself led against the Volsciens: and not far from Lavinium (the place is called Ad-Metum) he began to assail their Camp. The enemies had put themselves on this their journey, with a kind of contemptful contentment, as thinking the whole manhood in a manner of Rome, was by the French discomfited and routed. But when they heard once, that Camillus was the Lord General, it broke such a fear and terror amongst them, that they were glad to defend themselves by the length of their trench and rampier, yea, and to fence it round about with huge-piled heaps of wood and trees, that their enemies might have no passage to enter in upon their munitions. Which when Camillus perceived, he gave order to let on fire that Barricado which flood in his way. And as good hap was, the wind was high and blew full upon the enemy. So that not only he made way by fire, but also with the flames thereof that went toward the Camp, with the vapour like a smoke, and the crackling noise of the green wood, he so amazed & astonied the enemies, that the Romans had less ado to pass the trench and pallidado, into the Camp of the Volsciens, than in getting over the mound and entourage covered with fire. Having thus defeated and slain his enemies and won withall the Camp in the same brauns, the Dictator gave the whole spoyle unto the fouldiers, which to them was too much the more welcome, as they les hoped for it at their General his hand: who was never known to be lavish of gift, and over-liberal in dealing rewards.

After this he followed them that fled, in chase, waited and forraged their whole country, and at length (in the leventieth year of the war) he wholly subdued the Volsciens, and forced them to yield submission. For this conquest he departed from thence against the Equiens, who likewise made preparations for war. Their forces he surprized and defeated at Bologna, and affaile not only their Camp but also forced the City, and at the first assault won both.

But whiles fortune smiled thus, what way how Camillus went, as being the only play of the Roman state: on another side the fear of peril greatly encreased. For the Tuscans well near all up in arms, lay before Sutrium, and believed it being in league with the people of Rome. Whole Embassadors came unto the Senat to entreat for succour in their distress, and had a decree granted unto them, that the Dictator with all speed should relie the Sutrians. But being so straitly beleaguered, that they might not abide the delay of this their hope, that the townsmen, who but few in number, were over-weared with working, watching, and bloody fighting, (all which lay still upon the same men without intermission) they were driven by compulsion to surrender the City to the enemies, and being disarmed and left away with a sullen fate of apparel (after a pitious for all a-row) departed the town, and left their dwelling places. But fce, it fortuned that Camillus at the same time came in the very manner with the Roman Army and met them. At whole fce the multitude all forrowfully lay prostrate: their Nobles and chief men in this extremity felt to beseech him to be good unto them: the women and children which went along with them, as partakers and companions of their exile, beseeched them with woful tears and lamentations.

But he willed the Sutrians to forbear their mourning plaints, and give over their dolefull moan: saying that he brought the Tuscans heavy and weeping cheer. Then caufed he his fouldiers to lay down their packs and load the Sutrians likewise there to abide with a mean guard, and his men to follow him with armour and weapons only. Thus marched he forward with his Army lightly appoincted for ready expedition, and advanced before Sutrium. Where, according to his expectation, he found the enemies all careles and secure (as commonly it fell out upon a propeorous success). No warders, no corporis de grand quartered before the walls, the gates wide open, the Conquestors here and there latching, rifing and flinging the goods out of their enemies houses. So was Sutrium in one day twice won. The Tuscans (for all their former victory) were hewn in pieces on every side, by a new-come enemy. They had no timeto call themselves round nor gather together into one place, no, nor to take weapon in hand: whereas every man for life, made in all haste to the gates, if haply any way they might escape into the fields. But when they came thither, the gates they found fast shut, for the Dictator had given order above-hand, Herceupon some betook themselves to their weapons: others (namely such as happened to be armed when this sudden tumult surprized them) fell to call their fellows together for to begin a skirmish: which no doubt in that desperate case of the enemies had been hotly fought, not onely the Cri and Trumpets which were sent into all parts of the City, made proclamation to lay down their weapons, to spare them which were unarmed, and that none should have any harm but that which were found in arms. Upon this, even they who in that extremity and delpair were fully bent to fight it out, for hope of life on all hands hang about their weapons; and thus disarmed as they were (for as the case flood, it was the latter course) presented themselves to the enemy. A great number of them were belewed in several places, and were attended upon with good guards. And before night the town was delivered again unto the Sutrians, safe and sound without any hurt at all done unto it, as being not won by force, but intended upon composition, Camillus then returned with triumph into the City of Rome, victor at one voyage in three fundry wars. The greatest number by far, of prisoners, whom he led before his chariot in triumph, were Tuscans: whom he sold in post-fale at the spear, and raised such a sum of mony, that when he had had out of it repaid the dames of Rome; the worth of their gold, there were of the four pluses of thereof three bowls made of purple gold, which with the title and inscription of Camillus his name, were for certainty, before the Capitol was burnt to be seen in the chamber of Jupiter set up and bestowed at the feet of Juno.

The same year, there were enthralled and made Citizens of Rome, such Venetians, Capenates and Flancians, as in the time of those wars were fled to the Romans; and for these new Citizens were certain lands set out, Tho' also, who for idleness doth to build at Rome, were gone to Vesl, there to inhabit the vacant houses, were by an Act of the Senat recalled home from thence. And they at the first stumbled & refusing to obey but after that a day was set them & they threatened upon pain of death to return again to Rome, as soon as they were, and obtain all of them together now for fear every one became obedient, as Rome now increased in number of inhabitants, and became well populated, so on all hands in every place they fell to building new edifices; whiles the Common-wealth somewhat eased them of charges, and the Eides by verse of their office called hard upon them, halting them forward as to a publice works, ye and every man privately made all speed possible, according as each ones need required, to make an end and finish his own house. So as within the year the City was new built and stood on foot again.

At the years end was the great election held for Tribunes military in Consuls authority, Wherein were created T. Quinctius Cincinnatus, Q. Servilus Falco at the fifth time, Julius Thullus, L. Aquilus Cornutus, L. Lucratus Tricipitimus, Ser. Sulpius Raffus. One army they let out and led against the Aquilians, not for war with them (for they granted themselves conquered) but upon K meet sport and deadly hatred, to waffe all their borders utterly, and to leave them no power and strength to enterprize any new rebellion. The other, into the territory of Tarquinii. Where, two towns of the Tufcans, Cortona and Contember, were by assault won and rafed. At Cortona was no resistance made. For the Romans surprized them on a sudden, and at the first shout and impression they were masters of it: The town was sacked and burned. As for Contember, it endured the assault for some few daies: but the continual labours, walking neither day nor night overcharged them: whereof the Roman Army divided into six parts, sought in hours in the soldiers turns round one after the other. And the townsman being few, and those overroiled, were fain without any supply, to maintain their skirmishes. Whereupon at last they retreated back & yielded giving the Romans leave to enter the City. The Tribunes were of mind and thought good, that the L spoil should be confiscate to the common treassie: but the commandment and proclamation was more slack than their purpose on that behalf. For whilst they lingered and procrastinated time, the fondlers already had feasted in their prizes: and taken from them again without much offence and hatred the booty could not be. In the same year, because the City should not flourish in private buildings only, the Capitol was also built ofigured after Itono: A piece of work even in this to glorious estate, and magnificence of the City, to be had in price and esteemed excellent. And now before this time, the Tribunes of the Commons, whiles the City was busied about their buildings, began often to move for the Laws Agraria (about the division of the lands) in all their assemblies and speeches before the people. For to draw them on and to set forward their hope, they presented unto them very often the Pomptine Territory, which then above all others, so presently upon the inducing and subversion of the Volsciens by Camillus, was no doubt, the rightfull possifion of the people of Rome. Complaints were made, that those grounds sustained much more detriment and damage by the Nobility, than they had received before from the Volsciens. For they, so long only as they were able to bear arms and maintain war, made inroads thither: but the Noblemen forcibly entred and made havock in the possifions of the common lands: and unless (before they had let loose footing there, and got all into their hands) a diuision were made, the Commons should never enjoy one foot of ground there. Thence Remonftrances of the Tribunes little moved the Commons and both because few of them referred to the common place of assemble whiles they pried their buildings; and also for that money was away, and their purses too emptied in the charges of workmen, that they had little mind of holding those lands, which to flour N and flock they were not able.

The City was now given much to their devotions and religions, and the rulers also somewhat superstitious upon their late calamity: infomuch as they minded to renew the Auspicia [or the omen of prelages taken by bird-flight] for some errors supposed therein: and therefore they agreed that the government should return to an Interregne. So there were Interregnes one after another, M. Manlius Capitolinus, Ser. Sulpius Camerarius, L. Valerius Postrust, Valerius at length held the assembly for to elect Tribunes Military in Consuls authority and created L. Papirius, Cn. Sergius, L. Calpurnius the second time, L. Lucius, T. Valerius Publicola the third time. These presently after the Interregne began their government. That year, the Temple of Mars vowed in the Gauls war was dedicated by T. Quinctius, a Dunawt deputed for the executinge of holy duties, O Four Tribes of new Citizens were now adjoynd Stellattina, Pomoniae Sabatica, Arpinian, and these made up the number of the 25 Tribes. And now L. Sicinius a Tribune of the Commons, was in some with the people in greater number assembled together, about the Pomptine lands: and more enabled they were and forward to hearken after grounds, than they had been afore. And whereas it was moved in the Senate house, to make work upon the Latines and the Hernicks, that was not followed, but put off to a further time: by reason of preparation for a greater war.
The Oration of M. Furius Camillus to his companions in government.

A. He was already up in arms. And all was laid again upon Camillus his shoulders, who was made Tribun Military with Continius authority, and had five other brethren in office joined unto him. So, Cornelius M. Legienius, Q. Servilius Fideles in the first time, L. Quintus Cornelius, L. Horatius Flaccus, P. Tiberius. In the beginning of the year, the minds of men were turned away from the careful regard they had of the Tartar war, by reason that a number of people that fled out of the Pompeian country, came all of a sudden in great haste to the City, and brought word, that the Antians were up in arms, that the nations of the Latin had lent their able youth to that war closely underhand, thereby disavowing it to be any action of the State, and standing up on this point, that by the covenant there was no proviso, but that voluntary soldiers might serve in what wars forever they would. Now had the Romans been well taught, and learned to set fire no more by any wars. The Senat therefore thanked the Gods, that Camillus was in place of government, who if he had been a private person, was no doubt to have been nominated and created Dictator: yea, and his companions in office conceived frankly that he was the only man to have the sovereign and absolute Regimen of all, in case there were any fearful and dangerous war to ward: and were fully resolved to yield up all their interest in government into him, thinking it no disparagement at any time unto them, nor any loss of their honour and reputation, in conferring the same upon the Majesty of so worthy a person. The Senat highly commended the Tribuns, and Camillus was much beloved in his mind, howbeit he gave them hearty thanks, and spake in this wise.

"A weighty burthen (quoth he) I see is imposed upon me by the people of Rome, in that they have elected and nominated me Dictator now the fourth time: a greater charge is enjoyed by me the Senat: the whole state and body of which orders, hath delivered to me, in particular good opinion and judgement of me: but the heaviest load of all is laid upon me by the exceeding kindnefs and obsequious bemiety of those my honourable brethren and colleagues, if any painfull travel of mine therefore, and watchful care may be redoubled, I will entirely en- deavour, I will strain and strive to answer thereunto: that the opinion which the City with so great care hath conceived of me, right as it is exceeding great, so it may continue still and be perpetual. As to that war of the Antians, there are more brags and threats than any danger and peril from thence. But as I would counsel and advise you to be {335} on a war, so I would not have you to be careless and secure of any. The City of Rome is beter on every side: partly envied, and partly hated of her neighbour borderers. Need there is both of more Captains, and also of more armies, to manage the affairs of the Common-weal. I think it good therefore (quoth he) O Valesius, that you assist me in government and counsel, and have the leading together with me of certain legions against the Antian enemies. That you, Q. Servilius, with another army well appointed, and in readiness, ye{336}e{337}mented hard by the City side, having an eye and good regard, as either Hestusius, in the mean while, (as of late dayes) or the Latins and Hernicks (who trouble us now so much) break out and make some rising. Alas, I amí{338} the {339} that you will behave your self, and quit you in this service so worthily, as may answer the famous me- mory of such a father and grandsire as you have had, may becom your own honourable person, and thole fix Tribunships which you have already performed. As to: L. Quintius let him leave a third power of men, consisting of those that are by reason of their age, or otherwise excused for warre, and are above the ordinary age for military service, to be in head of a gen- tion for defence of the City and the Walls. Let L. Horatius provide harness, weapons, corn, and other necessaries for war, at all occasions whatsoever. Finally, O Sergius Cornelius, you are our fellow low Tribuns, ordain you President of this publick Council, the Censure and keeper of Religion and Church-matters, of general assemblies, of the Laws, and all other civil affairs of policy whatsoever. Now when they had all made promise, and that most willingly to do their endea- vor in performing their several charges, Valesius whom he had joined with himself in commis{340} sion, added moreover and said, That as he would take M. Furius to be Dictator, so would he be unto him again in head of his Colonel of Horsemen. And turning to the Lords of the Sen-

F. exalted them, that what opinion they had of one only Sovereign General. The fame hope they would conceive of the whole war. The Senat hereat took great joy and contentement, giving out their willingely with one accord; that they hoped exceeding well of war, of peace, and generally of the State. Neither shall the Common-weal (as they) everlasting in need of Dictator, so long as inch Magnificats be in place, so jointly agreeing in one mind together, so indifferent and ready as well to obey as to rule, and rather yielding their proper praise to the ho- nour of the Common-weal, than dismembering and plucking from it to their private glory and re- pection.

After a Vacation or Law-fleeled proclaimed, and the Mufflers taken and past: Furius and V. le- rius let forward to S. Hermius: whether the Antians had not only lent the flour of all the Voluci, the choice youth out of a fresh, fry and new generation; but also had raised a mighty power of Latins and Hernicks, out of those Nations that by long peace were most fresh and lusty. These new enemies and old thus combined together, troubled the minde of the Roman solducer, and made him to flare. Which when the Centurions reported to Cato Has, as he was Marching and leaving his birets in array; and that in these terms I say, that the hearts of his sol- diers were disquiet and dismayed, that they took themselves but slowly to their weapons, made staying and idling when they should come forth of their tents, yea, and that there were some of them overheard to say, that, They must fight one to an hundred, and that to great a multitude of their their enemies (if they were unarmed) might hardly be encountered, much less being so well armed and appointed; he mounted pretently upon Horaceback, and rode before the enemy, and turning himself afront his army, traversing between the ranks and arrays; 11 What heaviness is this my fouldiers (quoth he) what means this strange and unwonted lagging behind? Why? Know ye not your enemy? Know ye not me? Or, know ye not your own selves? The enemy, what is he else but the perpetual matter and jubjeé of your valour and glory? And ye again are the men, who under my conduct (to say nothing of the winning of Palerim and Veii, and of the slaughtering of the Gauls Legions, put to the fword by us, even when our native City was by them taken, and they matters thereof) of late, and but the other day, made a three-fold triumph, upon a triple victory, over the fame Volscians, Equians and people of Hercuera. What, do ye not agnize and accept me for your General, because no Dictator, but as Tribunum. I gave you the watchword, and put out the banner of battel? For mine own part, I stand not much upon a futile and sovereign command over you: no more likewise should ye regard ought else in me, but mine own felf. For never yet did my Dictatorship make me haughty and let me up aloft, no more than my banifhment abated my courage and call me down. We are the fame mentiffall of us: and since we are come to this war, furnish’d with the fame means that we carried with us unto the former, let us look for the fame event of our service, and no worse. So loon as ye shall encounter and joy the battel with them, perform each one that which he hath been taught and wanted to the journey lurely will be ours, and they (no doubt) shall run away. Then after he had founded the battel, he alighteth from his Horace, and caught the eniign-bearer that ftood K next him, with his hand haled him forward against the face of the enemy, crying very often aloud, On afore with thy banner. Port-ennign, and advance forward, fouldier. When they law that Camillus in praffon a man well kept in years, and thereby weak to perform the parts of bodily strength, put himself forth against the enemy: all at once they prefled forward, set up an outcry and shouted, every man calling upon his next fellow, to follow their General for fame. Over and befides, some fay that by the commandment of Camillus, there was an eniign flung into the very battel among the enemies. Whereupon they of the forefront, betrilled themfelvesamily to recover it again. And thereby were the Antiates first discomforted, and the fear not only came upon them in the vanguard, but entred alfo and reached as far as the rearward, that it stood ready for supply. And as the violent force of the fouldiers, provoked by the presence of their Captain, much troubled the enemy: fomethings more daunted the hearts of the Volscians, than the very fight of Camillus himself, when they chanced to eapie him. So furely carried he the victory with him, which way foever he went! And that appeared moft evidently in this, That when he law the left wing at the point to give back and run away, he took himfelf in all haft to his Horace, rode thither with his light foomans buckler, and with his only prefence renewed the fight, fhuing unto them how the reft of the battel had the better. Now were the enemies put to the worft, and the victory en- clined to a fide. But their multitude both hindered themfelves in their flight: and also a long piece of work the wearied fouldiers of the Romans had to put to fo great a number, all o the battel. But behold, there fell a great tempest of rain all of a sudden, which powred down with fo mighty winds and storms, that it rather put them by the execution of allured victory, than parted any M battles or layed the fight. Whereupon the retreat was founded: and the night ensuing, whiles the Romans were at rest, made an end of the war. For the Latins and Hernicks fortook the Volscians and departed home, with as ill speed, as their enterprife was bad. The Volscians feeming themselves abandoned and left in the lutch by them, (upon whole truth and confidence they had rebelled) quit the camp and field, and put themselves within the walls of Satricum; whom Camillus at first began to besiege, cafting a trench and rampamer about them, raising battilions and pal-toforms against the Town. And feeing his munitions and fabrics by no tallying forth of the enemies impeached he supped there was no fool courage in them, that he should need tof and so long about the hope of victory: and thereupon, encouraged his men not to wear themfelves out in a redion: and toilful piece of service as if they lay at the fiege of Veii: affuring them that the N victory was in their hands already: and so with exceeding cheerfulness of his fouldiers, he fett ladders upon every fide scaled the walls, and enterd the Town, Then the Volscians flung away their weapons and yeeled themfelves.

But the General mind his was bent upon a greater exploit, and that was the winning of Antium, being the fear Town of the Volscians, and from whence the beginning of the late war arose. Howbeit because to frow the City might not be won without great preparation of artillery, ordina- nce & engines of battery leaving his colleague behind him with the army, he went himfelf to Rome, to perfwade with the Senat, for to destroy and rafe Antium utterly. And whiles he was emapling with them (in which the will of God I believe, that Antium should fland still & continue longer) there came Ambassadors from Neper and Satricum craving aid against the Tuscians, saying: That it was more than high time, that they were fuccourcd and relieved. Upon which occasion it fell out, that Camillus was withdrawn thither from Antium. For feeling that those two Towns flood even against Hercuera as it were the very keyes and bar-gates from thence both the enemies laboured to gain them fiorc-hand, against the time that they went about to make new wars: & the Romans also held it a matter of great consequence, to refuse and defend thofe frontier Towns. The Senat therefore thought good to be in hand with Camillus, for to leave Antium: and to undertake the war with the Tuscians. The City-legions under General Quintius were appointed unto him,
And albeit, he rather would have had the leading of that army, which lay now in the Volscians Country, and which he had good tryal of, and were acquainted better with his government, yet refused he nothing: only he required to have Valerius his salliet still, and joined with him in commissio, so Quintus and Horatius were sent to succeed Valerius in the Volscian war. Ennius and Valerius took their voyage from the City to Saturnia, and round the one side of the Town polled already by the Volscians. On the other side, the Townsmen, for that the enemy had dropped all passages between, hardly able to repel the force of the auxiliaries. But the coming of the Roman aids, and the presence of the enemies as Allies both for the present gave them heart to abide the brunt, and till it to that B were before at the point to give over; and also gained time and respite to come in with fresh supplies and succours, Caesarius therefore divided his forces, and gave direction to his collegue, for to bring about his power, to that side which the enemies he did, and there to make an allay: for not so much for any hope he had by scaling the walls to win the City: as by withdrawing the enemies thither, not only to cale the Townsmen of their toil, and give them a breathing time (who were now wearied with auxiliaries) but also to get himself some opportunity and vantoge, to enter the City without skirmish and resistance. Which being put in execution on both hands accordingly, and performed at once: the Tuscans before with a two-fold fear round about, seeing the walls assailed most fiercely one way: and the enemy got within the Town another way: lying out at one gate (which as it happened was not before) and in great haste all together fought to escape away. But as they fled, they were slain by heaps both within the Town and abroad all over the fields. The greater number were killed within the walls by Ennius and his soldiers. Vedere his men were more ready and nimble in the chase, and gave not over the execution until the night came, that they could not see and discern them.

When Saturnius was thus recovered and restored again to their allies they led forward the army to Nepet: which Town the Tuscans held wholly, as surrendered already into their hands. Every man thought it would be a base piece of work to win that City again: not in this regard only, that it was fully in the enemies possession, but also because some of the Nepetines, by treachery had yeelded it up. Howbeit, they resolved to send unto the heads and principal citizens, that they should fether themselves from the Tuscans, and perform on their behalf truly and faithful loyalty, like as they had craved and besought at the Romans hands their friendly help and protection.

From whom they received this answer again. That it lay not now in them to do anything at all, for that the Tuscans kept the walls, and warded the gates. Wherupon they first terrified and served the Townsmen with foraging and spoiling their territory: after that, seeing they made more reckoning of keeping their faithful loyalty to their enemies unto whom they had lately surrendered, than observing the league with their friends, which they had long before concluded; they provided themselves out of the fields of a number of Egypts, of brushwood, and in like trouts, and so approached the City with the army filled up the ditches close to the walls, let ladders to, and at the first shout and assault given, the Town was taken. Then proclamation was made, that all the Nepetines should part with their armour and weapons, and so many as were found unarmed, should be pass. But the Tuscans as well armed as unarmed were put to the sword every one. As for the chief authors that perverted the Nepetines to deliver the Town to the enemies, they were beheaded. The harmin multitude had their good: restored, and so the Town was left with a garrison. Thus the two Tribuns (Conular) having regained out of the enemies hands two confederate Cities, returned in great glory to Rome with their victorious army.

The same year the Latins and Hernicks were required to make amends for harms done, and restitution of goods wrongfully detained: and the cause demended why of late years, according to a covenant in that behalf provided they had forth no loundics to the Romans wars. Answer from both Nations in their solemn Councils was returned: That neither the fault was general, nor proceeding from counsel of the State in case of some of their youth served under the Volscians: and yet themselves had well paid already for their Lewd and rash projects, in that no one of them was come home alive. And as to the not sending forth of loundics, the cause was, for that they were in continual fear and danger of the Volscians: which noisme plague (as it were) sticking to clothe unto their sides, until they could be rid of, notwithstanding so many wars one in the neck of another. When relation hereof was made unto the Lords of the Senat, they thought so well of their answer and excuses, that they deemed they had quartel and occasion good enough to war upon them, if they might have had while and time as well to follow it.

In the year following, when A. Manlius, P. Cornelius, Titus and Lucius Quintius, both Capitoles, and L. Papirius C. for the second time, were Tribuns Conular, there arose a grievous war abroad, and a more dangerous sedition brake forth at home. The war, from the Volscians banded with the Latins and Hernicks, that were fallen away and revolted. The sedition (where it was least feared) between a porsonage of noble lineage descended of great name and reputation, M. Manlius Capitolinus. Who being a man of too lofty and haughty a mind, destit of all other of the Nobility, and envied one above the rest, M. Ennius, so Singular, as well in regard of his honourable dignities, as his worthy parts and commendable vertues. He could not brook and endure, that he only should ever be Lord General in the field: who now was excited to high above others, that even those who were created with him in equal authority, he accounted not as his peers and fellows, but employed as his Ministers and Servitors. "Whereas (quoth he) if "men would weigh right, and duly consider every thing, M. Furio could never have delivered "his Country from the feige of the enemies, had not the Capitol and Cattle cliff been saved by "me afore. Camillus set upon the Gauls, when they were amased in receiving their gold, when "they were upon terms of peace, and their hearts quiet and secure: whereas my self bashe them "away whilsts they were in arms, and at the point to win the Cattle Hill. In that exploit of Ca-"millus the fouldiers, had each one his share proportionably of the glory, who together with "him did their parts: but in the service performed by me, no earthly creature was fellow and "partner with me. With these conceits he fed his own humour, and puffed up his proud spirit, "being withal by corrupt disposition of nature, hot and hafty, arrogant and insolent. Difconten-"ted besides, that of the Nobility, his gifts and qualities were not esteemed of that worth, as in his "own judgement they deserv'd: first, of a Senator he became popular, and began to break his mind, "and impart his designs unto the Magistrates of the Commons: finding fault with the Nobility, and "complaining of them: soliciting and inveighing the Commons, to call allying and favour towards "himself: caried away with the vantage of the peoples opinion: not guided by fage counsell and "discretion: and in one word, chusing rather to be of great name, than of good and honest re-"port. And not contenting himself to deal in the Laws Agrarie, about the division of Lands, "which had always minister'd to the Tribunes of the Commons matter enough of mutinies and le-"ditions: he began to intermeddle between the debtors and their creditors, and to overthrow all "keeping of credit. And indeed, deep debts are sharp goods, and prick fiercely: threatening "not only poverty and shame, but also terrifying the bodies of free men with hard imprifonment, "little else, and Irons. Now there were exceeding many in debt (a thing most dangerous and "hurtful to men, state) even of the richer fort: by reason of their great expenses defraided in build-"ing. The war therefore of the Volscians, which was it fell of great importance; but much "more, in regard of the Latins and Hernicks Rebellion withal, was in how pretended, as a cause "to seek for to have a more foreignd and absolute power to govern the State: but in truth, these "new deignonments and plots of Malinus, rather than the war, forced the Senat to creat a Dicta-"tor, And A. Cornelius Caffius being created, nominated for his General of Horie, T. Quinctius Ca-"pitellus. The Dictator, albeit he saw a greater contention toward, at home than abroad; yet "were it that the war required some speedy expedition, or because by victory and triumph, he "thought to make his Dictatorship more mighty and powerful) he took mutters, and set forward "into the Pomptine Land, into which parts he had intelligence, that the Volscians had proclai-"med their forces, to repair. I doubt not, but they that read in so many books already, of these continual wars fought with the Volscians, besides their tedious laticy of reading, will mufle allo at this (which to my elf was "likewise a wonder, when I perused the writers that lived near about the times of these acts) how "these Volscians and Equians, so often vanquished and defeated, were furnisht with supply of "fouldiers to maintain their wars. But seeing by the ancient Chroniclers it hath been overpaflied "with silence, what should I alledge, but only mine own opinion and bare conjecture, which every "man hath liberty to put in for himself? Likely it is, that either between the times of wars (as now "we we in the Roman mutters) they used to breed up one supply under another, of the younger "fort, to the maintenance and remmey sof oftentimes of their war: or that their armies were not always "levied out of the fame States: albeit the wars go under the name of one and theself-fame na-"tion: or that those countries yeelded in those dayes an infinite number of freemen, which now are "well near waft and defart but for some Roman slaves, which keep those parts yet from being void "and diploed, as having but a very small seminary, or none at all, let of serviceable fouldiers. "Certainly, the Volscian army, as all authors agree, was very great at this time: albeit of late "dayes by the leading and conduct of Camillus they were fore weakened, and their strength much "abated. Besides, there were with them in field, the Latins and Hernicks, some of the Circians-" and other Coloners from Pedare. The Roman Dictator having that day pitched his camp, and N "the next morrow come abroad with happy tokens of good peace from the Birds: having also "flain a sacrifice, and procured thereby the favour and grace of the Gods, in joyous manner shew-"ed himself unto his fouldiers: who according as they were commended, were ready early in the "morning, by break of day in arms, attending the sound of Trumpet for battle. The day is ours "(quoth he) my valorous fouldiers, if either the Gods or their Prophets can forcere light events, "Therefore as resolute men of affured hope, and such as shall encounter with farrneren than our "selves, pitch we our javelins down at our feet, and draw our swords only. Neither would I "have you to run out of the main battle, and to give the charge, but to keep your ground, to "stand fliated, and abide the first shock of the enemy. And when they have spent their volley of "flot in vain, and shall with full force come upon you as you stand, then brandish your swords, "and let them glitter in your eyes, and think every man of the Gods that they will help the Ro-"mans. The Gods I lie, which in happy hour, by the lucky approbation of their Birds, have "sent us into the field to fight. And as for you, O Quintius, keep your Horfemen close to-"gether, marking advasely the first beginning of the skirmish: and when you see the battles "buckle togetherspell-mell, and come to hand-ctrokes, whilsts they are busied and occupied one "way, fright them another way with your Horfemen, ride among their ranks as they fight, and "break their arrayes. Thus fought both Horie and Foece according to his direction. And,

The sixth Book of T. Livius.

A as the legions wanted not a worthy Captain, no more misled the Captain of happy speed. The multitude of the enemies trusting upon nothing but their own number, which they measured and compared together only by their eye, interviewing both the one army and the other, rashly gave battle, and as rashly gave over again, in thou art only and liot themselves hot and eager at the first encounter; but were not able to abide the sword-fight, the closing together foot to foot, and the fiery countenance of their enemies, which for the very heat of their courage, shined and glistered fully in their eyes. So the foremost being put back, a faint came upon them likewise, that blood fled before supply, and withal, the Horatii for their parts set to and fought most terribly. Whereupon the ranks of the enemies in muddy places were broken and all set out of order, as their battalions seemed to fly and wave up and down to and fro, in suchcase whether to fight or fly. Afterwards, when they saw the formost litten down and slain, and every one thought no other but his own turn was next to be killed, they turned their backs and fled. The Romans came forward still and chased them. And so long as they went their way stern and thick huddled together, it was the footmen work to pursue them: but when it was perceived, that they flung away their weapons on all hands, and that the enemies army fled dispersed all abroad in the fields: then were the troops of Horatii set out after them, with this caveat and charge, to make no stay and forlet the time, by killing them one by one, and to give the main multitude of them in the mean while sufficiently relief to escape; but that they should content themselves, only to let fly some shot amongst them; and by fearing them to hinder their running; and when they were ridden beyond, to cross upon them and faile them, until the footmen might overtake them, slay them down right, and make an hand of them clean. Thus fled they, and thus were they followed in chase until night. The very same day was the Volscian camp taken and ransacked, and the whole pillage, besides the bodies of free men, was given unto the footmen. The greatest part of the prisoners were Hermicks and Latins: and those not of the common sort, and such as might be thought to have served for pay: but there were found among them certain young Gentlemen of good mark, a plain proof and evidence, that the Volscian enemies had aid from them by the publick and general warrant of the State. There were known also to be among them some of the Circians: yea and certain of the Velieric colony likewise. All of them were sent to Rome. Where being examined before the chief of the Senators, they confessed every one in plain terms, the robbing of their own Nation like, that they had before bewrayed it unto the Dictator. The Dictator still kept his forces together within the standing camp, making no doubt, but that the rulers and Senators of Rome would determine to war upon those countries.

But even at that time a greater heap of troubles which arose at home, cau't him to be sent for to Rome, by occasion of a sedition which grew daily more and more: and by reason of the Author thereof (a man of quality and note) was more tested than any usually had been more time. For now by this had M. Manlius not by speeches only, but by plain deeds also, (which in outward show seemed popular and plausible) shewed evidently upon what troublesome and tumultuous spirit all proceeded. For seeing upon a time a Centurion, of good worth for his service in war, condemned in an action of debt, and upon an execution of judgement carried to prison:

E he in the midst of the Forum came running unto him with a rout and crew of his followers and retinue, laid hand on him, and took him perforce from the officers: and after he'had given out some words along touching the pride of the Senators, the cruelty of the sufferers, the calamities of the Commons, the valour and present dittres of the party; Marry then (quoth he) have I done a great deed, to no purpose, in having the Capitol and the Castle with this right hand of mine, if I could abide to see my fellow sufferer (as it he were taken prisoner of the Gauls by way of conquest) had away into bondage and captivity, and laid up fat in gyves and fetters. And therewith openly in fight of all the people paid the whole debt down right on the nail, unto the creditor: and so after the usual and solemn ceremony by a brazen piece of coin and the balance, he set him at liberty out of the creditor his hands, and let him go at large; Who prayed heartily to God and man, to require accordingly M. Manlius his only deliverer, and the very patron and protector of the Commons of Rome. And when he was once got into that unmerciful and seditious tong, he presently himself set all a mudding, swerving the fears of his wounds received in the Venetians and Gauls wars, and in other services one after another: saying, That whiles he thus followed foudiery, and rebuilt the house that was destroyed, he became indebted, and that so deeply (by reason that the interest always overgrew the principal, which he by that means had paid and paid again) that he was not able to creep out of the sufferers book, but was plunged therein over head and ears. And now behold (quoth he) by the only good-ness of M. Manlius, I have the liberty again to see the light of the Sun, to behold the Commonwealth, to look my neighbours and fellow citizens in the face: at his hands I acknowledge to have received all the benefits that mine own parents could give me unto him I vow what ever in me is left, and in his quarter to spend that little life and blood which remaineth in my body: and in one word look what privilege I may enjoy in right of my country, and in the communion of the Gods, publick or private, the same do I impart and communicate with that one man. By these speeches the Commons were set on and pricked forward mightily, as wholly devoted unto one person; and who but Manlius now in every man's mouth? And presently in the nick he entred into another action that tended more effectually to mar all quite, and to set every thing out of order. His Land in the territory of Veii, which was the chief and capital, Manor of his inheritance, even the fairest flowers of his garland, he set upon sale, causing it openly to be cried: and said withal, I will not O Quirites, so long as I have one foot of ground, or any thing else left, to one of you condemned and upon execution carried to prison. This set them so a flote, that they were ready, as it seemed, to follow him as the only protector of their liberties, in any action, were it right or wrong, they cared not which way, was all was one with them. Besides, at home in his own house, he spared not to call out flandous speeches against the Senators, as if he had been at the open Cross, making Orations. Amongst which, without all regard whether he spake true or false, he let fall their words, "That the Senators kept in secret certain hidden treasures of the Gauls gold, and were not now contented to hold in possession the common grounds, but they would also embelze the treasure publick, which if it came abroad, the Commons might soon be acquitted and discharged of their debts. This gap being once laid open, and this light given the people, they thought (ye may be sure) an unworthy indignity, that when there was gold to be levied for redemption of the City out of the Gauls hands, it should be gathered by a general contribution of all: and the same gold, now recovered from the enemies, should be as a prey in the clutches of a few. Therefore they followed instantly upon him and were very earnest to know, where so great a maxi of mony and gold was good had been. But when he posted them off, and said he would in due time disclose all: they were not content, but setting all other matters apart, their whole care was employed about this business, and nothing else. So as it plainly appeared that neither he should reap a mean thank if he reported a truth, nor incur a small offence and displeasure, in case he told a false tale.

Things hanging thus in these doubtful terms, the Dictator who was sent for, returned from the army into the City. The next day he assembled the Senate: and after he had thoroughly considered and felt the minds of them, that were there met, he commanded the Senators nor to depart from him: and assisted as he was with that company, he carried the Ivory chair of estate to beter in the Comitium or common Hall, and lent a lever for M. Manlius. Who being thus peremptorily summoned by the Dictator express command gave warning by a token to his complices and favourites, that there was a broil and fray toward: and with a mighty return of his followers, he presented himself before the Tribunal. On the one side, stood the Senators, on the other the Commons: either part beholding their Captain, as it were in a pight field ready to joynt battell. Then after silence made, "Wou'd to God (quoth the Dictator unto M. Manlius) I and the Senators of Rome, might in all other things fort as well with the Commons, as I am affermed, we shall agree all together about thee, and the matter which I shall ask and demand of thee. I fee thou haft put the City in some good hope, that by the Gauls treasure which the principal and chief of the Senators detain with them secretly hidden, all men may keep their credit, and lully pay and discharge their debts. Which I for my part, to God me help, am I far from hindering, that contrary wise I would exhort thee. O M. Manlius, to esate the Commons of Rome of the utters book: to discover these fellows and make them known, that Gale go greedily after the common treasure, and to disappoint them, and turn them out of this their pritty booby. Which if thou do not effect, either for that thy self would have a fexe with them or else because it is but a forged tale that thou haft made of thine own fingers ends I will not fail, but commit thee M to ward, and suffer no longer the multitude upon a vain and deceitful hope, thus by thee to be abused and disquieted. To this, Manlius made answer and said, "I was nothing deceived but witt well enough, that a Dictator was created not against the Volscians, who are enemies (forsooth) so oft as our great Maffeirs think it for their purpose: nor against the Latins and Hermics, whom they drive and provoke to rebellion by false and forged humties: but against my self and the Commons of Rome. For now I fee well, that the Dictator professeh to maintain and bear out the Utiner against the Commons: and that against my self, for the favour that the multitude beareth unto me, there is matter devilled to charge me withal, and to procure my utter ruin and overthrow. Doth it offend and grieve you indeed, O A.Cornelius and you my Lords of the Senat, that the people thus stand about me on every side? Why do not ye every man for N his part, by your good devers divide aloneder this company, and draw them away with you from me? Namely, by your mediation and intercession, by giving your word for them, by bidding out of gyves and prison your fellow citizens by having them that are condemned, from being awarded to the thraldom of their creditors, and out of the overplus and superfluity of your own living and goods by relieving their present need, and supplying their necessities? But what mean I to per wade you to forgo anything of your own, and belowe it upon them? Take another course with them, and make them another offer. Do but deduct out of the principal debt, that which hath been paid, for consideration of the loan: you shall soon see that my remitte will make no greater flew, than any other mens else. But why am I the only man so careful of the citizens and people? Certain, I can make no better answer hereunto than if one should ask me, O wherefore I alone saved the Capitol and the Cliff? As I then yeilded my helping hand to all in general so will I now to my power relieve each one in particular. For as touching the treasure of the Gauls: the thing in itself being easy, this demand of yours maketh hard and difficult. For what need you ask me that which you know already your selves? Why lay you not that open which is in your leeter bottom, rather than to have it fitted and bolted out? but that there is some privy jugling, some cunning practife and packing therein? The more ye would seem to have your leger demain to be fought into and detected: so much the more, I fear me, ye will hide
A hide it even from the eyes of those that are watchful and quicksighted. And therefore am not I to be forced to reveal and shew where your stolen goods are: but you would be made, if you were well served, to bring them abroad into the view of the World. At their words, the Di-tator commanded him to leave off these foolish vapourings and trifling shifts: urging him either to go through with his challenge and prove it true: or if he could not justify it, to confess that he had falsely slandered and wrongfully charged the Senate, and sought to bring upon them the ill will and hatred of men, for a vain furnic and filipution of Theevry. But as he stoutly and ardently and fiercely replying, that he would not speak at the pleasure of his enemies, nor owed them any such service: he commanded him to be had up to prison and kept in bonds. And as he was apprehended by the Officers, "O Jupiter (quoth he) Optimus Maximus, I love Queen of heaven.
Q Minerva, with other gods and goddesses, that inhabit the Capitol and the Caile: Suffer ye your Knight and Defender, to be thus tugged, misused, and evil encreased by his adversaries?
And shall this right hand wherewith I defeated the Gauls; and draw them from your Chap-pels and shrines, be now pinnedon and manaced? There was no one man there, that law and heard him, who could induce this indignity. But this City, as most pattern of all other Cities to abide any just, righteous and lawful commandment of the Magistrate, contained her self, and was content in some cases to be overruled: so far forth, that against the authority and absolute power of the Dictator, neither the Tribuns of the Commons, nor the Commons themselves, durst either call up their eyes to look away, or once open their mouths. But after M. Marins was committed, it was for certain known, that a great fort of the Commons, changed their weal and put on their worship apparel and mourning array: many a man let his head and beard grow long; yea, and a number of them withlad and heavy cheer, kept commonly about the Guard-door.

Now when the Dictator triumphed over the Volksians, his triumph bred him more hatred and displeasure than honor and glory: for it is commonly spoken, that he got it at home and not abroad, and triumphed over a citizen not over an enemy: and this only wanted, (lay they) to make up his pride to the full, that M. Marins was not led before his charriot. Whereupon there was like to come much confusion and sedition. For the appealing and mitigation whereof, the Sen-at upon a sudden, without any motion made, of themselves became bountiful, and affigned 3000, citizens of Rome to be sent to Saturiens to inhabit as a Colony. And to every man was let out a two acres and an half of Land spacie. Which the Commons continued to be a matter of nothing, a small boon bestowed upon a few, the very hire and reward for betraying M. Marins.
So that this proved a milchfor a remedy: and by this salve, the sore rather suffered and rancled, and was healed up, and the sedition thereby fretted more and more. For now the crew of M. Marins his followers made shew of greater mourning and heaviness, in their vile clothes and bad convenience, after the guise of perils accuated during the time of their troubles. And when the fear and terror was once overblown, by reason that the Dictator after his triumph resigned up his authority, then folks hearts were set at liberty, and their tongues walked at will. Some were heard in open audience to upbraid the multitude and call in their teeth, "That it was their fafions always to life up and advance their Protectors and Defenders into high places, and afterwards, in the very pitch of danger and point of downfall, to forsake and leave them delutiue. Thus was Sp. Caius servd, that solicited the Commons to the division of lands: thus was Sp. Nelles overthrowne, that put his hand to his purse, and at his own proper charges kept extream famine from the hungry jaws of the poor citizens. Semeably, M. Marins endeavouring to deliver a great part of the City (drowned as it were, and overwhelmed in debt) and to enlarge them and let them abroad at liberty, now for his pains is betrayed into his deadly enemies: so that the Commons do feed and starve up, even for the shambles and butchers knife the fautors and mainrainers of their weal and liberty. And ought indeed (lay they) a Noble man, that sometime had been Conul, thus to be mistyled, if he answered not to the good liking and pleasure of the Dictator? Suppose, he had over-reached and made a lie store, and so had not a present and ready answer at the time; was there ever any servand and slave, for leasing cat in prison and laid up in Irons? And how could they forget that night, which was like to have been the last night that ever the Romans should have seen; that fatal night of their final distrugtion for ever? Or how could they chuse, but have still in their eyes the army of the Gauls, climbing up the Cliff Tergeste? and how M. Marins in petition, so bravely beleen in his armour, all sweating, all bleeding roistered and saved Jupiter himself in a manner out of the enemies hands?
What? Did they think that with half pound measures of wheat meal, they had sufficiently re-compenced the Saviour of their Country? And whom they had well near canonized among the holy hallows of Heaven, or at least wise by his new addition of furnucre made equal to the

G Iuper Capetiunim, was it well done to suffer him, imprisoned in chainslying in a dark dungeon.
A to draw his lively breath at the pleasure of the Hangman? Was he alone able to succour you all, and are ye all not able to help him alone? Thus ceasd not the multitude to exclaim and make their plaints, and would not depart from that place, no, not all the night long, but threatened to break the prison by force; until such time as they got that remitted, which otherwise they would have wreted, and M. Marins by an act of the Senar was releasted out of prison and enlarged.
Whereby the mutiny was never the more ended, but rather a Captain given them to maintain the Sediton.
About the same time the Latins and Hernicks, the inhabitants also of the Colony Cirtica, and they of Pelletre, who came to excuse themselves for the Volitican war, wherein they were charg'd to have had their hands, and required to have the captives delivered, for to proceed against them, according to their own Laws, had a heavy answer. But the Coloners received the sharp check and rebuke, because they being Roman citizens, were entred into that wick'd plot and abominable action, to combine against their native Country. And they were not only deny'd their prisoners, but also (wherein the Romans dealt more favourably with the rest that were their Allies,) were warred and commanded in the name of the Senat, to avoid and that with speed out of the City; from the right and presence of the people of Rome; for fear lest the privilege of Embolage, provided for the security and safe conduct of strangers and not of citizens, should not serve to protect them. Now when the Sedition of Matalius was set on foot again, somewhat before the end of the year, the great assembly was holden for the Election of Magistrates: wherein there were created Tribuns in Consuls authority Serg. Cornelia Molugenus the second time. P. Valerius Poatinus the second time. M. Favoris Camillus the fifth time. Ser. Sulpicius Russius the first time. C. Papirius Carfus; T. Quintius Cincinnatus the second time. all of the Senators calling.

In the beginning of this year, peace they had with foreign nations; a matter very commodious both for the Senat and the Commons. For the Com. in this regard, that being not called away by any mutters, they had some good hope; especially having to mighty a champion to be rid at once for ever of Unity. For the Senators again, because their minds being not distracted by any fear from abroad, might attend about curing and healing the intestine maladies at home. When both parts therefore were now more sharp set, and eagerly bent, they thought out of hand to try what would be done, and to make either a fright or a bolt of it. Matalius calling the Com. to his house, devised with the principal heads of them both day and night, to bring in a change and alteration of the State: and fuller of homack, anger and gall he was now a good deal than afore-time. Netel he was, the rather by his late disgrace and shame, who never before had been touched in credit, nor talked of any reproach and contempt. He took him to heart, for that the Dict, durst not execute that rigor against him, which Cincinnatus Quintius had extend upon Sp. Melinus and it deemed unto him, that not only the Dict, sought to wind himself out, and in reigning up his room, to avoid the offence given by his imprisonment; but also that the very L. Senat was not able to endure the manner of proceeding. With these imaginations being put up and galled too, he failed not withal to prick forward and exasperate the minds of the Commons, who of themselves already, were kindled and set on fire. And with these and such like speeches he entertained them. How long (quoth he) I pray you, will ye be ingrannant, and not know what ye may do, and what power ye have? A thing that nature itself would not have so much as the very dumb beasts, but to understand. Do but count how many you are in number your selves, and how few adversaries ye have against you. If ye were but one to one, yet (I would think) you should more eagerly strive for to maintain your liberty, than they, to set up their Lordship. For, look how many favours ye have been, following and courting one patron, to many shall ye now be opposed to one enemy. Make but shew only of war, ye shall have peace, M. Let them see ye once ready to make head and offer violence, soon will they yield and part with their right; Either ye must adventure, all joyntly together to do somewhat, or else make account each one, to abide and suffer all. How long will ye stand looking from every side upon me? For my part, sure, will not fail any one of you. Look ye then to it, that fortune fail not me, I, even I, that was your redeemer and deliverer, was all at once, when it pleased mine enemies taken down and made no body. And ye, all of you law him led into prison. who make every one of you from prison. If happily those mine enemies should attempt to do me more spite, Where am I then? and what were I bent to rustle unto? Should I look for that end that Cassius and Melinus came unto? Ye do well to signify how you dread the preface, and with the contrary. And the Gods forbid that it should so come to pass. But look not that ever they should come down from Heaven to protect me. That mind they mult give you, to preserve me from so hard a hap, like as they gave me a restful heart, both in mine armour to save you from barbarous enemies, and in my gown to defend you from proud citizens. Is there so little courage in you (to mightly a people otherwise) as to think it sufficient, and to stand contented, if you may be backed only, and meet with some help against your enemies; and to know no other thing with your adversaries (the Senators) but wherein you suffer your selves to be commanded in the end? This barbarous cometh not to you by kind. By life and custom only, you are become their vaiffs and subjects. For what is the case ye are so courageous against your enemies abroad, that ye think it meet and reason to rule and govern them? No other in truth but this, because with them you have been ever wont to strive for so-crafty, whereas against these ye have been used rather, to make some flight proof and tryal what you may do by your liberty, than to do your belt, and to put your felvesthirt for to maintain it and extend it to the molt. And yet what manner of captains forever ye have met withal to lead you, and howsoever affected ye have been your selves. obtained ye have hit thereon all things that ye shot at, were they never to great: Such was your might, or such was your felicity. Wherefore now it is high time to give the adventure of greater matters also. Make but tryal only of your own good fortune, and of my self, whom I hope ye have had happy experience of already: with less ado shall ye be provided of one to over-rule and command the Senators, than ye have been hitherto of those, that were to refift only their imperious government. Down we must with their Dictatorships and Consulships both, and lay them levell with the ground: that the commonalty of Rome may once be sloth, and bear up the head. Bellir your selves therefore, and play the men. Hinder process and course of law for actions of debt, I profess my self a Patron of the Commons, which name my care over you, my faithfulness to you, hath induced me with. And if you please to entitle your leader and Captain, with a more glorious title of honour and Majesty, ye shall find it more potent and available to effect that which you long for and desire. And so from that time forward, began some practice to set up the Government of a King: But neither who were the agents in this action, nor to what terms these plots proceeded, is it plainly enough recorded. But on the other side, the Senators sat in Council, and debated about the Session and secret meeting of the Commons in the privy house of M. Manlius, and that house, which stood (as it fell out) upon the Castle Hill: Likewise of that immortal engine and fabric, devised for the overthrow of the present liberty. Many were of opinion, and spake it aloud, That there was need of a Servilus Holder, who not by commanding a publick enemy of the State to prison, would provoke him and make him more eager; but by dispatching of one wicked member out of the way, and cutting him off might end this intestine and civil war, but they came down at length, and grew to a resolution, in words milder, yet indeed and effectual one, That the Magistrates should have a careful eye, that they might discern plots and practices of M. Manlius, the Common-weed incurred no damage and curst. Then the Tribunes in Consuls authority, and the other Tribunes of the Commons (for even they also seeing, that in the loffe of the publick liberty of all, their power likewise should come to an end, had yielded to be advised and ruled by the Senat) laid all their heads together, and consult what course was best to be taken. When as no man could think of my way, but plain violence and bloodshed (a piece of work in all appearance, of great adventure and doubtful hazard) then M. Menenius, and Q. Publius, two Tribunes of the Commons stepped forth and said, What mean we to make that, a quarrel between the Senators and Commons, which the whole body united of the City, indeed should industriously to dangerous and polluted a member. Why trouble we ourselves to set up him and the Commons with him, wherein the means of the very Commons themselfes is it were the safer course, and less offensive to all? That being purchased and overweighed with his own power whereby he prefummeth, he may fall down and take his overthrow. We are fully minded to arrest him, to convene him judicially, and call him to his answer. Nothing is lees popular, and more odious to the people, than to hear of Kings government again. The multitude shall not so soon see and perceive, that our quarrel is not with them, but that they shall become his competent Judges, and pass upon him, who now are his Advocates also, that his accusers from out of the Commons, shall behold one of the Nobility to hold up his hand at the bar, and the indictment framed, upon the crime of usurping the Kingdom: but (ye be sure of it) they will tender and favour, the fair looks and concern of no man, before the counsel of their own free estate. When all the house liked ill, and allowed of this advise and overture, they made no more ado, but served Manlius with process to answer at a day appointed. Which was not so soon done, but the Commons at the very first, began to form and be enraged, especially when they law the accused man, during his trouble to hastily arrived, accompanied with none of the Senators, nor so much as one of his kindred and affinity, no nor his very brethren Ao and T. Manlius. A thing before that day never seen nor known, but that in so great a danger as this was, the nearest kinsfolk in blood, did change their weed. For even when Ap. Claudius his adversary, yes, and the whole lineage and name of the Claudii, were mournfully clad, and poorly apparelled. Now rarel (lay they) it is a very compact amongst all this, that this popular man, so gracious and wellbeloved, should be confounded and overthrown, because he was the first that ever fell away from the Senators to the Commons. When the day was come of his arraignment, F I find in no author, what was objected against the prisoner by his accusers, directly tending to prove the crime of aspiring to a Kingdom; but only the concocteries of the multitude, certain libellous words, his overmuch largess, and his forged libellous and fallacious assertions of the gold. I doubt not but there was matter of great importance, urged and enforced against him, seeing that the Commons delay in proceeding to his condemnation, was not long of his censure, but occasioned by the place only. This one thing seemeth worthy to be noted, and for all men learning, that how notable and how great wares of his honor, worship, and commendable parts were; the tott and cursed desire of tyrannical rule, made not only unpleasant and without grace, but also odious and detestable in the eyes of the people. He brought forth, as it is reported, weenier four hundred men, whom he had laid out money for gratis, and without any interest or consideration: To these whole goods he gave from port-tale, and kept from the bondage of their creditors, after they were condemned. Over and besides, he not only reckoned up, but shewed also in open sight, the honourable testimonies of his service in the wars: as the spoils of his enemies by him slain and dismembered to the number of 30, gifts bestowed upon him by Generals in way of reward 40, amongst which were two goodly mural garlands for scaling and erecting upon the walls first: eight diaphanous coronets for saving the lives of citizens in danger. Moreover, he presented there in person, the parties themselves in person, whom he had rescued out of the enemies hands, and amongst them he nominated C. Servilus at that instant General of the Horsemens, and now abdant.

abient. And when he had rehearsed his noble feats of arms, and amplified them according to the height of their worth in a most glorious and eloquent Oration, as one whole words were iterable and unanswerable to his deeds: at the last he flirip his breast bare, and shewed the scars there remaining of wounds received in the wars: and ever and anon looking to the Capitol, very often he called aloud upon Jupiter and the other Gods, to help him now in this extremity and peril of his state: and prayed that the same mind which they had given him to defend the Capitol, and even to the safeguard of the people of Rome, they would touch the fame people, in this direft of his woful calamity: bequeathing them both all and some, to look up to the cliff, and to the Capitol, to turn themselves toward the Gods there, and to proceed to judgement of him. All the whiles the people were cried and called by their Centuries, and the prisoner stretched forth his hands, and converted his prayers from men to the Gods; the Tribunes evidently law that unless they freed the eyes of the people by beholding the memorial of so great a daier, it would never be that so long as their minds were thus foc-called and possessed with that benefit of his, they would find the endimont, were it never so true. So the matter being put off and deferred to another day, the people were summoned to assemble in the grove Pecuian, without the gate Flumentans, from whence they might not have a sight of the Capitol. There the accufation prevailed more than composition, and the matter went against him: and with hard and obdurat hearts, they pronounced a heavy and dolorous sentence, and which the very judges themselves had in horror. Some there be that say there were Divinities ordained for the purpose, to make inquisition and fit upon this treafon against the State. Thus being condemned the Tribuns caused him to be thrown headlong down the rock Tarpeia. Which place was the self fame that yielded to that one man a monument and memorial both of singular glory, and also of extreme punishment and ignominious death. After his death there remained two infamous marks behind him of fame: the one public, occasioned by his dwelling house. For whereas it was situate, where now the chappel and work-house, or mint-house of Monetis standeth, an Act was proposed into the people. That none of the Senators image should dwell on the cliff or Capitol Mount. The other proceeding more properly from his own line and kinred: For that by a general decree of the house of Morti it was provided, That none of that family and race should ever after bear the name of M. Manlius. This was the end of him, who, but that he was born in a free City, had been a right worthy and renowned man.

But the people being now past all danger from him, calling to mind and considering without all affiction, his virtues as they were, found a mife of him shortly after. Yea, and for the patience which ensued upon, for that there could be no causes known of to great mortality, was imagined of many a man, to have grown upon the execution of Manlius: argufing thus, That the Capitol was polluted with the blood of the Saviour thereof: and the Gods took no delight and pleasure to have (as it were) presented unto their eyes, the punishment of that man, by whole means their Temples had been delivered out of the hands of the enemies. Upon this plague and scarcity of corn withal, and the common brute that spread abroad both of the one and the other, there ensued the year following many wars, when as L. Vatius the fourth time, A. Manlius the third time, Sert. Sulp. in the third time, L. Lucertius, L. Annius the third time, and M. M. Tribunim were Tribuns Military in Consulis authority. For besides the Volcannis, who by defline were appointed for ever in a manner to bury and keep occupied the Roman foildiers besides the Colonies Circius and Felice, which a long time were about to rebel; besides Latmum that stood in doubtful terms and was suspected, the Lamuvines also, who had been a motl fail and loyal City, all of a sudden rose and became new enemies. The L. of the Senat supposing all this grew upon contempt, for the that the revolting of the Veliterns, who were their natural citizens, had so long time escaped punishment, decreed with all speed to move the people to denounce and proclaim open war against them. And to the end that the Commons might be more forward in this Military service, they created certain Quinqueviri for the division of the Pompeian Lands: and Trinomii for the planting of a colony at Nepit. Then they propounded unto the people, that N. of them would appoint and determine of the war to be made. And notwithstanding the Tribuns of the Corn, laboured earnestly, but all in vain, to dissuade, yet the tribes throughout generally granted it, and gave their voyes for war. All that year passed in preparations only, but no army set forth by reason of the plague: which protracting of time and long delay, gave the inhabitants of the Colonies libert to intruce unto the Senat for peace. Many of them were in lined and stood thus affected, to send a 1000 men embassage with humble supplication to Rome: but that (as commonly is saideth our) the publick peril was entangled and interessed with the jealousy of some private persons: and the authors of the backsliding and revolt from the Romans, fearing left they alone should bear all the blame and be delivered up as a sacrifice to satisfy the wrath of the Romans, turned away clean and alienated the Colonies from all constitution of seeking for peace. And not only in their Council-House was this Embassage then crossed: but many of the Commons also they desired to invade the territories of Rome, to drive boories, and make pooll. This new wrong by them offered, clean put them by all hope of peace. In that year was the first rumour raised concerning the Rebellion also of the Prentifins. And when the Tusculans, Gabines, and Lati- canes, into whole marches they had made invades, complained unto the Senat, and laid much matter against them they received at their hands to calm and cool an answer, that it seemed they gave no credit to their complaints, because they were not willing they should prove true.
The sixth Book of T. Livius.

A The year following, Sp. and L. Papirius, new Tribunes Military with Consuls’ authority, led the legions to Velitri, whole four Colleagues, Ser. Cornelia Malignomen the fourth time, Q. Servilius, C. Sulpio, L. Aemilius the fourth time, were left Tribunes behind for defence of the City; and for fear left they should hear some intelligence of new and fresh risings out of Hurritus, where they suspected all would be caught. At Velitri they had the better hand of their enemies: they there found more Preneptus well near, that came to succour, than the very Colouers themselves. For the City was so near at hand, that it both gave the enemies occasion to fly the sooner, and yielded them the only place of safe refuge, after they were fled. The Tribuns forbore to assault the Town, as well in regard of the dangerous enterprise, as also for that they B thought it not good to hold tight to the utter destruction of that Colony. Letters were dispatched to Rome with tidings of victory, implying more sharp informations against the Preneptus than the Velitrans. So by an Act of the Senate and allent of the people there was proclaimed war against the Preneptus: who in the year following joined with the Volitans, and for they were Preneptus a Colony of the people of Rome, notwithstanding it was manfully and valiantly defended by the Townmen even to the last; where most beantly and ertelly they exercised their victory upon those that they took prisoners, and put to them the sword. The Romans took this in a very ill part; and elected M. Furius Camillus Tribun Military the thirteenth time: who had for his companions in office, A. and Lucius Posthumus Reggellafia, L. Furius and L. Luctatius, and M. Fabius Ambullus.

C The Volitan war was appointed to Camillus extraordinarily: and to assist him therein, it fell to L. Furius his lot, once of the State-Tribuns, not so much for the good of the Common-weal, as to minimish unto his fellow all matter of honour and renown; as well in publick, (for that he set all upright again, which by the rafflins of Lucius was fallen down) as also in private, for that out of his error and mildoing, Marcus Furius, rather sought for thanks and love at his hands, than aimed at any vain glory to himself. Camillus was now far grown and kept in years and very aged, and when in the assembly for Election, he was about to take the usual form of oath, for to excuse hiscience and crazy body, the people with one consent would not permit him. Howbeit for all his age, he carried a lively spirit and lusty courage with him still: his fenes were as fresh and found: and the late civil affairs had stirred him up and gave him an edge, who now had no great mind to manage martial exploits. So he gathered a pover of forces, confilling of 4000. apiece, and made proclamation that all his forces should be ready the next day, at the gate Epsilina, and then he put himself in his journey to Scurium. The enemy that had won the Colony, nothing dismayed them, and tilling in the number of his foudlers, wherein he had the better by ods, expected and stayed his coming there. And so soon as he understood that the Romans approached, forthwith came into the field, minding without delay to put it to an hazard and try it out: presuming, that the skill of the Romans General, were he never so singular (in whom their enemies only trusted) would little or nought avail in regard they were so few in number. The Roman army was as hot as they, and one of their Generals as forward every way. And presently without any stay, had they tried the formne of a battle, but for the policy and rule E of oneman; who by holding off, and prostrating time of sight, fought so to help himself through good order and skill. But so much the more the enemy urged still, and was more fierce: so as now he not only ranged his men before his own camp in batter array, but also set forward into the mids of the field: and advancing himself with enigns displayed, near unto the extremity of his rampier of his enemies; made a proud bravado and show of his strength, wereupon he bare himself to confidently. This could the Roman foudlers hardly endure: and L. Furius one of the Tribun Military, had more ado by far to digest and put up that at the enemies hand. And a serious Knight he was, both by reason of his youthful years and natural disposition: and also cut off with hope of the multitude, which commonly take heart, and proceeds upon extremity uncertainties. And the foudlers being of themselves else-

F ready not enough, he inflamed and set them more on fire, by elevating and making light of his fellows reputation, in regard of his old age, the only thing that he could alledge giving out ever and anon. 4 That wars were for youngmen, that mens hearts flourished and failed as their bodies did: which was seen in Camillus, who of a most valorous and forward warrior, was now become a draw-back and a remorter, and one that would take his leisure: and he that was wont, so soon as he came to a place, with the first assault to win Forts and strong Towns, now within his mares and rampier sat still and trilled out the time. And what hopes had he? Dreamed he, that either his own power should encrease, or his enemies strength decrease? What occasion, what opportunity of time, what place of vantage for ambit he do for? Tho’ thefule policies and inventions of the good old man, are cold and dull God wot. In faith, C Camillus, as he hath lived long enough, to hath he gained glory enough. To what purpose then (quoch he) should we suffer the whole puissance of a City, which ought indeed to be immortal, to age and was old with the body of one man, whom all men see to be but mortal. With these and such like words he had drawn away the whole camp after him: and when from all parts thereof they called hard and cried for battle: 5 We are not able (quoch he) M. Furius 6 it, nor to keep in and represse any longer the violence of our foudlers: and as for the pride of the enemy, whole courage by our delays we have encreated and whomintereth over us it is inseducible.

Give place then, you that are but one man, and yeeld unto us all. Suffer your self to be over-

L. Furius to his foudlers.
The sixth Book of T. Livius.

44 come with reason and counsel, that you may sooner overcome by force and arms. Hereunto 45 Camillus made answer again: What wars ever (quoth he) unto this present day have by mine 46 own entire conduct, and sole direction been managed; neither can you nor the people of Rome 47 deny, that in them you never repent, either of my policy or happy success. Now I know 48 full well, that I have a companion joyned with me in government & rule of equal communion: 49 for the prime and luttines of youth, much above me, and my better. And as to the army, I have 50 indeed been used ever to command; and not to be commanded: but yet my fellows authori-51 ty, I cannot be against. Let him do in Gods Name, what he thinketh good for the Common-52 weal, and God speed his hand. Only in regard of mine old age I crave this favour, that I may 53 not be set in the forefront: but for other labours, look what an old man may or ought to do t 54 in war, therein truly I shall not fail. And this one thing would I crave at the hands of the im-55 mortal Gods; that some notable mishap befall not to make my former counsel good and pratic-56 worthy. But neither would men be ruled by his advice to profitable and wholesome, nor the 57 Gods will have to bear his prayers so holy and devout. Then Lucinus further, the author and prin-58 cipal perfwader of bataill, leteth the vanguard in array, Camillus he fortifieth the Regiments and 59 Squadrons for supply in the rearward: but above all, he placeth a strong guard before the camp.
60 Himself took up his standing on a higher place, to behold and mark the issue of another mens 61 counsel. So soon as at the first brunt and encounter, they ruttled and made a noife with their ar-62 mor, the enemies on purpose (of policy, and not for fear) gavefooting and lost ground. Now, 63 there was behind them on their back a pretty rising of an Hill between their camp and the batai-64 ll: and by reason that they were well floced of men, they had left behind them in the camp certain 65 strong companies armed and well appointed: with this intimation that whiles both armies were 66 hard in fight, and when their enemies should come near their trench and rambier, they might tally 67 out on a suddien upon them. The Romans following out of measure upon the enemies as they re-68 treated, were drawn upon the disadvantage of the ground, and gave occasion and fit opportunity 69 unto the enemy to illuse out of the camp upon them. So the terror returned upon the supposed vi-70 tors, by reason both of the new supplyes of the enemies, and also of the fall and defect of the 71 Hill: and forced the bataill of the Romans to give back. The Volscians that charged them from 72 out of the camp, and were fres and lusty, prest hard upon them: they alfo that made as though 73 they fled, began now to fight again. The Romans foildiers forgetting now both their late lost 74 losses, and their ancient honour, retired not easily and fosily in good order, but plaintext them 75 backs on all sides, fled amain by heaps, and ran away toward their own camp. Whereas Camillus 76 being by them that attended about his person, mounted upon a good Courier, and with all the 77 speed he could make, opposing the Squadrons of the rearward against the enemy. Is this (quoth 78 he) the fight, you soildiers, that ye so call it for? what God, what man can ye lay the weight 79 on now? It was your rashnes and fool-hardines afore; and it is your dastardly cowardice 80 now, and nothing else, that is the cause of all this. Followed ye have already one General, 81 Follow Camillus now a while: and as ye have been always wont by my leading, once more 82 win the victory. What look you toward the hold and the camp? there is nothing coming thither.
83 there is no being there for any of you without victory. At the first they were ashamed, and 84 fled themselves from farther flight: but after that they saw once the enemys wheel about, and 85 the Squadrons turn again, they made head, and charged the enemy amain. And the General 86 himself, a man renowned for so many triumphs, and besides, for his venerable age so revered, even 87 amongst the formost enemys, amid the greatest perils, and most diftresses, advanced forth in per-88 son. Hereupon every one for his part, let the better leg forward, provoked his fellow withal, and 89 encouraged one another, so as with a cheerful and lively shout, the whole field rang again. Nei-90 ther was the other Tribun behind hand for his part: but being sent by his College unto the 91 Horsemen (whiles he in the mean time marshalled again the Volscian in order) not by way of 92 chiding (for what might he avail thereby, so long as he was himself in fault as well as the rest?) 93 but laying aside all Lordly command, fell wholly to entreating, and comforted them both all and 94 none to quitt themselves like men, and acquit him of the guilt and blame of that unlucky dayes 95 work. Indeed (quoth he) when my brother Camillus would not agree thereto, but expressly 96 forbade, yet I chose rather to be a partaker of the folly and rashnes of all, than the wildomde 97 and paffe advice of one. Camillus (come what will of it, spced you well, or spced you ill) feeth the 98 glorious life will be: but I, unless the bataill be revived, shall take such part as you all, (a most mi-99 nerable and pious cause) but the flame will redound and light upon my head and none else.
100 Well, at length they agreed, and thought it best to abandon their Horses to let them down among the 101 waving and disordered companies, and on foot to make head upon the enemies. Thus they go 102 both together, as bravely minded with revolution, as they were richly and gorgeously armed. And 103 in what part ever they law the footmen most disordered, there wanted neither in the General 104 nor in the soildiers, courage in the highest degree to fight it out nobly. Well was it seen by the 105 happy event, that valorous and undesirous speed ever well. For the Volscians the same way that 106 erewhile they made semblance of giving ground upon a counterfeit fear, now fled in good fidenes 107 as hard as they could. Great number both in the conflict, and after in the chale were slain. As 108 for the rest that remained in the camp, which pretently at one brunt was won, more of them 109 were taken prisoners than killed. In the view & account taken of the captives, there were some of 110 them known to be Tulsicans, who were levered apart from the rest, and brought before the 111 State-
A State-Tribuns. And upon examination, confessed truly, that they served by the publick warrant of the City, Camillus herewith disquieted, for fear of war from to near neighbors, said he would forth with have those prisoners with him to Rome, that the Lords of the Senate might not be ignorant how the Tusculans were revolted from their society. In the mean while, his brother Tribun might, if he so pleased, have the regiment of the legate and the holt. That days work had taught him now, not to prefer his own ways before the better counsel of another. And yet neither be him who, nor any man else in the army, thought that Camillus would quietly digest this fault of his, whereby the State of the Commonwealth was driven upon so dangerous a point of downfall. And as well in the holt, as also at Rome, it was rife and current in every mans mouth: that whereas the fight with the Volcii was variable, and the service doubtful: for the ill speed, the discomfiture, and the running away, L. Furius was all in fault: but for the good successes, Camillus only had all the honour.

When the captives were brought into the Council House, and the Lords of the Senate were of opinion and determined war against the Tusculans, and had laid the charge thereof upon Camillus, he requested to have an affiant joined with him in Commision: and being left to his own choice to take whom he would of all his Companions in office, contrary to all mens expectation, he chose L. Furius. By which moderation of his affections, and good carriage of himself, he both delayed the intamy of his Colleague, and won himself great glory and commendation. Yet for all this, proceeded not they to any war with the Tusculans. For they by their constant observation of peace, kept off the violence of the Romans, which by force of arms they had not been able. When the Romans entered and invaded their territory, they went not so much as out of those places that lay near the high way, whereas the enemy marched: they forter not the tilling of their grounds, but kept the gates of their City wide open, came forth solemnly in their long gowns to meet with the L. Generals in the way, and brought victuals right courteously to serve the army, as well as all of the City as Country. Camillus having pitched down his tents before the gates, and devious to know, whether there were the fame appearance of peace within the walls, as bare flew abroad in the Country, entered the City and seeing the doors standing open, the shop-windows up, all kind of wares for sale at the gates within the gates, and the Craft-merchant and Artificers busy every one occupied at his work: the Grammar-schools ringing again with a chorus of Scholars, learning and faying their lessons: the streets full of women and children amongst the other common people going in and out and about their business: he could perceive no where about him anything that carri'd a semblance of fearing men, no, not so much as of those that made any wonder at their coming in that warlike order. Thus call he his eyes into every corner, feeling where this war should be. For there was not so much as an token by being, either of ought removed out of the way, or brought in place, upon this present occasion: but all in so settled quietness and peace; as if they had scarcely heard any inking or rumor of hostility. Being therefore overcome with this patience and suflerance of the enemies, he caufed their Senat to assemble, unto whom he spake in this wise: "Ye alone to this day of all that I know, O Tusculans, have found the only armor of proof, and the forcible fenee indeed, to save your selves and all ye have from the Romans ire, E Go your ways to Rome unto the Senat there, The Lords of the Council wil weigh and consider, whether ye delivered more punishment before, then pardon now, I will not foretell and pick my elf a private thank for a publick benefit. Army hands ye shall have this favour and liberty, to speak for your selves and plead your own cause: as the Senat will think good, so shall you speed of your suit. After, that the Romans come to Rome, and their Senat (who but a while before had been faithful Allies and kept their allegiance) seem to stand waiting with heavy cheer, and giving their attendance at the entry of the Court and Council Chamber: the Lords of the Roman Senat, were presently moved thereat, and caufed them forthwith to be called in, and received by way of hospitality, more like than hostility. Then the Dictator of Tusculum made this speech and said: "Right honorable Senators, we against whom ye have proclaimed and made war, F Forth to encounter your Generals and Legions, armed and appointed ye fee us at this present standing in the porch of your Council House. This was our array, this was the habit of our Commons, and always thall be, unless at any time we shall put on arms for you and in your quarrel. Thanks we yield to your Captains and to your Armies, that they have beleaved rather their eyes than their ears: and where they saw no hostility at all, there they offered none themselves, That peace which we have sawned and observed, the fame crave we humbly flill at the hands of your Clemency. Turn we befeech you from us your forces thither, where war is to be found. And if we must needs make trial (by suffering ought) of your patience and power bent against us, we will try it purely without armor. This is our full resolution. God grant it prove as fortunate, as it is well meant and proceeding from a fingle heart. As for the trephins where-upon ye were moved to denote war against us: although it be boldness and to no purpose to disprove that by words, which by deed is already proved: yet surely, were they never to true, as we think verily, that without prejudice to our selves, we may lately confess the fame, since that we have so evidently represented thereof. And for ye, so long as ye be worthy to have so full satisfaction made it shal le nor, what damage or transgression be committed against you. Thus much in effect spake the Tusculans. At the very instant they obtained peace and not long after, the right of free burgage, to be made Citizens of Rome, So the Legions were withdrawn back again from Tusculum. Thus Camillus having won great honor by his policy and valour both, in the Vol.
The Tribunes against the Senec.

The Tribunes were this year need of Seniors also, by reason especially of the doubtful rumors that ran concerning debts: whilsts of the one side the Tribunes of the Commons did aggravate the grievances thereof; and made it seem an odious matter; and they again of the other side, did elevate and made little of the fame; for whom it was good and beneficial, that the lent money should be thought abroad, in danger of being lost; for that (say they) the debtors cautiously rather would not than I for ability could not, keep their credit and make payment. So there were created Seniors, C. Sulpitius Camerinus, Sps. Posthumius Regillius. This matter now already commenced, was broken off by the death of Paphianus, because it would have bred a scruple to the other Senioir in the room of him deceased. When Sulpitius therefore had resigned up his place, it fell out to that other new Seniors upon some error committed in their creation, excused not their office; and to chuse a third time they made a scruple, so tender confideration were they, as if the gods were not well pleased with that office for that year. But the Tribunes would not endure this deluding of the Commons, but gave it forth that it was intolerable: saying, "That the Senate fought to avoid the exhibiting of publick records and books, which gave testimony of the valuation of every man's substance to the worth: because they would not have the sums of debts to be seen and known, which might bewray and plainly shew, that one part of the City was ever eaten up and devoured of the other: and in the mean time the poor Commons so deeply engaged, were packed away, and lent forth against these enemies and thos: and now without all regard and distinction, they sought occasions to quarrel and make war in every place. From Antonius to Satrium; from Servium to Vbiare, from thence to Tusculum your Legions been posted. And now, forsooth, there is war intended against the Latins, Hernicks and Preneftins: for hatred rather of the Citizen here at home, then of the enemies abroad: and all to wear out the Commons with continual wars, and to afford them so breathing while within the City: that in time of rest, they might remember and think upon their freedom, keep their rooms in common assembly, where they might at the length hear their Tribunes voice pleading for the safe- ment of utility, and for a final end of all injuries. But and if the Commons had the heart, and carried that mind with them, as to call to remembrance their ancestors liberty, they would further any Citizen of Rome to be awarded to bondage for debts, nor any matters for to be taken, until a view were made and just accompt had, of every man his debts, and some conscience taken for abating the same: that each man might know, what he had of other mens goods, what remained of his own: whether his body were left free, or at the mercy of his creditor, to lie in cold iron and baleful prison. This hire and salary of sedition, this reward once propounded aforehand, stirred up (you may be sure) a mutiny soon after. For whereas there were many adjudged to be bound unto their Creditors, and the Senators had decreed new Legions to be believed, for the bruiz and rumor that went of the Preneftins wars: both matters began to be hindred for making any effect, as well by the Tribunes help as the Commons accord. For neither would the Tribunes suffer those that were condemned to be led to prisition: nor yet the younger sort of the Commons, enter their names in the Metter-matter his book. And the Senators for the present, left minded the execution of judgement for the Creditors behalf, then the murthering. For why? News came already, that the enemies had put themselves in their journey from Preneftis, and were encamped in the Sabines country: And all this while, the very tidings hereof rather quickened and provoked the Tribunes of the Commons to the broil that was begun, than frightened them any jot from it. Neither would any thing serve to quench the sedition in the City, until the war was come in manner to the very walls. For the Preneftins had intelligence given them, that in Rome there was no army gathered, no General certainly known: the Senators and Commons N at jar and together by the ears. Their Captains hereupon, taking this advantage and opportunity, with a running camp invaded, spoilt and wasted the fields all afore them as they went, and came with banners displayed before the gate Cullius. Great fear was in the City, every man cried Alarm, ran up to the walls to man them, and to the gates to ward them. And at the last they left their mutinies, turned to the wars, and created J. Quintins Cincinnatus Dictator. He appointed for his General of horsemen. A. Sempronius Aeronius. This was not so soon voice abroad. (so great a terror went always with that magistrate) but the enemies withal disabled and departed from the walls: and the younger sort of the Romans, without any trifling and drawing back, upon the proclamation, gatherd together. Whiles forces were thus arising at Rome, the enemies pitched their camp not far from the River Alia: and as they forraged the Country about, they bragged and vanned among themselves, that they had got that very plot of ground, which was ever fatal to the destruction of the City of Rome: Here will say they, the like sight, from hence will they fly, no doubt, as sometimes they did before in the Gauls war. For if the Romans feared that dismal and unlucky day, noted with the infamous name of this place; how much more will they dread the river Alia! it feldin memorial of their so great overthrow. than the only bare day Alia? Certainly, when they are come hither, they will think they see again the grim looks, and hear the hideous voices of those savage Gauls. Thus rolling & toffing with A with themselves these toiyuh conists, tinge of as vain and foolish predistions, they refled wholly and reposed their full hope in the lucky preservation only of the place. The Romans contra-ristive knew full well, that their enemies the Latins, were (where over they were) the very fame men still, and no other, whom for the space of one hundred years they held peaceable and quietly as their devoted vallis in subjection. And as for the place noted indeed, for the memorial of that late defeat and los in ity, might it therefore rite them up and let an edge upon them to abolish and cancel the remembrance of that Shameful disgrace, then put them in fear, that any ground should be so unfortunate, as to be a bar unto their victory. Nay, if the very Gauls themselves came now in their way, they would so fight with them even in that ground, as they B did at Rome, in the recovery of their country; as they did the morrow after at Gabii: when they bare themselves so valiantly, that no one enemy that entred within the walls of Rome, went over home again to tell news how they iped, well or ill. Thus on both sides being refoine, and couragiously bent, they met at Alia. The Roman Dictator discovering the enemies arranged in battle-array, within light. 4 See you not (quoth he) O A. Sempronius; how they have stayed at Alia, pretending upon the luckiness of the place? No finer confidence, no greater help may they have.
I pray God, but you, with trinity armor, keen weapons, and doughty courage set spurs to horse, gallop amongst the thicket of their main battle with your horsemen, with the legions on foot will advance mine Enemies, and display them, in their faces, and charge them heartily when they are difbanded one, and put inear, Alia is now, and aid us. O ye gods (the witness of our C league) and punish them duly for their defects, both in dishonouring your divine Majesty, and deceiving us in your name, whom they called solemnly to witness. Neither horsemen nor footmen, could the Preneflins abide, but at the very first shout and shock were the ranks broken.
And seeing their Battalions in no place whole and kept together, they fled: and amazed as they were in that confused fear, and carried away beyond their own camp, they stayed not running for life, until by good footmman they were come within the fight of Prenefl. There, all fach as had been scattered in the flight, met together, and chose a plot of ground, to fortifie in that halle as well as they could: left peradventure, if they had put themselves within the town, forthey their villages should have been fired, and after all confum'd and spoiled, the town also might fortune to be beleaguered. But when the Roman Conqueror after the filling of their camp at Alia was D once come toward them and discovered, they abandoned that Fort also, and got within the town Prenefl, thinking themselves secure enoogh within the walls thereof. Eight towns besides there were under the feignoty of the Preneflins, against which the Dictator warned round: and having won them all, one after another without much ado, he brought his army against Peflren, and got that town also by assault. Then came he to the principal head and very seat town of the war, Prenefl, which was not by force won, but by surrender yielded up into his hands, And T.
Qunitins thus having obtained one victory in a sight field, won two camps and holds of the enemies, conqunred by force nine towns, and regained Prenefl surrendered unto him, returned home again to Rome. In his triumph he carried aloft the Image of Jupiter, fornamed Emperor, which he brought from Prenefl, and set it up in the Capitol, where it was placed and dedicated be-E tween the thrones of Jupiter and Minerva: and in a table of battle fixed under it, was the monument of this noble exploit recorded and engraven in thele or such like words: [7. Quinian Dict. ator, by the gracious help of Jupiter, and all the gift of the gods, won nine Towns.] So on the 20. day after his creation, he resigned up his Dictorship.
Then was the assemblie holden for election of Tribums Military with Coliauthority who were equally choosen from one of the Nobility and the Com. Of Nobles were created, P. and C. Mund.
L. with E. folni. The Commons yeelded C. Sextilius, M. Albinius and L. Anufeius. Upon the two Monili, for that in blood and degree they were above the Commons, and for favour more gracious thenJulius the province of the Volcians was beitowd extraordinarily, without calling lots or parting together by agreement of the Colleagues amongst them selves. Which both they themselves read, and the Senators also (that would have it so repeated afterwards. For without any signals, sent out shorehand to front the coasts, they let forth certain cohorts or companies (of footmen) a surrounding and when upon a falle alarm that those were befit & intapped, they marched them selves aside after to their reufe & convoy, & kept not with them fill the reporter of their fiding (who being indeed a Latin and an enemy, but negligent in the habit of a Roman footkildes, had deceived them) they fell heeling into a train and ambishment laid of purpose for them. And whiles they made reliance with main force only, in a ground of great disadvantage (giving & raking the like measure) they were killed & slain on either side. But in the mean time their enemies from another quarter, enter the camp of the Romans lying open in the plain. Thus in both places, things went but badly and untowardly, & all through the rashnes and unskilfullness of the leaders.
F And what remained unforeld for the fortune of the people of Rome, that was preferred by the hardly and reioiete value of the Roman footkiders only, without the help of general and commander. Upon which news reported at Rome, at the first it was thought good to chuse a Dictator: but afterwards, when tidings came, that all was whole & the Volcians quiet; and that it was well seen they knew not how to utle a victory when they had it, nor to take the opportunity of the time, whiles it offered it fell: both the Generals & the army were sent for home from thence, & so for the Volcians they were at rest afterwards. Only in the very end of the year, other stole some new fire & udden tumult by reason that the Preneflins having illicited the people of the Latins, entered into S 2 rebellion rebellion again. In the same year the men of Sestia made moan of themselves for want of people, and thither new Colonies were assigned to inhabit there.

Albeit the Romans sped but badly in wars, yet the quietness at home was some comfort: which the Tribunes Military chosen out of the Commons had procured, by reason that they were so gracious and reverenced among those of their own cast and faction. All the beginning of the year following, was at the first on a light fire with hot discourse and mutiny, when Sp. Servilius, Quintius Servilius the second time, Licinius Memmius the third time, P. Claudius, M. Horatius and L. Geganius were Tribunes Military with Consules authority. The matter and cause of which seditions broils, were the debts above specified. For the due inquisition whereof and to what sums they amounted, Sp. Servilius Priscus and Clodius Soceitus were made Centors, but stopped they were for doing any thing by occasion of wars. For first, fearful mutineers in all haste brought word, and after, the flight of the Country people confirmed it, that the legions of the Volcians were entered into the confines, and fell to spoiling every where the territory about Rome. Norwithstanding which fear and foreign terror, so little were the civil disorders appeased, that contrarywise the Tribunes of the Commons extended their power with more violence to hinder the levy of soldiers, until they had indented and capitulated with the Senators, that so long as the wars lasted, no man should either contribute and be charged with any impost, or be freed in any action of debt. When the Com. took hold once of this easement and liberty, the mutiners were delayed no longer. And after they had levied and enrolled two new legions, it was thought convenient that the legions should be divided, and two armies sent forth into the Volcians Country, So Fabius and M. Horatius, went on the right hand along the sea coast to Antium. Q. Servilius and L. Geganius on the left hand, by the way of the mountains to Ecuera. But on neither side met they with the enemy, Whereupon they fell to foraging the Country, not here and there in scattering wise, as the Volcians had done, after the manner of robbers, at firsts upon advantage taken of their enemies discord, and by stealth for fear of their valour: but being a full power and army of men, and justly provoked to anger, the longer they continued there, the fouler work they made. For the Volcians standing in fear, left in the mean while they should be encountered with a power from Rome, had made roads only into the utmost frontiers: But contrarywise, the Romans made stay in the enemies land, the rather to train them forth and draw them to a field-fight. Having therefore burned up, in a manner, all the uplandish houset and granges, and some villages also, and left behind them no fruitful tree standing, nor the town corn for hope of grain, and driven away whole booties of men, women, and cattel, which they could light on without the walls; they reduced their armies of both sides home again to Rome. In this mean while the debords had some little reipit to breath themselves in. But so soon as all was quiet from enemies abroad, they began a fresh to be freed and troubled by their creditors at home. And so small hope they had to be released of their old fury, that they fell into a new, by reason of a contribution collected toward a wall, which the Census had set out to be made of square Ashler stone. To yeeld unto this imposition and burden, the Commons were driven, because there was no matter for the Tribunes of the Commons to hinder. Forced they were likewise through the might and power of the great men, to admit for Tribunes military, all of the Nobility, to wit, L. Romulius, P. Valerius the M fourth time, C. Veturius, Servius Sulpisius, L. and C. Quinti Cenclatii.

By the same strong hand also they prevailed so much, that without impeachment of any man, all the younger fort took the military oath, so that they levied three armies against the Latins and Volcians: who joining their legions together, had encompassed themselves at Satrium. One army was gathered for the defence of the City: another to be set out against all sudden wars, if haply elsewhere some tumult should arise: & a third, of all other the strongest, was under the conduct of P. Valerius, and L. Annulius, led to Satrium. Where, finding the enemies embattell'd in good array upon a plain & even ground, they charged upon them presently. But ere that they had got the victory evidently in sight, and were but only in some good hope of having a fair day of their enemies, the rain so pour'd down with huge storms and tempests, that it past both houfis and houses. The morrow after began a fresh conflict. And for a good while, the legions of the Latins especially, which by long alliance with the Romans had learned their manner of warfare, flooded it to as valiantly, and sped as fortunately as the Romans. At length, the Roman horsemen that rode in among them, brake their ranks; and when they were once disarray'd, the footmen displayed their ensigns, and advanced upon them: and look how much the Romans batterd forward, so much the enemies gave backward. But when they began once to faint in their fight, than the violence of the Romans was inofferable. Thus the enemies were discomfited and scattered: and flying not toward their camp, but to Satrium, which was two miles off, they were by the horsemen especially beaten down, trod under foot and slash. Their tents were taken and rifled. From Satrium they dislodged, the next night after the batterd was fought and marched in great haste (as if they fled) to Antium. And albeit the Roman army followed them by the tracks hard at heels, yet their footmanship served them better in their fear, than it did the Romans, for all their anger. So the enemies put themselves within the town walls, before the Romans could overtake them, and either cut off the tail of their renawer or force them to fly. After this, some days were spent in waiting the Country. For neither were the Romans sufficiently provided with warlike engines of batterd and artillery to assail their walls, nor they well appointed to abide batterd in plain field. Then arose some discord within the town, between the Latins and the Antians. The Antians,
The sixth Book of T. Livius.

A Antias, of one side wearied with calamities that follow long wars, wherewith all their life time they had been exercised even to their old age, were of mind to yield. The Latins by reason of their late revolt and rebellion (whiles after to long peace, their courage continued yet faith) were more forward and earnest to maintain wars still. But when they saw on both sides that they might do as they purposed, and follow their own designs, without being hindered one of another, their stirs was soon ended, so the Latins leaving their fellowship & society of peace, so unhonourable (as they thought it) departed from them, and stood out still to revenge their own quarrels. But the Antias being well rid of these Conn elors of their, forced unto all whomsoever counties, tending to their good and safety, yielded up their town and country to the Romans. But

B the anger and furious rage of the Latins, for that they could neither annoy the Romans by wars, nor keep the Volscians still in arms, brake out thus far, that they fired the City Streetums, which had been the first place of refuge, after their defeat and unhappy fight. Neither left they any house in that City standing, but let fire upon all indifferently, as well profane as holy edifices: only the Church of Dame Matuta spared. From which, it was neither any religion and conscience of their own, nor fear of the gods that kept them, but as (men report) a fearful voice heard out of the Temple with heavy threats, unless they held their hands, and kept them far enough from burning the sacred habitations to impiety. In this rage and mad fit of theirs, to Tufculans they go; for very flight that they taking the general Counsel of the Latins, had not only yielded themselves to be in league with the Romans, but also become incorporate Citizens with them. And coming upon them on a sudden, while their gates were open, at the first hint from the whole Town, all but the Castle, was surprized. The Townsmen with their Wives and Children were either fled: and sent messengers to Rome with certificate to the Senate of this sudden and unlooked for accident. And with all speed (as appertained to the fidelity of the people of Rome) an army was led to Tufculum: whereof L. Quintinius and Servius Sulpius, had the conduct. At Tufculum they found the gates afield against them, and the Latins, as men both befeeming and belied. And wiles of the one side tended the defence of the walls, on the other side assaulted the Castle, at one time they were afraid themselves, and put others in fear likewise. But the coming of the Romans wrought a great change and alteration in the hearts of both parties. For it caused the Tufculans of fearful men to become exceeding cheerful: and the

C Latins who made full reckoning to win the fortress out of hand, as being matters already of the town, but had small hope now to help and save themselves. The Tufculans they let up a great shout out of the Castle: and answered it again with a greater from the Roman army. The Latins were put to it hard on both sides: for neither were they able to abide the violence of the Tufculans running down the hill upon them, nor to put by and keep off the Romans, coming hard under the walls, and laying to break the bars of the gates. Fifth, they scaled the walls and gat upon them: after, they brake the port-cullis down. Thus the Latins environed with enemies both before and behind, that pressed (one upon them,) having neither strength enough left to fight, nor room of ground to make an escape, were slain in the midst between the enemies, every mothers sons. So when Tufculum was recovered out of the enemies hands, the army was

But the more quietness there was that year without the City by reason of prosperous wars, the more recounted the violence and hard dealing of the Senators within: and the calamities of the Commons grew every day more than other. For they wanted means and were not able to pay for the interest that need must be paid. When nothing therefore was to be had, to make payment out of their goods, they were adjudged and awarded to satisfy their creditors in their body and name: and so their punishment served in stead of keeping their credit and discharging the consideration. Whereupon, not only the meanest of the Commons, but also the very chief, began now to let fall their hearts and loope to love, that was not a witty and nimble headed man and of experience amongst them, that would put himself forth to stand to be a Trimonials, in concurrence with the Nobles, (which they had to earnestly look at and laboured for,) no, nor so much as to bear and sue for any offices of the Commons, So as the Senators now, seemed to have recovered again for ever to themselves, the possession of that dignity, which the Commons of late, for some few years had disputed and occupied over their heads, But that this order might not joy too much hereat, a small occurrence hapned between which (as it fellent out most commodly) gave the occasion and first looking to an enterprise of much importance.

M. Fabius Aemilius a great and mighty man, as well amongst those of his own calling, as also with the Commons (whom he was reputed never to delique, as other did of his condition and estate) had two daughters married forth: the elder unto Servius Sulpius: the younger unto C. Licinius Stolo, a man very of good worth and reckoning but yet a Commoner. And Fabius disdaining not this alliance and affinity, won himself much love and favour among the Commons. Now it fell out to, that these sisters were upon a time together in the house of Servius Sulpius, then Trib Military: and as they past the time away (as the manner is) in much good talk, discoursing one another with many matters, it chanced that a Sergeant or Vetere of Sulpius, at what time as he was coming home from the Forum of Romon, hald, as the order was, with his rod at the door, When the yonger Fabia not acquainted with those fashions was therat somewhat amazed, her sister making a wunder at her ignorance, laught her to leorn. But that laught (as womens minds got wot are soon kindled with a light)yet her a work & hammered in her head.
Besides, the train of many that came about her, waiting and giving attendance, ready to know her pleasure and what she would, mended the matter much. I suppose she thought her father happily wedded, and repeated her own marriage; upon an ill and sinister judgment, whereby every man repined that his neighbor and nearest of kin especially, should go beyond him and do better than he. Upon this discontentment and spleen heart-burning of hers, her father highly seeing her displeased, asked her whether all was well at home? But when she would have turned the cause of her grief another way, (for that it stood neither with her love and kindness towards her father, to envy her estate; nor yet with her reverence honor that she was to yield unto her husband, to find fault with her own) she with mild questioning came about her so, that he drew from her the truth: so as she confessed her grief to arise upon this, that she was dispirited; and namely, married not according to her quality, but into an house incapable both of worship and favour. Then Ambilius, comforting his daughter, told her to be of good cheer, and said, That ere it were long, she should see the same estate, the same advancement and dignity at home, which she had seen already in her father's house. Hereupon began he to plot with his son-in-law, joying also unto them, Sextius, a stout young man, and one that was like enough to come to preferment, but that he was not of noble race. Good occasion and opportunity they seemed to have of composing some alteration in the State, by reason of the excessive debts that men were grown into; for the redressing and curing of which malady, the Com. had no other hope, but in advancing some of themselves into the sovereign government. They thought it needful therefore, presently to address themselves to the execution of these dispositions, considering that by endeavor and industry, the Commons were climed to that degree already, from whence if they would enforce and put themselves forward, they had but one step more unto the highest, and might be equal with the Nobles, as well in honour as in verum and prowess. And for the present, it was thought good to make them, two Tribus, of the Com, in which office they might open a way unto themselves, for other dignities. So C. Licinius and L. Sestius, proposed laws, all tending to abate the power and might of the Nobles, and wholly for the good and benefit of the Com. One, as touching taking order for debts: That when so much was debased and deducted out of the principal, as had been paid for the use and interest, the residue should be discharged by even portions in 3 years. A second, concerning a proportion and quantity of lands. That no man might hold in possession above 500 acres. The third, That from thenceforth there should be no election of Trib. Military, but of Cossi provided always, that one of them be chosen out of the Com. Matters all of right great weight and consequence, and such as without exceeding strife and contention, could not possibly be carried and obtained. Thus when all those things arose, lay a bleeding, and were in hazard to be lost, which the whole world unmeasurably coveteth and longeth after, to wit, land, money, and promotions: the Senators were put in a bodily fear, and began to stare. And laying their heads together both in publick consultation and private conference, they could devise no other remedy, but that which in many commotions already they had tried, namely, the skipping between and negative voice of some of the Tribus. And so, to crost those bills aforesaid put up by these two Tribus, they had wrought and made to their purpose certain of their own brotherhood, Who so soon as they saw the words and tribes called forth by Licinius and Sestius, to give their suffra-Mges, being well backed and guarded with the assent of the Senators, would suffer neither those laws to be read, nor any other besides as yearly they used to pass by the voices of the Commons. Thus the two Tribus aforesaid, having ointtimes (but ever in vain) assembled the people together, and seeing their laws still nibbled, as it were, in the head for ever going forward; "It is very well (quoth Sextius) and since ye like so well that these inhibitions may prevail so much: we will likewise defend the Commons with the same weapon and no other. Go to now my Masters of the Nobility, proclaim an election for the creation of Trib. Military: I will make it so as you shall do yourselves no good at all: howsoever now ye take for your great pleasure to hear our brethren keep that note still, and moreover that sweet concert of mirth. And surely, those threats proved indeed to good earnest and took effect. For there was no election at all but of Ediles and Tribus, and those both of the Commons. For Licinius and Sextius being chosen Tribus again, suffered no Magistrates of the Chair, or of State, to be created. Which defect and detolation of sovereign Magistracy continued in the City for the space of five years: whereas the Commons for their past chose the fame two Tribus still, and they again ever laid a bar and put in a caveat against the election of Tribus Military.

All other wars, as good hap was, were aleepe for the time. The Colonists only of Velite, upon so long rest and quietness began to be lusty and wax wanton: and for that there was no army of the Romans flitting abroad, they not only made inroads handy times into the territory of Rome, but also affailed the town Tusculum. And when the Tusculans, the ancient Allies and new enfranchised Citizens of Rome craved help, the Senators and Commons both, were moved especially for very shame to succour them. And the Tribuns of the Commons yeilded at length, and permitted an assembly for election, to be held by an Inter-regent: and Trib. Military there were created, L. Furius, A. Manlius, Ser. Sulpitius, Ser. Cornelius, A. and C. Volterius. Who found not the Commons for tractable in the mustering, as they were pliable in giving their voices at the Election. Yet after much ado & great contention they levied an army, and set forward on their journey: drove the enemies not from Tusculum only, but forced them within their own walls; besieged Velite more strictly a great deal, and in more forcible manner, than Tusculum had been by them. Howbeit..." A Howbeit, they that began the siege were not able to win the town. For before that time, were new Tribuns Military chosen, Q. Servilius, C. Varinius, A, and M. Cornelius, Q. Quininius, M. Fabius. Neither performed these Tribuns any notable exploit at Velitrae. But the State, in more dangerous terms than before. For besides that Sextius and Licinius, the publishers of the laws aforesaid, were now the eighth time made Trib. of the Commons again, Fabius also a Tribun Military, Stelo his wives father, was seen openly in the action, to set forward and persuade for the same laws, which in very deed himself had devised. And whereas at the first, eight of the College or Company of the Tribuns of the Commons, had crost the proceeding of them now there were but five left that shewed themselves, and those (as commonly they use to do that dif-

B band from their own faction) like men bereaved of their wis and amazed, being indeed the tongue: and trunks that others spake by, pretended and made allegations in their prohibition, only as they were schooled and taught their lessons at home: (to wir) That a great fort of the Commons were in the army at Velitrae and absent, and that the Selethi Session or Assembly forenating laws, ought to be adjoined until the return home of the louchers: to the end that all the Commons generally, might give their voices concerning their own commoditv and benefit. Sextius and Licinius with part of their brethren Tribuns, and M. Fabius one of the Tribuns Miliary, being their own craftsmen, knew well enough by so many years experience, how to manage and handle the minds of the Commons and plied the chief of the Senators (produced forth before the people) to hard with interrogatories of every particular that was proposed, that they were

C ed and tired them out; Demanding, how they could require to be allowed themselves to poll-fei more then 300 acres a man; whereas the Commons had but two a piece divided amongst them: Whether that every one of them might in equity hold the lands, well near, of 500.

Citizens: and a Commoner to have hardly ground enough for to build him a necessary house upon, and to leave for a place to bury his dead: Also, whether their wild and pleasure was that the Commons oppressed with nury, should yeild their bodies to bear irons and suffer torment, unless they paid the interest before the principal? And that daily by whom companies they should be had away from the bar, condemned to straitdoms and Novels meanes houes to become goals, filled and peistered with prisoners: And wherofever a Patrician dwelt, there should be a privat prison: Thee indignities and pitious matters to be heard, when they had with a loud voice

D charged upon them, even before those that were afraid of the like measure themselves; with more indignation and disdain of all that heard them, than they themselves swetved in the utterance and delivery: But these Senators say they (and they redoubled) will never make an end either of getting more land still into their hands, or spoiling and undoing the Commons with nury, until the Commons make once out of their body one Conful, for to be the maintainer and protector of their liberty. As for the Tribuns of the Commons, they were now just nothing let by;

as who by their privilege of inhibitions and negative voices, spoiled themselves and overthrew their own power. And never will there be any indifferent and equal comice taken, so long as the Nobles keep the sovereign place of common, and the sword to strike whilsts the poor

Commons have only the buckler hand to ward all venues. For unless the government bpered

E between both alike, the Commons shall never have their due and equal portion in the Common-wealth. Neither is it reason that any man should stand contented with this only, that in the Election of Conuls, the Commons are eligible and capable of the dignity: for in case, it be not concluded absolutely, that one Conulf at the least should be of necessity a Commoner, there will never be any at all. Have ye forgotten already (say they) that notwithstanding an Act made, That there should be Tribuns Military, created rather then Conulis, for this intent that Commoners might aspire and reach unto the chief place of honor; yet for all that is 44. years face, there was not so much as one of the Commons chosen Tribun Military? And will any man believe that they will of their own accord confer on the Commons (when others life they may chuse) that dignity in the disposing only of two places, who were ever wont in the making of Tribun

F Military, to take up eight rooms all wholly to themselves? And will they allow them a way unto the Conulsship, who thus long have held the (Conulsar) Tribunship fogarded as no man might have access thither but themselves? Nay, it must be got by a positive law, which in their Assemblies for Election, by favour and grace might not be obtained. One of the Conuls rooms must be let aide, pall all peradventure and question, and that for a Commoner, to enter into:

For as much as it stand full upon a choice, the mightier man will ever go away with the game clear. And whereas heretofore they have been wont to allledge and say. That the Commons alforded not sufficient and able men to bear the offices of the chair and of state: that, now cannot be truly object. For was the Common-wealth, I pray you more slackly and negligently governed upon the (Conulsar) Tribunship of P. Licinius Calvisus (who was the first Commoner that ever was made Tribun Military) than it was ruled for those years face, in which there was not a Tribun Military but of the Nobility? Nay on the contrary side it will be justified that some of the Nobles were condemned after they were out of their Tribunship, and not one of the Commoners. And whereas not many years past, we began to make Querriers or Treasurers out of the Commons, like as we did Tribuns Military, the people of Rome repented never of the choice of any one of them. It remained now, that the Commoners bear the office of Conulis too: That were a farrors of their liberty, that were a strength and sure hold to craft unto. If they were once come and step to that degree, them may the people of Rome think assuredly and be perfervaded.

"Swaged, that the KK, are banished indeed out of the City, and their freedom fully established for ever to endure. For, from that day forward shall the Commons be parasites of all those things, wherein the Nobles now surpass them: namely, sovereign rule and authority, martial renown, parentage and Nobility: great ornaments doublets, unto themselves to enjoy here in this life: but far greater to leave behind them unto their Children and posterity. These and such like Orations when they saw to be plausible, and willingly accepted, they preferred a new Statute, That in stead of the two Duumvirs for holy Ceremonies and matters of the Church, there might be chosen ten Decemvirs: Provided always, that one part of them should be created from the Commons, and another from among the Nobles. The Seffion for enacting of all those Laws, they deferred until the army was returned, which lay then at the siege before I Veiirae."

But the year was come about and fully expired, before the legions were reduced home from thence: and by that means the whole business about those new Laws, hung till in suspense, and was put off unto the entrance of the new Tribuns Military. As for the Tribuns of the Commons, the Commonalty chose the same again, even those twain who had been the proposers of those Laws, and the Tribuns Military were the same, T. Quinctius, Ser. Cornelius, Ser. Sulphius, Sp. Servilius, L. Papirius, L. Veturius. Prefently in the beginning of the year, they put unto the jump and final trial what should become of those Laws. And when as the Tribuns were called, and none of the Tribuns Colleges stepped between to stop the proceeding of the Law-givers: the Nobles were afraid, and ran unto their two last helps, to wit, the highest and absolute office, and the greatest man among them. They thought it good therefore to create a Dictator, and M. Furia Camillus was nominated, who elected unto him L. Semius for General of the horde. The Law-makers likewise for their part, against so great preparation of their adversaries, armed at all parts the cause of the Commons, with stout stomach and contagious heart. And having assembled an Hall of the Commons, they called forth the wards to give their voices. At what time the Dictator accompanied with a great train of Nobles, full of wrath and menacing frowns, took his place and set him down. And after the matter was canvassed first, by the ordinary contest of the Tribuns among themselves, whiles some propounded, and others gainsaid the Law with their negatives voices: and that by how much in right the prohibition was the stronger, so much it was overweighted in favour and affection both of the Laws and Law-givers: and when the first Tribes had given their voice (\textit{Metagatis} affirmatively: then \textit{Camillus}, For as much as (quoth he) \textit{O Quntes}, ye are ruled now by the will and pleasure, and not by the authority of the Tribuns, and as in times past ye obtained the privilege of a negative voice and the \textit{Intercession} by your departure and Seccion, so now ye make it void and nothing worth, even by the same force that ye got it by: I choose Dictators as well for your sake as for the whole Common-wealth, will affift your privilege of Intercession, and by mine absolute authority maintain this your help and succour, now revered and overthrown. If therefore \textit{C. Licinius} and \textit{L. Sextius}, give place unto the negative voice and interceding of their fellows in Office: I will not in a meeting and assembly of the Commons, once intermedie, nor bring in the authority, of a Magistrate of the Nobles: but if they shall go forward still (notwithstanding all prohibition) to M impower and give Laws unto the City, as if it were won by conquest of the enemy, I will not suffer the Tribuns power by their own selves to be defaced and come to nothing. But (all these big words notwithstanding) when the Tribuns of the Commons made but a slight gesture, and went never the less forward with their enterprise, then \textit{Camillus} throughly angered indeed, sent his Lictors and Sergeants to command the Commons to avoid the place and depart: Threatening withal, that if they proceeded thus, he would take a Military oath of all the younger people, and lead an army presently forth of the City. This put the Commons in a very great fright, but let their Captains and King-leaders, rather in a greater heat of contention, than abated their courage one jot. And when he saw no relenting on either side, he gave up his office: Whether it were that there was some error in his creation (as some have written) or because the Tribuns of the N Commons had put up a bill to the Commons, and they granted it: that if \textit{M. Furia} (as Dictator) had proceeded to any action, he should have a round five feet on his head of 50000 \textit{Ases}, I know not certainly. But I believe that he was terrorized upon some unlucky signs of the birds, rather then with any such strange Aet never heard of before, and without precedent. And hereunto am I induced, both in regard of the disposition of the man so well given and of so good conscience, and also for that \textit{P. Marcellus} was immediately named Dictator in his stead. For to what end should \textit{Maullus} have been created Dictator for that broil and strife, wherein \textit{M. Furia} had taken the foil before? Again, seeing the same \textit{M. Furia} was Dictator the next year following, doublets, he would never for shame have resumed that office, wherein the year before he had received the foil and disgrace, to be so overruled. Over and besides, at the same time when as this bill was supposed to have been preferred, concerning his fine, either he might have withstood it too, (whereby he laid himself to be bridled) or else he had not been able to have hindered so much as those, for which this also was proposed. Finally, it was never seen to this day wherein we live, so long as the Tribuns and Consuls with their factions and parts-taking have been at variance and debate with all their might and main, but evermore the authority of the Dictator controlled them all, and put them down. Between the former Dictatorship of \textit{Camillus} now respungeted, and the new by \textit{Maullus} accepted A ted and begun, there was an assembly of the Commons summoned by the Tribuns, in time as it were of a vacancy or interregnum: wherein the overture was made and evidently it was seen which of the laws proposed the Commons liked better, and which the Law-givers. For those that concerned minor and land, they granted to pass, but that other of a Commoner to be Conful, they denied and dafted quite. And truly both matters had been dispatched fully and established at once, but that the Tribuns said directly, that they required the Commons, to give their voices and speak to all three directly together. After this, P. Marcius the Dictator favoured somewhat, and helped the cause of the Commons, by nominating out of the Commons for his General of horse-men, C. Livius, who had been a Tribun Military before time. The Senators Bllormed hereat, as I find in records. And the Dictator was wont to excite the matter unto them, alleging for himself the near affinity and kindred that was between him and Livius: saying also, that the dignity of the General of horse-men was no greater then of a Tribun Confular. Now when the election day was published for the Tribuns of the Commons, Livius and Sextius so demeaned themselves, that by pretending that they would not any longer now continue in the office, they let the Commons on to be moult earnest and holy bent for that, which under colour of refusal, desired and sought for. They seemed, sooth to, to allledge and say, "That for these nine years they had good, as it were, in battel array, and afforded the States; and Nobles of the City, to the right great peril of themselves in privat, and to no good effect of all in publick: and now together with them, both the laws proposed, and the whole strength of the Tribuns authority, were waxed old and decayed. At the first their Laws were crolld by the interceding of their brethren Tribuns: afterwards by packing away the youth of the City to the Velitern war: and last of all, the Dictators lightning flashed in their faces, and their thunderbolts shot against them. "Now (say they) neither their fellow Tribuns withdrew them, nor forraine wars hindered them, nor yet the Dictator himself, as who for his part hath given a good fore-tokening and pretage of a Conful Commoner, in electing, his General of horsemen out of the Commons. The very Commons and none else, are they that hurt themselves, and delay their own goods. Who might presently if they would, have their City, their common Hall, and place of assemblies freed from these Creditors: yet, and their grounds recovered again from the unjust Land-lord: Which benefits and liberties, when are they like to weigh and esteem with thankful minds accordingly, if in the very time that they are to accept the Laws devised for their own wealth and good, they cut off all hope of promotion and honour, from the publishers and propoters thereof? For it standeth not with the modesty of the people of Rome, to require to be eaid themselves of Libya, and to be let in possession again of the land, wrongfully withheld from them by the mighty men: and then to leave those old Trib, by whom means they have come by those good commodities, to flit for themselves, not only without honor but also without all hope of honor. Let them all therefore set down with themselves, and resolve what they are minded to do: and afterwards in the election of Trib, declare the same openly. If they would be willing to speak affirmatively to those Laws, all jointly as they were propounded, then there were some reason to chuse the same Trib again: and then would they enact & establish finallly that which they had published, but in such a wil they was to accept of that and no more than which served each privat man then there was (mal need or none at all to have them fill in office with the veny and grudging of so many, And to be flouter, neither would they accept of the Tribunship any longer, neither should the Commons have those Laws ratified, which were already granted. When as all the rest of the Senators were struck into their dump's and blank, for the very indignity to seething thus go: At the last, one Appius Claudius Ccephas (the nephew or tonsion of that notorious Appius the December) upon a malicious mind and fell Romack, as it is reported, rather then for any hope he had to dislud the matter; stood up, and to this effect answered that so fluent and perpetume speech of the Tribuns, in this manner, "It can be no strange matter to me, nor unlooked for, O Quirates, if that which had been the only thing at all times objected by fictitious Tribuns against our house, I also should hear at this present; to wit, that the whole name and lineage of Claudius have ever from the first beginning, regarded nothing more in the Common weal, than the Majesty and honor of the Senators and the Nobles, and always set and opposed themselves against the good and well-fare of the Commons, Of which two challenges, the one I neither can, nor will deny and disavow; namely that we since the first time that we were enfranchised Citizen, and therewith at once taken into the number of Senators, have endeavoured and straitened ourselves, that it might be said and that truly, that the honor and dignity of that State and degree into which it was your good pleasure we should be incorporated, and graced with, was by us augmented, rather then impaired. And as for the other challenge, this I dare be bold, immine own behalf, and in the name of my ancestors and progenitors, to aver, O Quirates, that (unless a man would think whatsoever is done for the Weal-publick generally, is directly against the Commons, as if they were mere aliens of another City) we to our knowledge have practised nothing, writing and willing, either when we lived privat, or during the time we were office, prejudicial to commonality; and that neither in deed nor word we can be justly charged to have wrought and contrived any thing contrary to our good: although peradventure somewhat hath fallen on crois against your will and mind. But were I not a Claudius, and of that family, nor defended of noble blood, but some one of the Bargettes or Citizens: and knew my felt to be true born, borne, both by father and mother, and to live in a free City: could I (think ye) hold my tongue?

but irksomly speak and say, that these perpetual Tribuns (God save all) L. Sextius, and C. Licinius, as I mean, have for nine years (for lo long they have played Res Juxta so much upon them, and been so bold as to say they will not permit you to have free voices, neither in solemn assemblies for elections, nor in Seismons and Parliaments for allowing and ordaining Laws? Upon condition (quoth one of them) you shall make us Tribuns again the tenth time, What is this else but to say? That, which other wise, we so often and disdain, that accept of it we will not, without good hope and remembrance. And what reward and consideration is this good Sirs, for which we may have your Worships, our ever Tribuns? Marry (quoth he) that ye will accept jointly and at once, all our laws, whether they like you or dislike whether they be good and wholesome, or bad and noisome. Now I beseech you good Turquins (Tribuns of the Commons I would have had) I imagin one was of the ordinary Citizens, and should from out of the multitude assembled, speak out and say: Pleaste it your good grace, Sirs, that out of these laws proposed, we may chuse those that we think good and wholesome for us, and realtime and dilate the rest. (O quoth he) that may not be. Thou mayst allow, belike, and ordain, concerning any courts of Land, a law which tend to the commodity of you all. But now beware of bugs,

This monstrous and portentous wonder must in no case be permitted in Rome, that thou holdest mee for L. Sextius, and this pernicious fellow C. Licinius to be Coniurs, which thy heart relieth at, and which goeth against thy stomach. Nay, my, either accept all or I will propound none at all.] This is one, as if a man should give him that is hunger-bitten, and ready to starve. And he, which in one have cried out and said, Avent you and your Tribunships, out upon you with your laws. What Sir? How if your Mastereth shall not put up and pretend that which is commodious and profitable for the people to accept: is there none, think you besides, that will propound it? If any Nobleman, or any Clandism (which they take to be more odious) shoud thus say. Either take all, or I will propound none at all. Which of you, Quirites, would endure it? why? will ye never regard the substanse more than the person; the matter rather than the man? But all is well taken and heard quickly, which that magistrate shall say. And will ye always hear with the wrong ear; whatsoever any of us shall have to speak? Well, the words are nothing, and the speech (without question) very uncivil and rude. Now let us see what manner of law it is, that they form at; because by you it is rejected. In good faith, O Quirites, much like unto their language. This require (quoth he) that it might not be lawful for you to make Cofl, whom ye will. For what else demandeth he, who would have it enacted by express tears, that one at least of the Cofl, must be a Commoner of Necessity, and leaveth it not unto your choice to make two Noblemen Cofl. If we had wars at this day, such as sometime the Turkish war was when Postius was master of the Janicel, and kept that piece against us; or such as the Gaul war of late days was, when the enemies were LL.and possession of all the City here, but the Capitol and two only; let alone, that L. Sextius should be pricket and propounded either with this M. Fabius here in place, or with any one other of the Nobles, and hand to be Cofl. M. would ye abide that Sextius should be undoubtedly Cofl, and Coilius at devotion and in hazard to take repulse? Is this indeed to betray your dignities indifferently with even and equal hand? That two of the Commons, forsooth, may be elected Coflins, and not two likewise of the Nobles? And that one of them must peril must be created out of the Com, and in the election of both the Nobles may be overlook? What society is this, what community and participation? Will not this serve thy turn and content thee, that wherein thou hadst no title nor interest afore, thou shouldest now have thy part unles in seeking to have a portion, thou pluck all unto thy self? I fear me (quoth he) if both Coflis might be made of the Nobility, ye would chuse none at all of the Commonalty. What is this else but to say? Because willingly of your selves, ye would not chuse unworthy persons and unmeet, I will bind you therefore of ne-ncensity, to elect thole whom otherwise ye would pass by. And what followeth henceupon but this, that the Commoner who standeth with two Furius, may plainly say, and that truly, he is not by vote chosen but by virtue of a law, and so acknowledge no benefit received of the people, nor be beholden at all to them, for their grace and favour? Thus seek they means to wring your dignities from you, and not the way to tie for them: and would so obtain the greatest, as that they might not be obliged & bound unto you for the least: and had rather get honours and offices by advantage taking and cunning fleights, then by their own virtue, delier, and worthines. But there is none one that scorneth to be prized and looked into, and to be considered as he deserveth: who thinks it meet, that he alone among the other Competitors, that conte in hand in suit, should be sure of offices and promotions, and will not submit himself to your censure: who would have your suffrages, of voluntary, to be constrained: of free, to be thrall and servile, I speak not of Licinius and Sextius, whose years of their continual government ye reckon upon, and mark up in the Capitol, as they used sometimetime, to count the years of the Kings reign. But what is he this day in the City, so base, so abject and low condition, that by the advantage and benefit of this law, hath not easier access to a Consilship than we and our children have? As for us truly, ye may sometimetime mis of chusing us, you would never to faint: but for them ye multi needs, yea, though full against your mind. And thus much concerning the indignity and and unworthiness of the thing: For, dignity and worthiness, I take, to be matters properly to men pertaining. What shall I speak now of Religions, and of the solemnity of the Aulpiaces, which imply a meer contempt and injury done to the immortal gods? Who knoweth not, that by the approbation of the gods, tittleled by flight of birds, this City was first founded: that by the fame Aulpiaces, all hath been ordered and directed, as well in war abroad, as in peace at home? And who be they that have to do with these tokens and prelages, by ancient custom and tradition from our forefathers? Forlooke even the Nobles and none else. As for the Magistrates of the Commons, none are chosen with regard of flight, sight, and seeing of the birds, but to us, they do so properly belong, that not only those Magistrates of the Nobles, which the people create, they do not otherwise eat but by observation of the birds; but also our selves, without the silent and voice of the people, do nominate an Interrex by means of the birds: yea, and in the private actions of our life, we are guided by them at home, which the Commons use not in their very offices. What then meaneth he else, but to take the Aulpiaces out of the City, who by creating Commoners to be Consuls, deprive the Nobles thereof, who only may have and use them? Now let them mock on and scoff at our religions. Let them decide our Ceremonies. What makes matter (say they) if those pullens peck or eat not? What if they come somewhat late out of their coup or cage? What if a bird sing auk or crow crooks and contrarious? How then? A great piece of matter thinly, small things, I confess they be: but as small as they are, our enemies by not concerning them, have brought this C. W. to a flouishing state. And we now adays, as if we stood not in need of the grace and favour of God, pollute all holy rites and ceremonies. And therefore let our prelates and high Priests, our Augurers, and King at sacrifices be created (it skilless not how:) even out of the common multitude: Let us set upon any mans head (it matters not whose, to be come a victim of a man:) the Mitre of Jupiter his Flamin, Let us commit the keeping of the Anciles or heavenly shields, and the secret fanctaries; let us commit the gods themselves and the charge of their holy service to those, unto whom we may not lawfully nor without impety, let no lawes be published nor ordinances made, except they be done by persons, who are of the Decemvirs, who are chosen for this purpose; and, whereas the Decemvirs are chosen, we shall have our Ceremonies, except the Decemvirs create them. For there are many reason to conclude, and would counsel you, in any case to stop, fruitful and dissemble the overthrow and proceeding of these lawes: and in doing, I pray God bless and speed you well. This Oration of Appius thus far only prevailed, that the time of publication of their Acts, was cut off and deferred. But the fame Tribuns Sextus and Livius, being chosen again the tenth time, pronounced this law and had it enacted. That of the Decemvirs for divine service and Church business, some should be created of the Commons: So five of them were of the Nobles, and five of the Commoners: whereby they seemed to have gained already one good step onward unto the Comitialship.

The Commons contenting themselves with this victory, yielded unto the Senators, that for the present without any mentioning of Consuls there should be elected Tribuns Military. So there were created A. and M. in the second time, M. Censius, P. Aequus, L. Vicius and P. Valerius in the third. At what time, when as (but for the siege of Velitrae, which was like to be for service a long piece of work, rather then for illeis, doubtfull in the end) the Romans were rest for any foreign troubles, the sudden and unlooked-for news of the Gauls war, drove the City to choose M. Furius Dictator the fifth time: who took unto him for his General of the horsemen, T. Quinctius Cincinnatus. Claudius writeth that this year the Gauls were fought with, about the river Arvis; and that there was that noble combat upon the bridge, in which T. Mucius in the fight of both armies flew in single fight a Gaul that had challenged him and given defiance, and despoyled him of his collar of gold. But there be more writers that induce me to believe, that this exploit was performed ten years after: and that in this year the Gauls had a battell given them by M. Furius Dictator, in the Alban land: where the Romans had neither doubtful nor dangerous victory, although the French made them afraid at first in remembrance of their former overthrow. Many thousands of this barbarous nation were slain in field, many also fell upon the sword in their camp after it was won. Some were scattered and fled, and those most (who took the way to Alesia) laved themselves from the enemy, both by flying so far, and also for that upon fear they were so distracted and parted one from another. The Senators and Commons agreed and made a decree, that the Dictator should triumph. Who carelessly had made an end of that war, but he was welcomed home with a more hotter and more dangerous Sedition within the City. For after many sharp bickerings and contentions the Dictator and Senat both, were overmatched and overborne, ye, and forced to accept the Tribuns laws aforesaid. And also in despite of the Nobility and do what they could, there was an assembly held for election of Consuls: in which L. Sexius was created Consul, the first Commoner that ever sat in Consuls chair. But the broils fluid.
flatt not there. For, by reason that the Nobles denied to approve & give a silent theroet, the matter was like to grow unto a Sextion and general departure of the Commons, ye, and to other fearful tems and perilous threats of civil wars and intestitn troubles. However, by means of the Dictator, the flames were quenched and the discord appeased, upon these capitulations. Inquitimis, that the Nobility should accord unto the Commons to have one Consul from among themselves. Item, that the common people should be content that the Nobles might out of the Patritii create a Pretor or Lord chief Justice for oyer and determiner in causes within the City; Thus when after long anger the two states of the City were grown to unity and concord, the Senat thinking it a worthy matter (good cause they had verily as everany time before) willingly determined, for the honour of the immortal gods, to set out those most fatly [Roman] plays, And whereas before they had continued but three days, to add one more, and to celebrate them full four. And when the Adile of the Commons reified that charge & excused themselves, the younger Gentlemen of the Nobility cried all with one voice, That they would most gladly do that service and honor to the immortal gods, so as they might be made Adiles for that purpose. Thanked they were generally of all hands; and the Senat made a decree, That the Dictator should propose unto the people, that two men of the Nobility might be Adiles, and that in all the Assemblies and Elections for that year, whatsoever passed, should be ratified by the sovereign assent of the Senators.

The Seventh Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Seventh Book.

TWO new officers of State, to wit, the Pretorship and Adileship of the Chair, were adjoined to the republican. The City was now visited with the pestilence, which was more noted by reason of Tiberius Camillus who died therein. The remedy and end whereby, whiles they sought to procure by bringing in new and strange Religion, at length they devise stage-plays, which then first were set forth. M. Pompeius at the Council of the Commons, arrested L. Manlius for his exceeding rage in taking master of foundries; and for confiscating and hardy incurring his own son, T. Manlius, for no crime or bonâ fide of offence. And the young man himself, whose confining and misfortune was laid unto his fathers charge, entered the bed-chamber of the said Tribune, drew his Skæna and forced him to swear unto him, that he would in full his suit and proceed no further. Then all such incidents intended, were laid apart and had an end. Curius armed at a piece, mounted upon a Colours, rode headlong into the wide gaping chink or gulf within the City of Rome, and set presently filled up again. The same young Manlius, who had freed his father from the troubles of the Tribune, entered into combat with a French-man, that challenged any one of the Roman Souldiers to single fight. Bore him, took from him his coat of gold, which he wore about his neck afterwards himselfe, and thereof was called Torquatus. Two Tribes more were added, Poniina and Publicia. Licinius Stolo was condemn'd by Law of his own making, because he held in possession more then five hundred Acres of ground, M. Valerius a Colonel of one thousand and four, killed a Gaul, who challenged him to fight; and that, by the means and help of a Roman that relied upon his Morals, and with taunts and ill annoyed his enemy, and thereupon was named Corvinus. For which virtue and valorous Act, he was the year next following created Consul, being not full three and twenty years old. Amity was concluded with the Carthaginians, The Companies being warred upon by the Semnites, crept out of the City against them; and when they could not fasten, yielded their City and Territory to the people of Rome, Whereupon it was thought good, seeing both they and theirs, were now become proprietary to the people of Rome, that they should be defended by force of arms against the Semnites. When A. Cornelius the Consul, bed his hoof into a place of discomfiture and was in great peril, he was by the inoffensive service of P. Decius a Colonel saved: who having gained the hill-top, which commanded the ridge, wherein the Semnites lay encamped, gave the Consul an opportunity to escape and pass into a plain ground: and himselfe, having satisfying he was environed by the enemy, brake through them, and got away. The Roman souldiers left in Garrisone at Capua, having conspired to keep the City to their own behoof, were detected and their plot discovered: and for fear of punishment, revolted from the people of Rome contrary to their allegiance: but by the policy and wisdom of M. Corvinus, they were reclaimed from their outrage, and restored again to their country. Moreover, this book contained the fortunate wars against the Hermeces, Gauls, Tyburns, Pevrernats, Tarquinians, Semnites, and Volsclians.
The seventh Book of T. Livius.

Here entereth a year of especial note and mark, for the Consulship of a man newly risen: also for two new offices, the Pretorship and Edileship of the Chair. Both which dignities, they of the Nobility purchased to themselves in lieu of granting to the Commons one place of the two Consuls. The Commons bestowed the Consulship upon C. Quintus Cato Dolichus: and the Edileship upon Q. Servilius Scipio, patrimonies of their own order and degree: So grations were they with the people in Martisheld, L. Sexius had companion with him in government, L. Aelius Mamercus one of the Senators, In the beginning of the year, much debate there was and hard hold, both as well about the Gauls, who at the first ranged abroad over all "Apulia, and were now (as the report were) gathered together: as also concerning the Rebellion of the Heinzicks. But all matters being put off on purpose, until a further time, because nothing should be done by this new Consul a Commoner, all things were still and quiet, as if it had been vacation or Non-term: this only excepted, that the Tribuns muttered and could not endure with patience, that for one Consul of the Commons, the Nobility had got to themselves three Magistrates, all of the Patricii, sitting like Consuls, with their purpled and purpled long Robes in Ivory chairs of elite, And as for the Pretor sides, as L. chief Justice to hear and decide causes, he was fellow with the Consul, and with the same Auricles and authority created: Hereupon the Senat was abashed to be instant and to enforce that Ediles of the chair should be chosed out of the Nobility. And first it was agreed amongst them, that every second year they should be elected forth of the Commons: Afterwards, indifferently one with another in common, without that regard. Now when L. Cæcilius and Q. Servilius were Cost, and all at good reft for any home-fledion or to finish, the left them should at any time be void of care and danger, there began a great plague: In which died, as men say, one Censor, one Edile Curule, three Tribuns of the Commons: besides, a many a dead corps from among the multitude, was carried forth proportionable to the reft. But above all the bitter death of Consulibus and much lamented (notwithstanding the long and goodly time he had in this life) caus'd this petition to be much spoken of and remembered. For he was (in truth) the only person in all fortune both of prosperity and adversity, as well in peace as war: a rare and singular man before his baniishment, and during the fame more famous and renowned: either in regard that the City had him of him, and being taken by the enemy in his absence fought unto him for his life: or in respect of his happiness, in that together with his own restitution home he therewith restored his natural country. And after this, for 25 yearspace (for so long he lived afterwards) he bare himself answerable to the title of so great glory: accounted worthy to be furnished and reputed a second founder after Romulus, of the City of Rome. This all year long and the next which followed, when T. Sulpius Peticus, and C. Licinius Stolo were Consuls, the sickness continued. By reason whereof, nothing was done worth remembrance, but that for to obtain the mercy and grace of the Gods, there was a Levithian folemnized, which was the third since the City was first founded. But when by no device of man, nor help of the Gods, the violence of the sickness assailed: their minds and confidences were so posses'd with superstitious notions, that among other pacifications and appeasings of the heavenly ire, the stage-players (a strange and new device for a warlike and martial people, who afore time néeed only to behold the Solmian games and feats of strength and activity, in the great Licts or Race called Circus) were (as men say) first begun and ordained. But (as all beginnings lightly are) a small thing (God were it at first) without long and mete, without gelture and action fitted into long and verse, and the fame also meer outlandish. For the players, who were fit for out of Hetereias, as they danced the measures to the minstrel and sound of flute, geltured not unadequately wical, after the Tuscan fashion. But in process of time the youth began to imitate and counterfei't them; efilting pleasantly beside one with another, and singling in rude times and disordered metre: and their gelture was fortnet with their juts and ditties. Thus was this thing first taken up, and thus with much life and often exercisb, practisb. And hereupon our own Country Actors and artificial proficients of this fect, were called Histriones, of Histr, a Tuscan word, which signifieth a player or dancer. But these uttered not (as they used afore time) in their turns one after another, disorder'd, confused, and rude verses, like to the loofe and bawdy Fefenine rimes: but went through and rehearted out, whole Saturis, full of musical measures, with a fet concert of long alto, to the instrument of the minstrel and with gelture agreeable thereunto. Certain years after, Livius, who was the first that after the use of Saturis, ventured to set forth an Enterlude, of some one argument and uniform matter, is reported to have been himselb (as they were all no doubt in those days) the Author and Actor both, of his own verbs and lons: But being so often called on by the people to play, that he became hoarse again, and left his voice, he gave leave to let a boy to gelt before the minstrels. And being silent him selb, he acted the long with more agility and nimblines of motion a good deal: for not employing his voice, he had no hindrance of liberty in gelture. Then began the players to have others to gelt, and they themselves used their voices only in acting their parts in Comedies dialogue-wife. After that, by this order taken and Law of Players, they came from laughter and pleasant conec- tions. Mith, and that this patience and sport turned by little and little to a method at Art and profession. Then the youth leaving to Comedians, the acting of parts in Interludes, began after the old manner to set off, one at another, merry sports and jests, interfaced with their time and metre, which thereupon were afterwards called Exodos, and were interred commonly in the A- tellian Comedies, Which kind of sport, the youth learned first of the Opera: and having once taken it up, they held it still, and would not suffer it to be disingayed and dishonested by common players. And hereof cometh it, that the Actors in the Attellane Interludes were neither disposed out of their own tribe, nor made Actors, but served in the wars, and have the Cities pay, as if they were not base Comedians, and Professors of infamous players craft. Thus have I thought good, among the small beginnings of other things, to set down the Original of Stage-players also: that it may appear, that the thing arising from a con siderable entrance, is grown now to this folly and excelsectiuinous, as hardly can be disayed by most rich and wealthy Kingsdomes. And yet these players at first, employed about a religious business, neither did mens minds of fimple and superstition, nor eased their bodies one jot of sickness. But rather, when by occasion of an over flow and inundation of the Tyber, the Circus or Theatre was drowned, and their players in the very midst hindered and interrupted, this occurrence mightly troubled and affrighted them, as if the Gods had turned away their face and countenance, and rejected all their endeavours in these appeasings of their wrath and indignation, Therefore in the time that Con, Genonius, and Emulus Mammecur were Conul's the second time, when mens minds were busied and troubled more in seeking means to pacify the wrath of the Gods, than their bodies vexed with diseases; the elder fort and grand ligitors called to mind that in old time there was a plague allavored and gave over by the driving and casting of a spike or a great nail by the Dictator. The Senat upon a religious devotion periworth with hereit, caused a Dictator to be crested, for to fetch the nail shoreland. And there being chosen L. Manlius Imperius, he nominated for his General of Hortemen, L. Pic- naris. There is an old law written with antique letters, and in antique words, That the chief Pretor for the time being, should be the Dictator in the month of Septemp. Well, a nail was driv- en, and stuck fast on the right side of the temple of Jupiter Optimum Maximus, on that hand where as M. Ansilius Chapel handeth, That nail, became in those days there was but little writing, likewise as they lay, the number of the years. And thereupon that Law was set up in Minis- gale Church, for that Minisia was the inverted number of Magnific. And Conte a diligent writer of such monuments, and a studious Antiquary, affiirmeth, That at Velita there stuck like spikes to be seen in the Temple of Norta, a goddess among the Tusciants, to quote and represent the number of the years. Now, as concerning the Temple of Jupiter Optimum Maximus, M. Horatius the Conul (by an act in that behalf provided) dedicated it the next ensuing the expulsio of the Kings. Afterwards, the solemn manner and costume of fixing a nail, was transferred from the Consul to the Dictators, as to the greater and more absolute Magistracy. And in process of time, this costume being discontinued, it was thought a thing init felt worthy, for which a Dictator should be created.

L. Manlius being elected [as above said] for this cause, as if he had been called to that dignity for some war, and not to free the people from their cruel of conscience: and intending himself war against the Hernicks, plagued the youth with a grievous matter: until at last all the Tribu- ons of the Commons taking against him, opposed themselves, and were it by force, or for very shame, he relent'd, and resigned up his room. Nevertheless, in the entrance of the year next follow- ing, when C. Servilius Hater and L. Gentinius the second time were Conul's, M. Pomponius a Tribun of the Commons stirred L. Manlius. His cruelty in taking of the murderers was odious, not only for the los's and dammage that the citizens sustained thereby, but also for resting and mang- ing their bodies partly by scourging them with rods who answered not to their name and par- tally slipping irons upon them in prison. But above all, his own cruel disposition by nature was hateful, and the surname (Imperius) offensive, especially to a free City. This cause he got by N.plain view of his cruelty, execrable no less upon his nearest friends and kin, folk, yes and his very own blood, than upon strangers. For amongst other matters, the Tribun laid to his charge, that having a young man to his son, detested of no lowdnes and dishonored, he him had be- stood (as it were) out of the City, from his house and home, debaunted from the common Hall and pen sight of men from the company of his mates and companions, set him to drudgery and servile work, and betaken him as it were, into a prison and houle of correction: where, a Dicta- tor for a young Gent omly held, defended by this daily misery of his, was taught to know, that he had indeed a Lord y and imperious Sir, to his father. And for what great offence, I pry you? Because he was not so fair spoken, nor all the residieth with his tongue. Which in- sinity and defect of nature, ought not a father to have been withal and cloak'd (if there had been any goodness, any common humanity in him), rather to punish it, and by rough handling, and sharp usage, to make it more known and notorious. Why? even the very minute bests - if it chance that any of their breed or young ones prove but notowardly, feed and che- rish them till nevertheless. But as for this L. Manlius, he augmenteth one inconvenience and defect in his son with another: whom being but oft and flow of nature, he keepeth down the more; and that like like and mill not that in him, he goeth about to quench and dull as once by this pestilens Life and natural usage, and converting amongst the cattelled beastis. Thele These bitter complaints and accusations moved the patience, and stirred the tempests of every man else, sooner than the young man himself. Who contrary-wife was grieved in his mind, that he should be a cause of his fathers troubles, thus to incur the ill will and obloquy of the people. And that all the World, both Heaven and Earth might know that he desired rather to incur and help his father, than to afflict his adversaries and foes, he entered into a course becometh and bewraying (I must needs say) a rude and rustic mind. Which, although it savour nothing of Civility, yet for his kindnels and dutiful piety to his father, deserveth commendation. One morning betimes he gets him up, and unknown to every one of the house, with a good skin clothe by his side, to the City he goes: and from the gate freight ways directly to M. Pomponius the Tribun

B his house. He tellsthe Porter, that he must needs speak with his Matter out of hand, willing him to let him understand, that, T. Manlius the son of Lucius, was there. And being immediately left in, (for the Tribun hoped, that the son was thoroughly angered with his father, and brought new complaints, and onematter or other against him, or some devise and overhite how to proceed in the commenced Action) and facultations passed to and fro betwixt the Tribun and him, he said, that he was to talk with him apart out of all mens hearing. So the room being voided, and all commanded to depart far enough out of the way, he draweth out his skin: and leaping alight upon the bed, flood there, and held it full bent against him, and threatened presently to give him the stab, unless he would swear the oath he should render unto him, namely never to call an Assembly or Hall of the Commons together about his fathers inditement, or impanel a Jury against him.

C The Tribun affrighted (seeing the naked weapon glittering before his face, him self all alone and unarmed, the other a tall and witty young fellow, and, that which was as much to be feared as the rest, fool-hardy, and presumed upon his strength) took the oath in that form as he put it unto him. And afterwards he gave it out plainly and confusedly (for his excuse) that by this means he was forced in sight of his heart, to for sake his suit, and give over his enterprise. But the Commons were not so much offended at the son, for giving such an adventure in his fathers quarrel: but they could have been more contented and better pleased, that it had lien in their power to have pulled their voyces, for the condemnation of so cruel and proud a priser, as they had under their hands. And the more praise-worthy this was of the son, because to great rigor of the father, brought no alienation in all his heart, from the affection at duty that he owed unto

D him. So not only the father escaped his arraignment, but this action of the young man turned upon his own honour and pretention. For whereas, this year it was first ordained, that the Tribuns or Colonels should be chosen by voyces of the legionary fouldiers (for aforesay, as at this day, the Generals themselves made them, whom they called Ruffles) in fix places (for so many were elec ted) he obtained the second room: and that, in regard of no defect other wise, either at home or abroad, which might win him this favour, as who had spent his youth in the country altogether, far from the civil society of men.

The same year, by earth-quake or some other forcible violence, the common place called Fa rums, clave and opened wide, while the in the mids, and sink down to an exceeding depth: neither could that chink or pit be filled up by casting in of earth (notwithstanding every man laboured and E brought what he could) before that they began to enquire, according as they were admonished by the divine Oracles, what it might be, wherein the most piissance and greatness of the people of Rome consist. (For the wisard prophesied, That it they would have the state of Rome to remain furc for ever, they should dedicate and offer, whatsoever it was, unto that place.) And when they were in doubt what this should be, it is reported, that M. Curtius, a right hardy knight, and martial young Gentleman, rebuked them therefore, because they doubted whether the Romans had any earthly thing better than armour and valor? Herewith, after silence made, he lift up his eyes, and beheld the Temples of the immortal Gods, situated near to the Forum, and the Capitol likewise: and stretching forth his hand, one while toward Heaven, another while to the gaping chimps and gulf in the earth, toward the infernal spirits beneath he offered and devoted himself to the atured death. And mounting upon a brave courser, as richly strapped and set out, as possibly he could devise, armed as he was at pieces, he leaps Horse: and man and all into the hole. The people, both men and women, throw in after him funeral gifts and oblations, and fruits of the earth in great plenty. The place was after called Curtius L creator, of his name, and not of that Curtius Metius in the old time, who was a fouldier under Trium Phiatus. If I could by any means search out the truth, I would not spare for any pains in that behalf. But now seeing that by reason of antiquity the certainty is not fully known, we must go by the common voyce and report of men. And verify the name of the lake is more renowned and noble by occasion of this later and ter tale, than the other.

After the expiation of so great and prodigious a wonder, much constution there was in the G Senate that year, as concerning the Herricks: for having lend their Heracles unto them for restitution of harms done, but to no effect: they determined with all convenient speed to proofo unto the people, for to proclaim war against the Herricks, and bid them defiance. The people generally with one voyce liked thereof, and approved it. The charge of that service and exploit fell to Gennadius his let, to undertake. Now for that he was the first Consul of the Commons: that by his own anticipies and conduct should manage war, the City was in great expectation of the sequel and issue, and according to the event that should fall out, good or bad in this journey: they were to judge whether they had done well or amiss to communit theye dignities with the Commons.

Curtius L creator.
But it fortunet for, that _Genetin_ being with great preparation and power set forth against the enemies, was entrapped by an Amboicado, his legions upon a sudden (as unlook'd for defeated, himself (the Consul) environ'd round about, and slay them, that will not whom they flew, Which ridings being brought to Rome, the Senators were not to penive and forrowful for the common calamity, as they famed and took on most inflently, for this unhappy expedition and conduct of the Commoner Consul: and muttered in all places these and such speeches: "Now let them "go and create Consuls again out of the commonality, and translate the Aupipes whither they "ought not. What? Because the Senators by an Act of the Commons, might be defeated and dif-
"polled of their dignities, could so manipulate and irrreligios a law, prevail likewise against the "Gods immortal? Who now themselfes have taken the matter into their own hands, and maintained their power their deity and Aupipes, which were not to beon medl'd withal, and polluted by one that had no right thereto, nor lawful title, but both the whole army, and Captain "also, were vanquished and overthrown; to teach them for ever hereafter, how they make their "solemn Elecctions of Magistrates confusedly, without regard of the rights and royalties of noble "honies. These speeches both Council-Houle and common place rung again withal, So the Consul Servilus with content of the Nobles named for Dictator Appius Claudius, who had sometime in an Oration before the whole assembly of the Commons disposed of the proceeding of that law; and now with greater authority blamed the mishap of that counsel, which was by him mis-lik'd and reproved. A mutter was proclaimed, and a publick Vacation. But before that the Dictator and their new enrolled legions were gone as far as the Hernicks confines, the other army under the leading of C. Sulpicius the Lieutenant, by occasion of an accident that fell out there, got a good hand against their enemies. For when as upon the death of the Consul, the Hernicks advanced in formous and comtempnous manner, cloe under the camp of the Romans, with a full hope to be masters of the same; behold, what with the eharloration of the Lieutenant, and what for anger and indignity, wherewith the fouldiers flamacks were full, they made a fallly out against them. Whereupon the Hernicks came to far short of their acco'mpt, that they had no hope to affai, no, nor approach the rampier: and in disorderly they dismark'd bed and departed. Afterwards by the coming in of the Dictator with a fresh power, the old army was reinforc'd double. The Dictator in a solemn audience, having praised the Lieutenant and his fouldiers for defending their tents so manfully, both encouraged them that heard themselves to highly commended according to their deferts, and also whett'd on the rest to perform the like valorous service. The enemies on the other side were nothing lack to prepare themselves to fight again: who in remembrance of the honour they had already won, albeit they were not ignorant that the Romans forces were redoubled, encrcted their own power also. For the whole Nation of the Hernicks, even as many as were able to draw sword, were call'd forth to the wars. Eight cohorts by themselves consisiting of four hundred in a band were enrol'd, even the most able and choice men of all others. This elect and especial flour of their youth and manhood, they fed with hope and encouraged the more to this service, because they had taken order they should have double pay. Freed they were besides from all other labour and Military toil that being thus referred to intend the fight and nothings else; they should make reckoning and know, that they were to disencourage and strain themselves above the ordinary carriage of fouldiers. Placed also they were in the battel, apart from the other ranks; to the end their valour and manhood might be more seen and marked. Between both camps of the Romans and Hernicks, there was a plain of two miles in length: and there in the mid way in a manner, was the battel fought. First, the fight was doubtful on both sides, whiles the Roman Horfemen charged and recharg'd again, but ever in vain, to see if they could break their battalions. Thus when the service on Horfback, proved les in effect than in attempt, they asked the advice and craved leave of the Dictator: which being grant'd, they abandoned their Horfes, and with a mighty flourish on forth before the enigns, and renewed the battel afresh.
Neither could they have been any longer endured, but that those extraordinary bands oppo'd themselves, and receiv'd them with equal might of body and valour of heart. Then was the fight maintained between the brave youth and principal flour of both nations. And look what slaughter there was by common hazards of war, as well of the one side as of the other, the los was greater for the quality of the persons, than the proportion of the number. For the rest of the common fouldiers, as if they had flaited from themselves the whole conflict, and breaken it to the van-guards only, reposed their own event and hap in the manhood of others. Many a man on both parts was fittern down and dy'd in the place, but more were hurt and wound'd. "At last, those Horfemen that dissimmon'd, fell to call and rebuke one another, asking what hope remained else besides? If not on horfback they were able to drive the enemies back, nor on foot force to them to give ground and remov'e them, what third kind of service they liked to try? Why leapt they out so hastily and bravely into the forefront before the enigns? and fought in the place of others? With these words provoking another one another, they pluck'd up their spirits, and with a fresh flour set foot forward and gave a new charge. First, they compell'd the enemies to retreat and lose their standing: then to give more ground: and at length plainly to turn their back and run away. Hard it is to say, being so equally and indifferentl'y match'd as they were, what it was that turned the ballance and give the victory: unless it were the perpetual fortune that ever followed both nations, able to advance the spirit and courage of the one, and to daunt and abate the hearts of the other, The Romans had the Hernicks in chace all the way long, so far as to their camp: but A because it was far in the evening, they flaid from affailing it. For by reason that it was long ere the Dictator could by Sacrifice gather any affered token of Gods favour, he founded not the battle before noon: whereby it continued until night. The morrow after, were the Hernicks fled and their camp abandoned: only some hurt and wounded soldiours were found left behind. But one of them that forsook their eneigns (when as near unto their walls and forts their banners were discovered, tenderly accompanied, and with few about them) was scattered abroad over the fields, and in great fear stragled all about, and shamefully fled away. And yet this victory of the Romans cot them well the setting on, and spent some blood: for they left a fourth part of their men: and that which was no small damage unto them, some of the Roman Horfemen also were

The next year following, when C. Sulpius and C. Licinius C. Iunus the Consuls, were gone with a power against the Hernicks, and finding not the enemy abroad in the country, had by force won Foreontum: A Town of theirs: in their return homeward, the Tyburn kept their gates shut against them. And after many complaints and unkindneffes ripped up between them: this last quarrel was it, that moved the Romans by their Herals (after defillation and amends demanded) to lend defiance, and proclaim war against the people of Tyburn. To which Titus Quintius Ferlus was Dictator that year, and Serg. Canius Malignemst General of his Horfemen, it is agreed upon by all authors, Mecc Licinius writeth that he was created for the holding of an assembly for Elecction of Magistrates, and that, by the Consul Licinius: because when his fellow Consul made haste to have the Election before the war, thereby to continue his Ownfullhip; it was thought good to withfand and meet with his mighty defer in that behalf. But Licinius [Magister] in uttering to his name and family, that praise and commendation, made him himself to be of less credit in writing of the ref: especially, being in none of the old records, I find mention of any such matter. Mine own mind giveth me rather, that the Dictator was created because of the Gauls tumultuous war. For certainly that year they encampd themselves three miles from Rome, beyond the bridge of Anio, in the way Salutaris. The Dictator having proclaimed a Vacion, because of those troubles of the Gauls, received the Military oath of all the younger fort; and with a pluriail army departed the City, and upon the very bank on this side of Anio pitched his tents. In the mid way between them and the enemies there was a bridge: which they would not break down on either part, left they should be thought fearful towards. But about the seizing and gaining of that bridge, first, there was many a skirmifh: and judged it could not be, considering the equal forces of both fides, who should be masters of it. Then advanced forward unto the bridge (told of all guards) a mighty tall and big Frenchman, and as loud as ever he could set out a threat, made to this challenge: Now (quoth he) let the bravest gallant that Rome hath, come forth and spare not, to combat if he dare, that the event of this battle may shew whether nation is more valiant and warlike. The brave Knights and youths of Rome, held their peace a good while, both abaflied to refuse the challenge, and also unwilling to run upon the present hazard of a single fight. Then T. Manlius, the fon of Lucius, even he who released his father from the Tribuns troubles, goeth forth of his quarter into the Dictator. "Without your leave and expel E commandment (quoth he) O Noble Soveraign, I would never presume to fight out of my rank and standing, no, nor if I should fece afforded victory before mine eyes: but if it will please your Excellency to give me licence, I will shew unto that best wonder (that so proudly and lustily is come forth leaping before the enemies eneigns, and braving as you fee) that I am descended of that house and race, that gave the whole army of the Gauls the toil and turned them down the Cliff Tarpeia. Then said the Dictator unto him, God blefe thee T. Manlius: Onforta a Gods Name, in this thy dutiful mind and zeal that thou carriest both to Either and Country: Go on I say, and with the help of the Gods, perform the Roman name to be invincible. Then his fellows and companions holf to arm the young Gentleman. A light footman shed he takes unto him: and a spanifh blade by his fide, more hardorne to fight short and clofe. Being thus armed and fet out, they bring him forth against this vainglorious Gaul, let all upon joy in their loibility, and (as the ancient writers have thought it worth the noting and remembrance) normally lolling and baying out his tongue. Then the ref depart every man to his own quarter and ward: and the two athered Captains were left in the midl: more like a favelifh ipecacle and pageant to behold, than any fight in field, meeting to the manner, guise, and law of combat, considering they were not equally match'd: if a man should judge by the eye and outward view. The one of them of perfonage mighty and exceeding tall, his coat armour ofundy colours and gay, his helmes glittering and all damasked and engraved with gold. The other, a man of a middle ftature of Souldiers, no great show of arms, and thatrather fit and hardorne, than gaudy to be behold: without any hooping, finging, and joyeous vantering of himself: without vain-flourifhes and flaunting of his weapons in the aire: but he had an heart full of resolver courage, fiamon, and clofe anger wither, preserving all his feet, eneigns and egernefs unto the very combat and tryal of fight. As they Fow'd through the two armes, and so many men all about looking on: in doubtfull incence between hope and fear, the Gaul like as he had been a huge mountain aloft over the other, ready to fell upon him, held forth his targes with the left hand to bear off the sword of his enemy coming against him: and let drive a down-right blow edgelong, that re- founded again upon his shield; and did no harm at all. The Romanbeating his own sword with the point upward, and with his shield having imitent the neither part of his enemies target.
and turned it aside, got with his whole body close within him, and without the danger of being hurt: and when he had wound himself between his enemies body and his sword's point, he re-doubled one or two foins, and thrust him up into the belly at the groin, and so overthrew him. There lay the Gaul along, and took up a great ground in length. When he was down, without any further mangleing and tormenting his carcass, he depooled him only of his color of gold, which embrued as it was with blood, he did about his own neck. The Gauls with fear and admiration of this fight were afeomned. The Romans with great cheerfulnes came forth of their wards and quarters to meet their champion, and with great praise and congratulation brought him before the Dictator, And as they mearly call forth (as the manner of fouldiers is) certain pleasant ditties, ballad-wife, but without artificial skill of poetry, they were heard to surname him Tyburtns; which afterwards was taken up and commonly used, and became an honorable name to his posterity, and the whole house besides. Besides all this, the Dictator belloyed upon him a coronet of gold for a reward, and openly before the whole audience of the army, highly and wonderfully commended that fight of his. And certainly, that combat was of such consequence, and made so much to the event of the whole war, that the night next following, the booth of the Gauls fearfully aban-doning their tents, departed into the Tyburtin country; and being drawn into a society of war with the inhabitants of Tybur, and liberally by them relieved with victuals, they passed within a while into Campania. Which was the caufe that the next year, C. Petilius Balbus the Conful (when his fellow M. Fabius Ambiolus was by fort lent with commision against the Hernicks) led an army, to the aid of whom, when the French were returned out of Campania; there was foul spoil and havock made in the Lavician, Tuculian, and Alban territories, by the leading and conduct, no doubt of the Tyburts. And whereas the State stood well contented that the Conful should be the General commander, against these enemies the Tyburts; this new trouble and tumult of the Gauls, caused a Dictator for to be created. And that was Q. Servilius Halus, who named for his General of Horsemen, T. Quinctius. And by the authority and assent of the Senators, he vowed to let out the great games, in cafe he sped well in this war. The Dictator having commanded the Conful with his army to tarry still, that by his own conduct of war he might keep in the Tyburts, took the oaths of all the younger people: and there was not one refused to go to the war. Not far from the gate Cauina was this battle fought, in the fight of their Parents, Wives and Children, Great encouragements, I doubtles, to cheer up and animate men, absent and far off: but now before their eyes, partly, for shame, and partly, for pitty and compassion, they let the fouldiers all on fire. After much blood-fled on both sides, at the last the army of the Gauls turn back: and being put to flight, they made halt to Tybur, the very strength and fort of the Gauls war. But as they fled ftragling one from another, they were encountred by the Conful Petilius not far from Tybur. And when the Tyburts lifted forth to encounter them, they with the reit were beaten into the Town. Likewise the other Conful Fabius, first in small skirmishes, and at last in one notable fight, vanquifhed the Hernicks, at what time as his enemies charged upon him with all their forces and whole poffiance. The Dictator having highly commended the Confuls, both in the Senat-houfe and also in a publick assemble of all the people, and attributed the whole honour of his own Acts unto them, gave up the Dictorship, Petilius, obtained a double triumph, over the Gauls and the Tyburts. For Fabius was thought sufficient, that he should enter into the City Orant, in a petty triumph. The Tyburts scoffed and made good game at the triumph of Petilius. For, where was it (say they) that they encountered and joyned battle with us? There went forth indeed of the City gates a few of us to behold the flight and flight of the Gauls; but seeing our selves able to be fuchon, and killed one with another as we came in the way, we retired back, and got the City over our heads. And was that such a doubtful deed, that the Romans should think, it deferved a triumph? But that they may not decem it fitt, to noble and to wondour an "As, to make some fit, and raise a tumult in the enemies gates: they should themselves fee how greatly fearerfulnes, even under their own walls. Hereupon, the year following, when M. Petilius Lenas, and Cn. Martius were Confuls, at the first watch of the night, they came from Tybur in warlike manner to the City of Rome. This sudden occurrence, happening so fearfully in the night leaon, stroke a mighty terror into them that hastily awaked out of sleep. Besides, many there were that will not, either what enemies they were, or from whence they came. Howbeit they cried Alarm with all speed, on every side. The gates were forthened with worders, the walls manned with strong guards. When as early in the morning they were defcried to be but a mean number of enemies before the Town, and those none other but Tyburts: the Confuls fallled out at two gates, and affailed both ways their forces, as they were now come under the walls ready to scale. Then it was seen that they were thither come presumption rather on the vantage of the time than truiting in valour and manhood: to little were they able to abide the first brunt and change given by the Romans. Furthermore, it was well known that this their comming turned to the Romans good: for, the discord that was now becomming between the Senators and the Com, for fear of this to meet danger was quite halted. But in the next war that ensued the enemies came after another sort, and were more reticre to the fields and country, than to the City. For the Tarquinians over-ran all the marches of the Roman pale, waiting and spoiling all those parts especially that border upon Heruria. And after restitution & amends demanded but no effect the new Cof, C. Fabius & C. Plantus, by the ordinance of the people proclaimed war against them. The rumors all A allof the Gauls warbegan to be rife. But amid these manifold and fearful troubles, this was their comfort, that the Latins had peace granted unto them, upon their own lute: and on them a great power was received, according to the ancient league, which for many years space, they had left palf and discontinued. The Roman forces by this aid well strengthened, made a lighter matter of it, when they heard that the Gauls were arrived already at Frælæs, and were set down and encamped about Petium. It was thought good that C. Sulpicius should be chosen Dictator, named by C. Pétinius, sent for to the same purpose. Unto whom M. Valerius was appointed for Commander of his Horsemens. Thefe marched against the Gauls with the choice foundiers of two Consular armies. This was a lings war and protracted longer a great deal than both parties liked of. At the

B first, the Gauls only were sharper and eager of battle; but afterwards the Roman foundiers, by running into fight and skirmish, exceeded theirencords and formorhness of the French. The Dictator was nothing pleased herewith, to put all upon the hazard of fortune, when there was no need at all, especially having to deal with that enemy, whom trait of time and deak ignorance of the place, made daily worse and worser: being unprovided besides of dietics and making long abroad without any fen. forts: moreover, of that Romack and constitution of body as served wholly for expedition and quick service, and by small delays waxed feeble and faint. Upon these considerations the Dictator held off still and drew the war on length, and had proclamed a grievous punishment, if any without his express commandment should fight with the enemy. The foundiers could not well brook this: but first within their wards and watches began among themselves to carpe at

C the Dictator, and otherwhiles they let fly the LL, of the Senate in general, blaming them for their direction in that the Confils had not the managing of this war. They have choven indeed (say they) a singular General on that purpose, a Captain alone, who thinks whiles he fitteth still and doth nothing, the victor will fall from Heaven, or flie into his very lap. After this they began openly abroad, and in the day time, to call out the fame, yea, and worse speeches: too and more maleparts: namely that they would either fight, and ask the Dictator no leave, or go along in order of battle to Rome. The Centurions also joined themselves to the foundiers: and not only in conventicles and knots together, there was whispering and grumbling: but in the very *

Principes, and within the quarter of the L. General his pavilion, were heard confirmed speeches together in one accord. So as the multitude began now to grow to a full assembly, and from all

D parts to call and cry aloud, to go presently to the Dictator: and that Sex. Tullius should in the name of the whole army speak unto him, as becalmed his vertu and courage. This Tullius now had been seven times already a primipilur or principal Centurion: neither was there in the whole army, of all those that served on foot, a man more renowned for feats of arms. He going before the army of footmen, keppeth to the Tribunal. And when as Sulpicius marvelled not to much to see that company, as the leader of the company Tullius, who of all the foundiers had ever had in belt order and most obedient. * This is the manner (quoth he,) O Noble Dictator and nothing efe. The whole army in general, supposing themselves by you condemned of cowardice, and in a manner to their utter shame abandoned, and disarmed, have intreated me to plead their cause before your Majesty. And I for my part, I assure you, in case we might be charged to have left

E armed anywhere, in case we had turned our backs upon the enemy, in case we had left our entire arms, they would think it yet a reasonable suit to be obtained at your hands, that you would give us leave to amend that which is amiss, to correct our former fault with hardships and valeur, and by some fresh and glorious exploit, to cancel the remembrance of so foul a spoil and shameful dishonor. Even those very Legions that were defeated and put to flight at Allia, afterwards in their return from Vitis, recovered the same country of theirs by valor, which they had once before lost through cowardice. But we by the goodness of God, through the felicity of your self, and the people of France, have hitherto kept the army unoffiled, & honor unattainted. And yet I scarce dare say honour, if so be that not only our enemies may with all reproachful tears be shown and flay us, as if we were women sent in & mewed up close within our ramparts but also

F your General (the more is our grief,) doth use your army to be heartless, handless & armours;

G lest before any trial of us made, to depair of us, as if you took us for a Commander & leader of a fort of maimed & feeble persons. For what else can we think of it that you, an old experienced Captain and a valiant warrior should sit as they fly, with one hand in another, doing nothing? For howsoever the truth is indeed, more meet it is, that you should be thought to doubt of our valor, than of we yours. But if this be not a device of your own letting, but a publick plot laid, and some matter agreed upon among the Senators at home rather than any war of the Gauls, keepeth us away from thence, confined as it were from the City & our own houses: then I beseech you, whatsoever I shall say, you would think it as spoken not by the foundiers to their Lord General, but by the Commons to the miers and Senators. Whom may thus reply, that as ye have your policies and counsels, so will they have their dignes & ways of their own likewise.

F for who would think I pray you, that we are your foundiers and not your slaves sent to war, and not into banishment? If any set out the banner of war unto us, lead us forth into the field, and found the battle ready we are to fight like men, and like Romans: but if there be no need of war, we will rather set off at home than in the camp. And this much suppose as spoken to the Lords of the Senat, But you our foundiers. O worthy General believe they first to give us leave to fight, then defirous are we to conquer and under thy standard and conduct to conquer to present thee with a glorious garland of laurel, and in triumph to enter with thee into the City: and after thy *

"...to go up with joy and mirth to the Temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus. This Oration of Tullius, the multitude seconded with their petitions, calling aloud unto the General on every side, to found the alarm, and command them to arm. The Dictator, albeit he thought the matter in it fell good, but not handled in good manner; and for example fake not to be allowed; yet promised to satisfy the soldiers desire. "And calling Tullius secretly apart, questioned with him 'What this matter meant, what precedent or custom they had for their warrant? Tullius earnestly beheld the Dictator, not to think him to have forgotten either military Discipline, or his own 'place nor yet the Majesty of his Sovereign. And whereas he had not withdrawn himself away 'from the multitude being in a mutiny, nor refused to be their speaker (who lightly re semble 'those that are their ring-leaders) it was only for fear lest some other should have stept in place, I "such as the finely people in mutinies are wont to set up for their Captains. As for himself, do 'nothing he would, without the pleasure of the General. Howbeit he would advise him to look 'well about him, and carefully to see it, that he keep his army in order, government, and obe dience. And high time it is now, and would not be deferred. For considering their hearts were 'kindled already, and their blood up, they would be their own carvers, and chule themselves 'both time and place, if the General would not grant it them the sooner. Whilesthey were thus in sad communication, there happened two Roman soldiery to take perforce from a Gaul certain finger Horfe's, which feeding without the camp, he was driving away. At whom, the Gauls let flye fome good fcore. And thereupon rofe an alarm from the Roman Corpor de guard, and running out there was apace, on both sides. So as now they had grown to a full skirmish and battle indeed, had not the Centurions speedily flickled them, and ended the fray. Upon which occurred, the credit of Tullius with the Dictator was confirmed: and seeing the cafe would abide no delays, he proclaimed battle againft the morrow. The Dictator notwithstanding he had yelded to figh fight a feld as preluming more upon the courage of his men, than their forces; began to de vile with himself, and caft about every way, how by some stratagem he might strike a ter ror among the enemies. And having a fubtle wit and nimble head of his own, this new policy he thought upon: which afterwards many warriors, both of our own country, and of others also, yea, and some even in our time, have used and put in practice. He gave order, that the mules fump ters should be taken off their backs, leaving only two coniile twills or coverings upon them, and lettefs the muleators aloth thercon, furnifhed with the armour of certain captives, and fiek L and disfefted perfon's. Of thefe he made wel neer one thousand, and joynd into them one hundred good Horfemen. All thefe, he charge them in the night time to get above the camp into the hills, and among the Furs and woods, to befow themselves close: and not to flir from thence, before that he gave them a signal. Himself, fo long as it was day light, began with great warines and considerate care to embattel and arrange his army in length along the very foot of the mountains: to the end, that the enemy might have the hills full against him. Thus having fet out and directed thefe counterfeit comet's of Horfe, to scare the enemies with, who, as it fell out, did more good in a manner than the other forces indeed; at the firft the vanguard of the Gauls thought that the Romans would not come down on even ground: but afterwards, when they faw them upon a sudden defended, they alfo, as defirions of fight, ran on forwrd pretently to joynt battel, and be gan the fight before the Captains had founded. The Gauls charged the right wing more fiercely, so that harly they might have been abidden had not by good hap the Dictator been there in perf on. "Who call'd upon Sextus Tullius by name, and rebuked him, demanding whether he had 'given his word unto him, that the fouldiers fhould in that firit fight? What is become (quoth 'he) of thofe, that with out-cries and open mouth called for battel? Where are thofe threats 'now that they would begin to figh fight a field without commandment of the General? Lo, your "General himfelf calleth upon you as loud as he can, to fall to your business, and goehe armed be 'fore the enemyes in the vanguard: will any now follow after that weary while would needs lead the 'way afore? Fierce (I fay well) in camp tearfull in the field. And no fable it was that they heard 'him speak. Whereupon for very fame they were no pricked forward, that without calling any N perils, or minding pretent danger, they ran upon the darts and shot of their enemies. This vi olence of theirs, as if they had been weathe out of their right wits; as the very firft troubled and dis ordered the enemies. The Horfemen that were fent out hard after them, forced them to turn back, when they were one in diarray. The Dictator himfelf feeing the battel of one fide to fhirk ad vanced forward with the enemys againft the left wing, unto which he had the main multitude to refor t and gather together, and withal he gave the fign to them that were within the hills, ac cord as it was before agreed. And when from thence also a new fount arose, and that they were fone to march fide-long overthwart the hill, toward the Gauls camp; then for feaft, left they fhould be flut out from their hold, they gave over all fighting, and ran by heaps to their camp. Where MV. Ferius, the General of the Horfemen encountered and affronted them. For he feeing the right wing difcomfitted had fet a compafs about, and ridded to the fortifications and munities of the enemies. Whereupon they fled to the mountains and the woods. Most of them were received by the counterfeit fow of Horfemen, and by the muleators caught up, and came short home: but as many of them as fear drive through into the woods, were (after the heat of the battle was past) cruelly flain and hewn in pieces. Neither was there any one, letting MV. Ferius a fide, that triumphed more worthily over the Gauls, than did C. Subrinus. He confecrated alfo in the Capitol a good weighty mals of gold, got out of the Gauls spoil, and commiffed it within an enclofe of square stone.

songs, the foolish preparation of the enemy, and also condemning their own fearfulness. After this, the whole nation of the Tuilcans arose, having for their leaders the Tarquinius and the Fallici, and came as far as Sulina. Against which fearful danger, was C. Marcus Rutulius chosen, the first Dictator that ever was of the Commons: who named for his General the Horatian a Commons likewise C. Plantinius. But the Senators thought this a shameful indignity, that the Dictatorship also should now be chosen in common: and did all they could possibly to hinder, that there should be nothing decreed toward the war, nor any preparation made for the Dictator. But to much the sooner, and with more readiness, all that the Dictator proposed, the Commons granted, So he departed from the City, and marched on both sides of the Tyber (transporting his army in boats and planks tilled together) to what place forever he heard the enemies were gone: and surprised many forriages of them, as they wanded and fraged one from another, in the fields. He set upon their camp also, and want it: and after that he had taken eight thousand prisoners, and either slain or chaled all the rest out of the Roman pale; he triumphed, by the sufferages of the people only, without the approbation and assent of the Senators, And for almsuch as would not in any case have an assembly for Election of Consuls, held either by the Dictator a Commons, or by the Consul: and because the other Consul Fabius was busied abroad in the wars, and not returned; therefore, the matter fell again to an Interregnum. There were Interregents one after another, Q. Servilius Hult., M. Fabius, Cn. Marcus C. Fabius, C. Sulpietius, L. Aemilius, Q. Servilius, and M. Fabius Ambulpus. During the second Interregnum, there arose some variances for that both Consuls were Patritii, of the Nobles. And when the Tribuns interposed themselves, and crossed those proceedings, Fabius the Interregent, alleged a Law out of the twelve tables in these terms, That whatsoever the people ordained or granted loth, the fame should be good, and stand firm and ratified: and in suffrages and voices of the people, were comprized their grant and ordinance. But when the Tribuns, for all their gainaying and flogging betwixt, could prevail no more, but to prologue the Comites for the Election, there were at length two of the Nobles created Consuls, C. Sulpietius Petetius the third time, and M. Valerius Publicola: who the same day they were chosen, entred into their office. Thus in the 400 year after the foundation of the City, and the 35 after it was recovered from the Gauls, the Commons left the Conullhip again, when they had enjoyed it nine years. And two Consuls of the Patritii, upon the Interregnum, began to govern, to wit; C. Sulpietius Petetius the third time, and L. M. Valerius Publicola. The same year was Empolium won from the Tyburnists, without any memorable warlike exploit: were it that, under the conduct of both Consuls there jointly together, the war was managed; as some have written: or that about the same time the Tarquinius Country was by the Conul Sulpietius over-run and wafted, whereas Valerius led forth a power again the Tyburns. But more ado had the Consuls at home, with the Commons and Tribuns, The Consuls thought now, it concerned them in truth and credit, as well as in vertue and valor, that as they, being Patritii both of them, had received the Conullhip, so they should make over the same again to the Nobility: and either wholly to give up their interest and title for ever, if to be the Conullhip should now become a Commons dignity: or else to keep it wholly in their possession, whereof they were first seized intirely, in right of their ancestors. On the other side, the Commons famed and formed in the like and such like terms, What should we live any "longer? and why are we accounted citizens? In cait, that which was first got by the vertue "and power of two only persons, L. Sextinius, and C. Licinius, we cannot now all of us together "hold and keep? Certainly, better we were to endure the KK, and Decemvirs again, or any other "heavier and more fearful name of absolute and Lordly Empire, than to see both Consuls of "the Nobility: and that we, may not both rule and obey in turns, but that the one part settled in "the place of rule for ever, should think us, the Commons, born for nothing else but to obey and "serve. The Tribuns themselves were nothing behind to fet forward their troublesome mutinies. But when the people are up once altogether and in commotion, the principal leaders are hardly seen above the rest in the action. And when as they were come down into Mars fieldunday times to assemble, by ever to no-purpose and effect, and that many Comitial days of assembly were paffed over, only in feditious troubles: at the last, the Commons being overmatched through the limines and obiliculty of the Consuls, took the matter to grievously to the heart, that when the Tribuns brake forth into their speeches: Now farewell freedom for ever: now are we driven, "not only to forbear coming into Mars field, but also to abandon and forsake the City; taken "captive and oppressed by the Lordly rule of the Nobles, and therewithal departed the Commons "with forrowful cheer did the semblable, and followed after. The Consuls being thus let ditti-"ufone part of the people, yet nevertheless went through with the Election, as few as they were there remaining. And Consuls there were elected of the Nobility both, M. Fabius Am-"buflus the third time, and T. Quintinius, in some annals or yearly records, I find Cofl. M. Popilius, instead of T. Quintius.

In that year, were two wars performed with prosperous success. And the Tyburnists were fought withal until they yielded. From them was the City safiude won by force: and other Towns had tafted of the fame fortune, but that the whole Nation laid arms aside, and submitted themselves to the Consul his mercy, He triumphed over the Tyburns: other wise the con-"quest was mild and gentle enough, without extremity of execution. But the Tarquinians were cruelly dealt withal: and many a man of them slain in field. Of the prisoners that were taken, whereof As whereof there was a mighty number, there were 358 of the Noblest and greatest Gentlemen chosen out, and sent to Rome. The rest of the common sort were put to the sword. Neither spied they better at the peoples hands that were sent to Rome. For in the midst of the Forum were they all beaten with rods and beheaded. This execution made quitance with them, for refining the Romans in the marketplace of the Tarquinians. This good success in war caused the Samnites 3) to look for peace and amity. Their Embassadors were courteously answered by the Senat, and to upon covenants they were received into civility. But the Commons spied not to well at home in the City, as abroad in warfare. For albeit the Ulyss was well eated by bringing it down from twelve to one, in the hundred: yet the poorer people were over charged with the payment of the very principal, and became bond and thrall to their creditors. Whereby the Com, in regard of their privat freightes, that they were driven unto, never troubled their heads with the making of both Consills of the Nobles nor with the Embassadors and Elections nor other publick affairs. Still the two Consillships remained among the Patrines. And created there were Consills, C. Latio II. F. Pecius the fourth time, and M. Fabricius Pulcher the second time.

Now when as the City was earnestly amended upon the Tavuan war by reason that the news were, how that the people of Cæs., for very pity and compassion, and in regard also of contemptuity, took part with the Tarquinians; behold the Embassadors of the Latins turned them clean against the Volticans, Whil. Embassadors brought word, that there was an army levied already from thence and in arms, even now upon the point to invade their borders: and would from them enter the territory of Rome, and spoil as they go. The Senat therefore thought good to reflect neither business, and gave direction, that to both places certain legions should be appointed and the Consills to call for their several Provinces and Charges. But afterwards, the greater care was taken for the Tavuan war, upon intelligence given by Sulpicius the Consil his letters, which great commilunion was against Tarquinius, that the country was waited and spoilt all about the Roman-Sabine, [or Salt-pits] and part of the booties carried away into the confines of the Cæsiars: and that the youth of that people were doublebly employed in the driving of that booty. Whereupon Fabriculm, was called back from thence, and commanded by the Senat to nominate a Dictator. Who named T. Manlius, the son of Latinus, and he taking to him A. Cornelius Cossus for his General of the Hordeans, conningent himself with his Consillary army, by the authority of the Senat, and the peoples sufferages, proclaimed war against the Cæsiars, and lent them defend. Then were the Cæsiars turned off: indeed, and good fortune, as though there had been no forces, their enemies bare words, to denounce and signify war, in their own persons, by spoiling and plundering, had provoked the Romans to war. Then saw they plainly that they were not armed and not able to make their parts good: then repented they that they had made such wait and spoil, courting the Tarquinians: for following them to revolt, not one of them making any preparation of armour or war: but every man labouring what he could, that Embassadors should be sent, to crave pardon for their trespass: and soe. When their Embassadors were come to the Senat, they were from thence put over to the people. And then the people might the Gods, whose

That the Romans now in their flourishing state, would take that pity and compassion of them, which they in times past had of the Romans, in their calamity and hard distresses. And turning to the choppes of Vefiis, they called upon the Flamines and Vetal Virginis, sometime their guests, whom they hastily and religiously had received and given entertainement unto, saying in this wise, "Would any man believe, that he had deferved no better, but thus of a sudden, without cause given, to be repined enemies? Drippose we had done somewhat flanding of hostility, would any man endure it rather to deliberate counsell, than to come fit of heat and folly? And that we would be mild and

Before us not to tell that considerate adde, which rather were to be called force and necessity. For the Tarquinians say they pulling with a cruel and puissant army through our country & requelling nothing but away, had drawn with them some of our rightful Peasants, to abild them only in lettch of that booty, which now to heavy is laid to our charge. Whom if you please to have them yielded, we are ready to deliver them; if to be punished they shall suffer accordingly: most hungrily craving, that their City (Cæs., the very sanctuary of the people of Rome, the harboret and habitacion of their Priestis, the place of receiv-

The people were moved, not so much with the justice and equity of the present case, as for their old delectes and good turns to forget rather the harm inflamed than the good received. Whereupon the people of Cæs. were pardoned. I agreed it was that a truce for one hundred years should be required among the Aediles of the Senat. Then were the forces diverted against the Falfiis, who were taunted likewise with the same offense. But the enemies would no where be found. They waited therefore all over their confines; & to bare to affit their Towns, So they withdrew their legions to Rome. The tale of the year was employed in repairing their walls & Towers: and the Temple of Apollo was de-dictated. In the very end of the year, the contention between the Senators and the Commons brake off the Election of the Consuls: whiles the Tribunes freely denied to suffer any assembly therefore to be holden, unless it were according to the Law Lictoria. And the Dictator again was as stoutly and freely bent, to abolish wholly out of the City the Consulship, rather than it should be indifferent for the Nobility and common people. Thus by adjourning the Election, the Dictator left his office, and the matter grew to an Interregnum. And the Interregnum, finding ever the Commons mulitiously set against the Senators, succeeded one after another unto the eleventh Interregnum: and all the while continued the discord and variance. The Tribunes they called on hard for the maintenance of the Law Lictoria. The Commons, they had an inward grief that stuck neerer to them upon the excessive utter that still increas'd: and each mans privat care and grievance, brake out in their publick contentions and debates. The LL. of the Senate weary of these troubles, commanded C. Cornelius Scipio the Interregent for the time being, for concord and unity in the Election of Consuls to observe the Law Lictoria. So P. Valerius Publicola had joyne with him in fellow ship of government, Caius Martius Rufus, one of the Commons.

Now whiles mens minds were enclined once to concord, the new Consuls labouring to eale also this matter of utter, the only spill or bone (as it were) between, that seemed to hinder the uniting of their hearts, and impeach the general agreement: took order publicly for the payment of debts, by creating five offices or Q. Quingueviri, whom of the defpating and disputing of the publick monies, they called Memphori. And surely, for their equity and careful diligence, they deserved in all monuments and records to be remembered and renowned. And these they were, C. Duellius, P. Decius, M. Papirius Q. Publicola, and T. Aemilius; who undertaken and managed this matter, so intricat and difficult to be dealt in: to grievous and combersome both sides for the most part, but evermore to one at the least, which they performed both with indifferent moderation, either, and also with some coit and defray of charge, rather than any los and damage to the State. For the long debts and more entangled, rather in regard of the debtors slackness and negligence, than their will of ability, either the City out of the common stock crosed out of the book, by letting up certain counters or tables with ready coin in the publick Hall (provided, that there were good security unto the City by sureties and cautions put in aore-hand); or else the goods of men valued at indifferent and reasonable prices discharged. So as not only without any wrong done, but also without the complaint of both parties, a mighty deal of L. debts was satisfied and paid.

After all this, a vain Fear of the Tufcan war, upon a falle Alarm given, that their twelve Nations confir'd and were confederate together, caufed a Dictator to be choene. So C. Fulvius was named in the camp: for thither to the Coift, was the patent of the Senats decreet sent. And to him was joyne General of the Horkemen, L. Aemilius. But all was quiet without the City: Within the City the Dictator gave the attempt, that both Consuls should be created of the Patriotes: which brought the government for the time to an Interregnum, and the two Interregents that were in that while (to wit) C. Sulpisius and M. Fulvius, obtained that which the Dictator had reached at in vain; namely, that both Consuls might be created of the Nobility: for now the Commons were more pliable and tractable, by reason of the treafe beneft received, in the eafe ment M. and satisfies of their debts. So there were choened C. Sulpisius Petiunculus, he, who was the former of the twin that gave over the Interregnum, and T. Quinctius Paeonius. Some there be that give to Quinctius the addition of Ces for his surname [and of Cenforhis forename]. Both of them went forth to war; Quinctius against the Falisci, and Sulpisius against the Tarquinians. Who, for that they could never meet with the enemy in open field, by burning and spoiling made war with the fields rather than with the men. By which lingering continuance, as it was of a languishing consumption, the stubborneest of both Nations was so well tamed, that they made petition first to the Consuls, and by their permissiop after to the Senat, for a truce, and obtained the fame for the term of forty years. Thus the care was lid aside of the two wars, which seeme to meate at hand. And whiles there was some rest from Arms, it was thought good because the payment of debts above N fayd, had changed the owners and masters of many things, that there shoule be held a general Selling of the citizens. But, when there was an assembly summoned for the chusing of Centoors, C. Martius Rufus professing himself to stand for a Cenforship, even he that had been the first Dictator of the Commons, troubled the peace and unity of the States of the City. This he went about (as it seemed) in a very undue and unfeasable time. For, both Consuls were then of the Nobility, as it fell out, who gave it forth that they would not admit him to be a Competitor, nor propound his name at the Election. Howbeit, both he by earnest perseverance in his resolution obtained that which he went about: and also the Tribunes with all their might endeaving to recover their right, which was lost in the Election of the Consuls, fert to their helping hand. And as the countenance and Majesty of the man himself, seem'd worthy of the highest type of honor: O the Commons were right willing, that by the same man who had opened the way unto the Dictatorship, the Cenforship also should draw to that side, and be in part conferred upon them. Neither in the assembly was there any variance in the Suffrages, but that, together with Martius Nervius, Martius should be created Cenfor. This year likewise had a Dictator, M. F.ibus; not for any fear of war, but because the Law Lictoria, for the choice of Consuls, shoule not be revived and observed. The General of the Horkemen unto the Dictator was Q. Servilius. And yet for all the Dictatorship, the agreement of the Senators together, was in the Election of the Consuls.
A. Consuls no more force then it was in the chusing of the Cenfores. For Popilius Laenas was Consul, of the Commons, and L. Cornelius Scipio of the Nobles. And thecommoner Consul, by good fortune, proved more famous of the twain, For when upon riding’s brought, that a mighty army of the Gauls were encamped in the Latine country, this Gaul’s war was laid extraordinary upon Popilius, because Scipio lay grieveously sick. Who having soon levied an army, and commanded all the younger men, to meet him in their arment at Marcellus His Church, without the gate Capena, and that the Queflos should bring the Standards and enignes out of the Aquarium [City chamber] and after he had chosen out of them, fully four Legions, he delivard all the refuse of soldiers unto P. Valerius Publicola, the Prætor: and moved the L. of the Senat to enroll another army to be in readiness, against all uncertain occurrances of war, what need ever the City should have. And now himselfe being at all points throughly furnished, setting forward to meet the enemy. Whole power because he would know, before he had trial therof with the uttermost hazard, he began to call a trench and raise a rampier upon the next hill unto the Gaul’s camp, that he could come unto. The Gauls a fierce kind of people and by nature eager of sight, having discovered afar of the Roman eignes, embattell’d themselves forthwith, as ready to bid battle. But when they saw the Roman army not brought forth into the plain and even ground, but that they were strongly defended, not only by the height of the place, but also with a dureh and palisade, and supposing them to be mittem with fear, and the fitter therefore to be affaile, for that they were at that instant bully occupied about their other fortifications, with a hideous noise and horrible shout, gave the charge upon them. The Romans gave over their work never the sooner (they were the Tissia of the rearward that made those fortifications) but the speenmen or juglers of the vanguard and the Princeps of the middle ward, who stood ready armed in guard for the defence of the pioners, made head and received them with fight. Besides their valour, the higher ground was their vantoge so as all their darts and spears light not in vain: as commonly they do that are slung and lanced on level ground; but flesh all fall as being poind with their own weight: so that the Gauls being uncharg’d with darts either flicking through their bodies, or fell let in their shield, and to weighing them down; having also turn them upon the hill first, as downfull what to do, made stay, afterwards, when protruding of time had discouraged themselves, and encouraged their enemies, they were driven back and fell one upon another: and in that confusion made greater havock and worse, then the slaughter was by the enemy; and cuffed they were to death, more in that cloud and thrust, then were slain by sword. Yet were not the Romans sure of victory: for when they were come down into the plain, there was a new piece of work to begin, and a fresh trouble behind. For the Gauls, by reason of their number, little keeping in a loose (as if a new army had start up in fight, out of the ground) stirred up their fresh footmen and unfoiled, against the enemy in his victory. Whereupon the Romans made a stand and stay’d their eignemes; both because they being already wearied, were to abide a new conflict; and all for that the Consul, whiles he laid about him with the forming, without regard of his own person, was wounded well near the left shoulder with a pike, and thereupon for a while was departed out of the battell. By occasion of which lingers, the victory had like to have been lost again; but that the Consul when his wounds were drest and bound up, came back again with speed to the torment eignes, and said: Why stand you still? Ye have not to deal now with the Latin or Sabins your enemies, whom after ye have conquer’d by the sword, ye may make of enemies friends and confederates: but upon very savage beasts we have drawn sword either we must have their blood, or they ours. From the camp ye have driven them back: chafed ye have them headlong down the hill side; over the bodies of enemies lying along, now ye stand: fill the plain with their dead carcasses, as ye have done the hills already: and never look that they will fliue, so long as ye stand still. Ye must advance your eignes, and charge the enemy fiercely: with these exhortations they fell to it the second time, and forced the former ranks and files of the Gauls to lose ground: and then with pointed close battalions of footmen, they brake through in to the heart of the main battell. Whereupon the barbarous people being disdistened, such as had neither certain directions to follow, nor Captains to command, turned their force upon their fellows, were scatter’d here and there about the plains, fled in this pursuit beyond their tents, and made toward the fort of Alba: which among many hills that stood of even height, they espied mounting above the rest. The Consul followed the chase no farther then their camp; both because his hurt made himself unwieldie, and also for that he was unwilling to put his tired army to a new labour, considering the enemy had gained the hills tops, and retir’d from farther pursuit. And when he had given the whole pillage of the camp to his footmen, he brought back to Rome his army with victory, and invinc’d with the spoils of the Gauls. The Consul his wound flaid his triumph’s, which was a cause also that the Senate wish’d and longed for a Dictator, to hold the assembly but for the Elecrion Consul, besides the other were sick.

B. L. Flavius Camillus being chosen Dictator, had yeald’d unto him P. Cornelius Scipio for his General of the bottome. He retir’d again to the Senators their ancient postellings of the Consulship: and for this good turn, was himself with exceeding of them all, electe Consull. And for his compinion he chose unto him App. Claudius Crassus. But before the new Consuls enter’d unto their office, Popilius with great love and favour of the Commons triumphed over the Gauls: who mumbliing and muttering among themselves, would often ask one another, whether there were any repent’d of a Commoner Consul: rating withall at the Dictator, so despising the
the law Livius, had got for his reward a Consulship; which was more shamefull and infamous, in regard of his privat seeking for it (for being Dictator he had made himself Conful) than for any publick harm and injury. This year for many and shameful stories was very famous. The Gauls from the Alban woods (for that they were not able then to endure the cold of winter) ranged all over the Champagne and sea-costs, and wasted the country. The less likewise were dangerous by reason of the Greeks navy. Also all the tract along Aeminium, and the river of Lantennium, even to the very mouth of Tiber. So as the rovers and men of war by sea, and the land robbers of the French, met both together, and struck once for all a dangerous battle; and then departed almos, the French unto their standing camp, the Greeks back unto their ships: both doubtfull, whether they had won or lost. Amid these troubles, the greatest fear by far, arose from this, that the Latine Nation held certain Diets and Councils at the grove of Parentium, and when the Romans demanded foillidours from them, flat answer was made, That they could not with any couneil or command as soon as they might resolve them some way, and so for the Latins, they were forced rather to bear their arms in defence of their own libertie, and to think for the maintenance of the dominions of Flamnes. The Senat being grieved and perplexed as well for these two forain wars, as also for the revolt of their confeders, seeing no other way, but to keep them in by force, whom loyally would not refrain, commanded their Conuls in their manifesting, to extend and delay to the utmost the whole strength of the State : for now that their Allies failed them, they were to tryst upon their City forces only. From all parts therefore, the youth as well without in the country, as within the City were taken up, and ten legions (as men say) were enrolled of foillidours, amounting to 4000. foot and 500. horse in a legion. Which puissant army, if now at this day any forain wars were toward, the mighty forces of the people of Roma, which the whole world is hardly able to contain, if they were united and brought into one together, would not easily make again: to great arc we grown in wealth only and superfluous delights, to which we like and apply our minds.

Among other heavy occurrences of that year, Ap. Claudius one of the Conuls, in the very preparation of the wars, departed this life. Whereupon the whole government was devolved up on Camillus. To which title Conul, either for his quality and worthless otherwise (not meet to be controlled by the absolute command of a Dictator) or for the lucky preage of his name to fortunator in all the tumultuous wars of the Gauls, the Lords of the Senat thought it not decent and convenient that there should be a Dictator adjoynd. The Conuls having ordiuned and appointed two legions for defence of the City, and parted the other eight with the Pretor L. Flaminus, bearing in mind his fathers valour and manhood, undertook the Gauls war himself, without calling lots therefore: commanding the Pretor to keep the sea-costs, and to put the Greeks back from landing on the thre. He went himelf down into the country of Pompeii, and because he was not willing to give battle in the champian, unforced thereunto, and thought the enemy might be wearied out well enough by keeping him short, for forraging and fetching in booties, who of necessity was driven to live of prey, chose a convenient place for a standing camp. Where, as they past the time quietly in their wards, as a settled Garrison, there came forth a mighty Gaul in perilous tall and beg, for armour brave and glorious: who clattering his shield and spear together, and thereby making silence, gave defiance and challenge by his interpreter to the Romans as a combat, a man to man. There was one M. Palerius a Conoul of foillidours, and a very young man, who thinking himelf nothing les worthy of that honour than T. Manlius, having first known the Conul his pleasure, advanced himself forth apart from the rest, armed at all points. But this contest, (as touching the prowess of themen) was les notable than the other, by reason that the whole of God came between and took a part. As for the Roman was ready to joyce and cope, behold suddenly a raven flew upon the crest his of morion, even full in the face of his enemy. Which at the very first, the Conul took joyfully as a token of good luck sent from heaven. Afterwards he praised devoutly, that the God or goddess who ever, that sent unto him from above that augural foul, to preface and forsignifie the future event, would be favourable and gratsious unto him. And lo, (a wonder to be spoken) the bird not only held the place still, which it first light upon, but also, as often as the champions buckled and cloed together, mounting up with the wings made at the eyes and the face of the enemy, with beak and claws both, so long, until Palerius killed him. For the Gaul being at length at this strange wondrous fight, both his eyes dazzled, and his mind was mingled, troubled. Then the raven took his ride, flew on high quite out of sight towards the East, All the while the camp on both sides was quiet hithero. But after that the Colonel began to rise and disperse the Body of the slain enemy, neither could the French keep themselves within their Stations, nor the Romans conten, but run with more speed upon their Conqueror champion. And so about the body of the Gaul left along dead, began some skirmish, and thereof grew a sharp and cruel battle; for now not only the compania of the next quarters, and corps de guard, but also the whole legions on both sides, came abroad and fought. Camillus commanded the foillidours, joyous for the victory of the Colonel; joyous also for the gods, so favourable and ready to help, to go to battle; and the reign very often unto them the Colonel, set out bravely and enriched with the spoiles of his enemy, "Follow this brave gentleman, good foillidours (quoth he) and about the dead champion of the Gauls killed their whole troops, and lay them along. In this fight appeared the help of God and maneviendly: and they fought it out with the Gauls, and had no doubtful conflict both armies.
A armies had so conceived and deeply imprinted before hand in their mind, the future event of these two factions that fought together. Between the formost, whose concorde had raised others, there was a sharp conflict: but the rest of the multitude, turned back before they came to the volley of darts. And first they were scattered along the Volscian and Etrurn countries; but afterward they took their ways toward Apulia and the lower Adriatick seas.

The Consul having assembl'd the factions to an audience, solemnly before them all, commended the Coi, one, and rewarded him with ten excons and a coronet of gold. Himself, by direction from the Senate, to attend the war by sea, joined camp with the Preter. And there, because through the cowardice of the Greeks that would not come into the field, the war was like to be long:

B and lingering, he nominated, by the authority of the Senate, T. Mamlius Torquatus for the Dictator, to hold the Election of Consuls. The Dictator having named for his Generall of horsemens, A. Cornelius Coflus, held the Election, and with exceeding favour of the people, declared for Consul one like himself, and tracing the steps of his own virtue and glory, M. Valerius Corvinius (for that was his surname afterwards) in his absence, a young man, I say, three and twenty years old. To Corvinius was adjointed companion in government a Comonner, M. Fopolis Lentus, the fourth time. Camillus performed no memorable exploit with the Greeks: for neither were the Greeks good soldiers on land, nor the Romans at sea. At the last being kept from landing; and failing, besides other necessaries, of fresh water, they left Italy. Of what people, or what nation in Greece, this fleet confituled, is not certainly known. I would think verily, that they were the Tyrians or potenntses of Sicily, above all other. For all Greece beyond them, at that time wearied and troubled with civil wars, much feared the greatnesse of the Macedonians. After the armies were discharged, and that abroad there was peace, as also at home quietness, through the unity of the States, it seems they should be glutted with too much joy, behold a pleniquence in the City and contrived the Senate to command the Decemvirs, to overlock the books of Sibyls: by and by direction thereof, was a Leisiflerea celebrated. The same year there was a Coloss drawn out of the anxious, to people Satricum, and the town was repaired for them, which the Latins had destroyed. Alto there was at Rome a league concluded with the Carthaginian Embassadors, who came of purpose to sue for societie and amity. The time retl continued full both at home and abroad, when T. Mamlius Torquatus, and C. Plantus the second time were Consuls. The story which was before after one in the hundred, became now but half so much. The payment of debts was dispensed & ordered into three years by even portions, as a fourth part should be paid out of hand. And albeit some of the Commons (for all that) were pinched therewith, yet the Senate had more regard to lee creditor kept with the chamber of the City, then of the difficulties of private persons. The greatest matters were well eased, in that they forbare to collect the tribute and to multer foundiers.

The third year after that Satricum was redeemed by the Volscians, M. Valerius Corvinius the second time Consul with C. Pernius, upon news of Latium, that Embassadors from Anuus were about to the nations of the Latins, soliciting them to rise up in arms, was commanded to make war upon theVolscians, before the enemies forces were greater: who put him to his journey with a fierce army toward Satricum. Whether when as the Anuans and other Volscians were to come meet him, with a power provided beforehand, against any preparations from Rome, presently without any stay they joyned a battle, as being through a deep diked and long batted, mutually bent one against the other. The Volscians, a nation more busy to rebel, than busy to fight, being defeated in a battle, fled amain and highspced to put themselves within the walls of Satricum. But when the walls were not able to save them, for that the town being environed and invested round with foundiers, was ready to be taken by scaling, there were upon 4000 of them, besides the common fort not met for service, that yielded themselves. The town was raised down and burnt; only they fired the firing of Mars's church. And the whole baggage and spoil was bestowed upon the foundiers. But there were not comprim'd within this booty, 45000 that yielded. Tho'the the Consul in his triumph caus'd to be led bound before his chariot: and after that, tol'd them, & brought a round sum of money into the treasury; Some write, that this number of captives, were condemned. And that is more like to be true, than that they should be fold, who yielded themselves. After this followed Consuls, M. Fainiis Dominus, and Servius Sulpicius Camerinus. Then began the Auruncan war upon a sudden incision that they made. And for fear left the action of that one State and City, had been the revolution of the whole Latine nation and by their maintenance, there was created Dictator (as it had been against all Latium already up in arms) L. Furia Caius: who chose for his General of armorines, Cn. Marullus Capito. And (as the state had been in time of great troubles and sudden tumults) it mattered without any respect of Inmunity and Exception, and there with proclaimed a Cessation of all courts of law: and the legions with all speed possible were led against the Auruancies, where they found, that they carried the mind of plunderers rather then of warriors. So that in the first battle, that war was dispatched. However the Dictator, because they not only made the quarrel and warred first but also offered fight without any drawing back, supposing there were some need of Gods help withall from heaven, had vowed a temple to Juno Moneta: and after he had obtained that he vowed for, and thereby was charg'd to perform his vow, so soon as he was returned home to Rome with victory, gave up his Dictatorship. The Senate commanded two officials called Dauniiwits to be created for the edifying of that temple, according to the magnificence of the people of Rome. The place was appointed and let out on the [Capitol] hill, even the very plot of ground, where sometime before flood the dwelling house of H. M. M. Antistius Capitolinus. The Coll. having imploied the Dictator his army in the Volscian war, surprized at unawares the town Sora one of the enemies hands. The Temple of Moneta was dedicated the year after it had been vowed, when C. Marcius Rutulius the third time, and T. Manlius Torquatus the second time, were Consuls. I immediately upon the dedication of that church, there ensued a strange wonder, like unto that old marve of the hill Albuminus. For it rained stones, and in the daytime it seemed to be dark night. And the books of Sibylla being perused (for that the City now was slightly given to superstitition) the Senators ordained, that there should be a Dictator named for the ordaining of certain feails and holy days. So P. Valerius Publicola was chosen, and with him, Q. Fabius Ambustius General of the horsemen. Order was given, that not only the Tribes should go in solemn procession with their priests and Lantaries, but also the nations that bordered upon them: with a precise direction unto them, upon what dates every one should make application. This year (as it is reported) there passed heavy judgments and the Sentences of the people against the Utuines, with whom the Ediles had commenced guilt. And without any notable caufe to be remembered, they grew an Interreign. Upon which, that something might be thought thereby done, both Consuls were made of the Nobles, M. Valerius Corvinus the third time, and A. Cornelius Cetheus.

Now from hence-forth we treat of greater wars, both for the preservation of the enemies, and also for their far distance: as well for their spacious countries they inhabited, as long tract of time that they continued. For this year began the Romans to bear arms against the Samnites, a nation powerful in wealth, and valiant in field. After which war, fought on both sides with alteration, native fortunes, there succeeded Pyrrhus their enemy, and after Pyrrhus the Carthaginians. To fee (good Lord) the wonderful trials and troubles, and how often the Romans fell into extremities of perils, that their Dominion and Empire might arise unto this greatness and high state, which hath much ado to hold its own, and stand maintained, but the caufe of the Romans war with the *Samnites, being in society and animosity linked together, arose from others, and not upon any quarrel between themselves. At what time as the Samnites warred unrightfully (as being more mighty) upon the *Sidicins they: they as the weaker and forced to file for succour unto the richer, banded with the Campains. Who bringing with them a greater name, than power (in deed) to aid and subserve their Allies, and flowing in riot and uproarious delights, hapned in the country of the Sidicins to be foiled &defeated by the other, who had been joured and hardened by continual use of arms: and so after L. wards drew upon their own heads, the whole violence and poite of the wars. For the Samnites letting the Sidicins alone, went to the head, and set upon the Campains, as it were the very forts and castle of defence for all the borderers. For we will that there they might win victory as easily: but riches & honour at their hands they were to achieve much more. And when they had gained and held with a strong garrison, the hills called *Tisfrata were disjoining, and commanded the City Capua. From hence they descended with a four-square ranged battell into the plain that lyeth between Capua and Tifata: where a second field was fought: In which the Campains had the overthrow, and were beaten within their walls. Having threfore no hope nearer hand, and seeing the strength of their youth greatly decay, they were contrived to seek for aid of the Romans. Whose Embassadors being admitted into the Senat, and having audience given them, spake much what to this effect. The people of Capua, most noble Senators, hath sent us forth amably unto you, to crave at your hands friendship for ever, and succour for the present. Which accident if we had requisted in our prosperity, well might it sooner have begun, but knotted it had been with a weaker bond and not so durable. For then remembering our selves to have entered league and society on even ground, and in equal estate with you; friends hapy we should have been as we now are, but bounden and devoted unto you, we had never been. But now, in cale by your *comfortation and pity we be gained and won; and in our diffcre, by your aid, helped and reliev'd; we muil needs affectionally embrase a benefit from you received, unless we would be thought unthankfull wretches, and unworthy of any helpeither of God or man. And albeit the *Samnits, have been before us entertained in friendship and confradery, yet we think that no sufficient bar, but that we may also be received into the same. Only thus much it ought to make for them, as to be preferred before us in antiquity of time, and degree of honour. For in that alliance between you and the Samnites, there is no express clause, no covenant or proviso contained, against the making of any new confradery. And larely, alwaies hertofore ye have thought it such good enough of your friendship, if the party who fought the war, were but willing and deinous to be your friend, We Campains (albeit our present condition fuffereth us not to speak magnifically) giving place to no nation but your selves, either for the flately port of our City, or goodneffe, and fruitfulneffe, of our soil, in entraiing into your acquaintance, shall not a little, I suppose increase and better your good estate. And first for the Equins and Volscians, those eftabl. and perpetual enemie of this City, they shall not so soon at any time fire and put out their heads, but we will beftronge upon their jacks. And look what ye first shall find in your hearts to doe for our state, the fame will we always do for your Empire and honour. And when those nations be once subdued that are between you and us (which your vertue and fortuna felicif, promith will be shortly) then shall your dominions reach all the way in a continued train, as unto us. A pitifull and lamentable case it is, that our pretent for a time urgeth us to conffesse; To this exigent and hard terms of extremity are we Campains driven (right honourable) that subject we must be, either to our friends or to our enemies. If ye defend defend us, yours will be we ; for sake us once, we must be the Samnites. Consent ye now therefore deliberately, whether ye had rather, that Capua and all the territories of Capua, should be annexed unto your power and State, or added to the Samnites Seigniory. your mercy your favour, O Noble Romans, sought in equity to extend unto all men, but especially unto those, who by yielding their relief and helping hand (even above their power) unto others, that impoverished and humbly beleaguered fucceors, are now themselves fallen, into the same straits of necessity. And yet, to say the truth, we sought in fure and reliance of word for the Samnites; but in very deed and effect for our selves. For considering a neighbour nation, bordering even upon us, to be robbed and spoiled most wrongfully by the Samnites; we well foresaw, that when the Samnites were once set a burning, the same fire would soon be driven and reach unto us. For now are not the Samnites come to all us, as discontented for any injury received: but, as well pleased that they have cause of quarrel offered and presented unto them. For if it had been but a revenge only of anger upon some pretended wrong, and not a mean and occasion, to satisfy their greedy appetite: had it not been enough for them, that they had vanquished and put to the sword our Legions once in the Seicene country, and a second time in Campains it tell our own territory? what a checkered and a mortall naile is this, which bloodshed and massacres in two battles can not fatigue or silence? besides the wanting of our fields, the driving away of booties, as well of people as castell, the firing of villages. the rain and havoc they made; and in every place nothing but fire and sword. Could not their anger and wrath have been satisfied with all this? But it is their greedy and unalterable covetounis and nothing else that must be filled. That is which carrieth them, that haleth and draggeth them to the assault of Capua. As it is their teeth water, that most goodly and beautiful City will they either destroy, or be LL. thereof themselves. But may it please you Romans, to gain it afore by your own benefit and good defeat: rather then suffer them to leiz upon it by wrong and mischief. I speake not this before a people that useth to make it strange and goodly to undertake any rightfull and just wars. If ye but shew a copy of your countenance, as it ye would aid and succour us, I suppose ye shall have no need at all of further war. The Samnites overweering of themselves and contempt of others, reacheth to us only, further it procedeth not. Thus under the very shadow of your assistance, O Romans, we may be safely covered and protected. And whatsoever we shall hereafter gain thereby, whatsoever we shall be of our selves (even as much as we are worthy) ready are we to acknowledge it all yours. For your sake shall the Campain ground be tilld: for your behoof shall the City Capua be returned unto and frequented: and accounted shall ye be of us no less than founders, parents, yes, and as the immor all gods. There shall be a borrough or Colony of yours, that shall go beyond us in obsequious dutifulness towards you. Do but aford unto us Campains, O Noble Senators, a token of your gracious countenance, yeeld us your invincible name as a powerful deity, and bid us hope affur'dly, that Capua shall remain still and continue in safety. What a number think ye of all forts and degrees of people, followed and accompanied us, when we came from thence? How left we all places filled with their vows, their prayers and tears? In what expectation now, do the Senat and of people Capua, our wives and children, attend our return? Affraied am, that the whole multitude stand about the gates looking toward the high portway that leadeth from hence thither, waiting to know what news, expecting what answer, my LL. your pleasure is that we should report back from you unto them, to carshall, to heavy, so perplexed. One word pretenteth unto them safety, victory, life and liberty: the other, I dread to preface what it may import. Wherefore to conclude, determine of us, either of them that shall and will be, your confederates and faithful Allies; or else both as must be worse then nothing. After that the Embassadors were withdrawn aside, and the Senat fell to counsel: although a good part of them were of opinion, that the greatest and wealthiest City of all Italy, the most plentiful and near to the sea, might be as it were the garner and storehouse, whatsoever variable changes of corn and victuals might happen: yet they let more by keeping their faith and promise, then of that great commodity that might accrue unto them: and thus by direction of the Senat made the Consul answer. "The Senat judgeth you O Campains worthy of aid: but meet it is that we entertain your amity, so, as more eminent society and friendship be not thereby violat and broken. The Samnites are in league, and confederate with us. We must needs therefore debar you from making that war against the Samnites, which should sooner dishonour the gods then hurt and wrong men. Howbeit, as equity and reason doth require, we will to our Allies and friends give our Embassadors, to intreate them to offer no violence upon you. To this answer the chief man of the Embassadors (according as he had commision from home) replied and said: "For as much as ye are not willing to defend our right and cause, by just and lawful power against violence and injury; your own yet. I am sure ye will maintain. Therefore my LL. of the Senat, here we yield up in your hands, and to the G Seigniory of the people of Rome, the whole nation of the Capuans, the City Capua, our lands and pollifions, the sacred temples of the gods, and all things else both holy and prolepare. And whatsoever from henceforth we shall suffer and abide, we will maintaine it as your judgement and subjects, wholly devoted as vassals unto you. At which words they all held up their hands unto the Consuls, shed tears plenteyly, and fell down upon their knees in the very entry of the Counsell house. The Senat moved with consideration of the changeable course and turn of human fortune, in the world, to see so great and mighty a people as power, to pompous for superflus ous abundance and magnitude (at whole hands but a while before, the nations bordering had creved and begged their aid) to carry with them now to base and broken hearts, as of their own accord, to submit themselves and all they had in the whole world, to the power and devotion of others: were persuaded now it was a matter of truth and faithfulness, not to abandon and see betrayed, that these were thus reduced under their protection. Neither thought they, that the people of Samnium could in any equity or colour of Justice, invade that land, or assault that City, which was lucrured and annexed to the imperial State of Rome. Whereupon presently they a-reed to dispatch Embassadors unto the Samnites, who had incharge and commission to make declaration unto them; First, of the Campains petitions: secondly, of the answer of the Se-nat returned unto them, implying the remembrance of the Samnites amity: last of all, of the I Campains surrender. Then to requite and define them in regard of their mutual society and friendship, to pare and forbear thence, that were their vaills, and not with any hostility to invade that territory, which was become subject to the people of Rome. If by this courteous dealing they could do no good, then, to command the Samnites in the name of the people and Senate of Rome, to abstain from the City Capua and the country of the Campains. When these Embassadors debated these matters in the Council House of the Samnites, they returned to flout and arrogrant an answer again, not in these terms only, That they would go forward in the war begun; but (that which more was) the rulers coming forth of their Council House, even while the Emballadors there stood, called to the captains of the cohorts, and with a loud voice commanded them forthwith to make a rode into the Campain country, for to spoil and fetch booties. This Em-K

baffle being returned home again to Rome, the Senators letting aside the care of all other matters, sent their heralds to demand restitution: and for default thereof, after the solemn manner to proclaim open war. Whereupon they decreed with all speed possible to propound this matter to the people: and by the consent of the people, both Coll, with two armies departed the City, Valerius into Campania,Corneliu into Samnium: and pitched their tents,Valerius at the foot of the hill Gaurna, and the other at Saricula. The Samnites legions pretented themselves first to Valerius(for that way they implood all the forces would be bent) for indignation also, against the Campains, because they were to ready one while with their own fuccons,& another while in fending for the aid of others against them. And loo soon as they discovered the Romans camp, in all hal(l every one for his part) called lustily to their captains for to strike up and found the battell: affuring themselves, and laying plainly, that the Romans should speed as well in succouring the Campains, as the Campains done had before them in aiding the Sicilians, Valerius, after he had amusfed the enemies not many daces together, with some light skirmishes, only to make trial of them what they could do, forthwith the signall of battell at the last, but first exhortcd his fooldars in a short speech in this wife, That neither this new war nor new enemy should terrify them: for as much as the far-thet they wearied from the City, the more cowardly Nations they were, and left warlike till to whom they went. That they should not esteem the value of the Samnites by the late losses & defears of the Sicilians or Campains: For whatsoever they be that contend & fight together, one fide or other cannot chafe, but go to the wals. The Campains, doublet, had the overthrowing ther through their own effeminate tenderness, as flowing too much in excelle and luperfility of M pleasures, than by their enemies hardiness and valour. And what were two so untam'd batches's of the Samnites, in fo many ages to be let against so many honourable victories of the people of Rome? Who, from the first foundation of their City, may number more Triumphs well near than years: who have by war subdued all Nations about them, the Sabines, Hernia, the La-tains, Heurnicks,Equiuns,Volciuns, and etucchini. And as they ought to go into the field,every man preluming & trusting upon his own manhood and glorious warfare to shoule they have an eye, and consider, under whole leading and regiment they were to enter into battell. Whether the were a man that in the hearing of his fooldars, could only make good and magnificent Orations, fierce in brave words, void of Military works: or he who himself knew how to handle his weapon, to advance before the Standards, yes, and to be empied even in the middle of all the biset. I would have you (quoth he) my fooldars, to follow my deeds and not my words, and of me to learn, not only discipline, but also good example. I have not by bribing and facti-nons, nor yet by courting and Orations (small matters among Noblemen) but by this right hand of mine, attainted unto three Confulships, and to the highest honour. The time had been indeed, when a man might have said thus unto me: No marvel, For why You were a gentleman of noble blood, descended from thosc that were the deliverers of their country: & in the same year that the City had first a Conful, this house of yours had the Confulship But now the cale is altered, the way unto a Confulship, is open to you Commoners, as sons of the Nobility. Now is it not the gudement of birth and gentry, as aforetime but the reward and remembrance of venue and valour. And therefore my fooldars, loot at the highest dignities, and aim at Sovereignty honour. And although that are men, have by the grace and approbation of the gods, given unto me this new addition of furnaces [Corona]: yet have not forgot the antient name of the Publiccat, appropriated unto our family. I love and ever will (as always I have done) the Commons of Rome, at all times alike, both abroad in wars, and also at home in peace, as well a private persons, as in my offices, were they little, or were they much; whilsts I was Prince, whilsts I was Conful; and no ensnaring have I bee throughout all my Confulhips, one after another. Now for this present enterprize which we are about, with the help of God, & in his name have I slept with A me for a new and fresh Triumph over the Samnites. Never was there a Generall more familiar with his fooldiers: as willing as the meatt be of them, to lay his hand upon any base offices that that were to be done; yes, and in the very training and exercises of the fooldiers, at what time as equality matters of Activity and Strength, one with another, gently would he otherwhise take the foile, as well as the victory, and ever keep one countenance still: not rejecing or refusing any one whatsoever would offer to match him, or be his mate. For deed, benignse and bounti-ness to his power, and as occasion required: in his words, no leffe mindfull of the freedom of o-thers, than respective of his own place and dignity: and (what which, there is nothing more popu-lar) look by what vertuous demeanour & carriage of himself, he fought to attain unto honours and promotions, with the same he bare them, and went through with them. Therefore the whole army with incredible cheerfulness accepting this exhortation of their captain, illud forth of the camp into the field. Never was there battell fought more indifferentely on both sides. Their hope was like, their forces equall, with full trut and confidence in themselves, and yet without contempt of their enemies. The Samnites, for to what their courage, presumd upon their frethes and late ac-chieved acts, and their double victory but fewe days before. The Romans on the contrary side, flood upon their honour and reputation for the space of four hundred years, and their conquests every since the foundation of their City. Yet they were troubled, both the one and the other, to deal with a new and unknown enemy. The manner of their fight thew what romackes they car-ried. For the conflict was such, as for a good while they steemed on neither part to yield one foot.

C Then the Consul beinge they could not by mere force be caufed to retreat, thought to set a sudden fear among them: and therefore affaieth, by sending in the biffed men upon the fornooff enigges, to break their rankes, and put them in diftarray. But when he saw, that in small troops of ground they tooked themselves in vain, and could not well manage their troops and cornets, not break in upon the enemies, he rode back again to the van and forefront of the Legions, and di-urnished from horback, "Wether are footmen (quoth he) when all is done, must do the deed I fee well. Come on then, and as ye behold me (which way forever I go) by dint of sword to make way and entrance into the enemies battell: so every man for himself, down with him that stands next in his way. Straightways shall ye see, that where as now their spears and pikes stand glittering and bent upon us, there will be a wide lane made over their skin carcasses. He D had not to looke spoken their words, but the biffed men at the Consuls commandment, ran upon both the wings and points and made way for the footmen to enter the main battell. First and forth the Consul in perfon chargeth the enemy, and whomsoever he happened to encounter, him he killeth in the place. This goodly fight fell the reft on fire: and then every man did his best, laid about him manfully, and carried it afore him right worthily. The Samnites flood to it still and maintai ned, notalbeit they got more knocks and wounds then they gave. Thus when the fight had continued a good while, notwithstanding much bloody slaughter about the Samnites enigges: yet no flying was there on any side: so relutous were they, by death only to be vanquished. Whereupon the Romans feeling their own strength for weariness decreed and spen, and but little day left, in-flamed with anger, gave a fresh charge all at once upon the enemies. Then (and not before) be-gan they to think and give ground, and encline to flight: Then were the Samnites taken prisoners E and thain thick. Few or none had escaped alive, but that the night came to put them then, ther it in-terrupted the victory, rather then ended the battell. Both the Romans themselves confcribed, they never fought with a more stubborn and obstinate enemy: and the Samnites also beinge com-pelled the primitive caufe, which forced them (so likely bent as they were) to run away at the last, (that, the Romans seemed to have burning fire in their eies, and to carry in their faces and viftages the furious rage of mad and frantic persons: and therest first began they to be af-frighted, more then at any thing else. Which fearfulness of theirs, they bewaried not only by the present event of the battell, but also by their disdilling and departure away in the night. The mor-row after the Romans were masters of their empty and asked camp: into which all the while multitude of the Campaignes came running in numbuer to rejoice and congratulate their vic-to-

F. But this joy had like to have beene fowly blemished with an overthrow and defeat in Samnium. For Cornelius the Consul beinge departed from Samnium, had engaged his army undeviably within a forest, through which went an hollow valley or lawn, forisid on both sides with an ambusc: neither discovered he his enemies over his head, but as such time as he could not retire with his enigges into a place of safe receiue. But whiles the Samnites raised only until he had brought his army fully down into the bottom of the vale, P. Decius, a Colonel of footmen, espied in the for-ret one little high hill, which commanded the place where the enemies by encomped: and as it was for any man heavily armed, and charged with carriage, hard to be got up unto: so for them, that were lightly appointed and burdened, nothing difficult. He perceiv-ing the Consul troubled in mind and straignt: See you not (quoth he) O Augus Cornelius wonder hill-top above the ene-mie? That is the very fortifique of our hope and safety, if so be that we can gaine the same lusti-ly, as the Samnites have left it blindly. I require no more of you, but to let me have the princes and speare men of one only Legion. And when with them I have once preceded the top theretoo, let forward you from hence and fear not, neither make doubt to gave your left and the army. For the enemy being under us, and lying open to all our shot, cannot firr without great loss: and precedent milchiefe. As for us, either the fortune of the people of Rome, or our own manhood shall work out

The policy and valor of P. Decius, Our evanion. Being commanded by the Consul, and having received that troop and guard which he demanded, he marched close through the woody paths, and was not defeated by the enemy before he approached the place that he went to. And whiles they all were amazed thereat and wondred, and wholly turned their eyes to himward, he bore the Consul some time to withdraw his army into a more convenient and open ground, and poissified himself of the hill top, and there roll'd. The Samnites, whiles they turn'd their enantes to and fro, (as men that loft the vantage of both sides) could neither make after the Consul, but through the same valley, wherein a while before they had him under their shot, nor yet ereft their squadrons, and march up that hill, which Decimus over them had already gained. But being more angry with those, that thus had disappropriated them of the fair means they had of a brave exploit, and considering within the meanece of the place, and their small number which were gotten thither, they were one while of mind to environ the hill round with armed men, and to keep Decimus from the Consul; another while, to make them way, that when they were come down into the valley, they might take upon them. Thus whiles they were in doubt what to do, the night overtook them; Decimus at the first, was in good hope to fight with them from the higher ground, as they mounted up against the hill: but afterwards he marvelled much, that they neither began to charge upon him, nor yet when they were disappropriated and put by that purpose, through disadvantage of the ground, fortified themselves with trench and rampier, and other pioners work. Then calling the Centurions unto him,

"what unskilledness (quothebe) of military service, what supine slackness and sloth is this? and how got thee loz'd the victory of the Sidicins and Campains? Ye fe the eneigns waving luther K and thither: one while budied they are in one together, another while advanced and dilatated at length. As for munitious & fortifications, no man beginneth any: and by this time we might have been entrenched round about. But if we stay here longer then for your vantage, we might be counted lazy lobbies like them. Come on then, go with me, that whiles day light ferveth, we may see in what places they quarter their guards, and what way we may get from hence and escape."

All this went he to elpoe and discover himself in person, clad in a common fellows jacket, leading with him the other captains in the habit of their fellows: to the end that the enemies might not take mark of the General himself, how he went about to view them. After this, when he had dispo'd the centurions and corpor de guard, to do the rest he commanded a watch word to be given, that when the rampfer mounted the second watch, they should come all unto him armed, and let no noise at all. When they were thither assembled with silence, as he had commanded, this filenelss my fellow louldiers (quoth he) must ye keep, whiles ye hear me speake, and forbear all giving affent by uttering your voices as louldiers use to do) When I shall have delivered my mind to you, let as many as like thereof, go loily on the right hand, and not speak a word: and look what side is greater, that course shall stand and take place. And now listen what my conceits is, and what I would have done. The enemy hath not invested you here, as men either fled a way for fear, or lagging behind for sloth and indolence. The place have ye won by manhood: by manhood must ye from thence escape. In coming hither, ye have already laved a brave army of the people of Rome: and now by breaking out from hence, save your own selves, Worthy you are that being but a few, have succoured many, ye should not stand in your selves of any mans help. With that enemy ye have to deal, who yesterday through their inenellesse, overflipp'd their happy opportunity to defeat our whole army: who were so blind, that they saw not this hill of great importance even over their heads, before it was by us gained: who being so to many thousands, could neither debar us from climbing up, as few as we were, nor when we had got the place, compasce us about with a trench, having so much day as they had. These eneigners, whom ye have thus deluded & beguiled, whiles they were awake, and had their eyes-right, ye are to deceive when they are fast asleep, say, ye must doe to indeed, there is no other remedy. For at that paffe we are now, that I am rather to shew you, in what terms of extremity ye stand, then to advise you to the execution of any good counsell. It is no considaring at this time whether ye shold here lay, or depart hence; that besides your weapons, and hearts setting up rest upon their weapons, fortune hath left you nothing at all. And die we must without doubt for hunger and thirst, when we dred the words point more then befitted hardy men, and valous Romans. One way there is therefore, and but one way of safety, even to make a brave self through and away. This muft we do, either by day or by night. And that doubt is soon cleared. It if we look for the morning day, what hope have we, but that the enemy will call a ditch and bank even round about us: who already as ye see lying under this little rising, have compassed it with their very bodies. Now, if it be to that the night might be a convenient and favourable time for irruptions and fallies, as in truth it is: then, this hour of the night certainly, is of all other the fittest. And at the second watches found ye are come hither, at which time all men are in their most sound and dead sleep. And their bodies being asleep, shall ye go. Either by fire hence deceive them unawares, or if they perceive you, slay them with a sudden ouercome, Do but follow me, as ye have done already, I will follow the same course that guided me hither. Now as many of you that think this good counsell, and a course like to speed well, make no more ado but pass on my right hand. So they all passed, and followed after Decimus as he went through the quarters void of watchmen and warders. Now were they escaped the midis of the camp, when a louldier, as he clambered over the watchmen bodies, lying heavy asleep, chance to tumble at a shield, which gave a found again. Wheret the watchman being awakened, railed his next fellow,

A low, and they being start up, call up other, not knowing whether they were enemies or fellows, whether the garrison of Decius on the hill was broken forth, or the Consul had surprised the camp. Decius then, seeing his garrisons could not escape clear and undisturbed, commanded them to let up a shout. And thereafter he joined with them a new fright, who were already drowned in drown-fines; so as they could neither take weapons readily, nor make head against them, nor yet pursue after them. While the Samnites were thus amazed and in confusion, the Roman garrisons had by this time slain the warders whom they met, & were marching towards the Consul his camp, as yet was somewhat of the night to come: but now they seemed to be safe, and put all danger. Then (quoth Decius) forward in this courage of yours, O hardy Romans; this your patience and return to and fro, all ages shall extol and praise. But for the full light and view of so great a worth, we had need of broad day light: for ye defend better, than that the full night should hide you in to glorious a return of yours into the camp. Let us here rest, and wait for day. His words were obeyed; and so soon as the day brake, he despatched a meffenger afore unto the Consul: and to with exceeding joy they made speed to the camp. And when it was known in the camp by the privy watchmen, that they who had put their lives in most dangerous hazard for the safety of them all, were themselves returned safe: then every one came forth to meet them as fast as they could, with praises and commendations, calling them all & some, their favours; praising the immortal gods, and giving thanks, ye, and extolling Decius to the skies. This was the triumph of Decius in the camp, as he marched through the midst thereof with his armed garrisons, whiles every man called his eis upon him, and made him a Coronell, equal to the Consul in all kind of honour. When he was come to the Praetorium, the Consul by found of trumpet, called all the army to an audience, and as he entered into a discourse of the deserved praises of Decius, Decius himself interrupted him, and cutteth off his speech. Whereupon the Consul put off the Oration. Decius then perfwadeth the Consul, to let slide all other things, and whiles the occasion and opportunity was offered, he urged him effectually, to give an alarm to the enemies, both while they were amazed with this care by night, and also lay flattering about the hill, as it were in their several fencens. Besides, he thought verily that some were sent out after him to make fresh fault, and wandered alway in the forrest. So the Legions were commanded to arm, and being departed out of the camp, and by means of the epilals better acquainted with the forrest, they were conducted by a wider and more open way toward the enemy, whom suddenly they surprised & charged, unaware and unprovided as he was. And for as much as the Samnites garrisons were striking abroad, and most unarm'd, and could neither rally themselves and take arms, nor retire into their trench, they drave them at first with fear into their camp: after, whiles the guards about it were disordered and troubled, they were matters thereof also. The noise was heard all about the hill, and caueth every man to flee out of his hold. So a great part of them took their heels before the enemy could come. But so many as for fear were driven within the trench (& those were some 3000) were all slain: and the camp rifled & spoiled. The Consul having achieved this exploit, called an assembly: and not only finilhed the praises of Decius, as he before began, but also amplified them with fresh commendation of this new service. And besides other military gifts, he rewarded him with a crown of gold, a hundred oxen, and one specilall white one, fat and fair above the rest with guiled horns. The fouldiers who together with him held the hill forsook, had given unto them for ever after, a double portion of corn, and for the present one ox, a piece, and two single liveries. After the Consul his reward was bestowed, the Legionary forthwith put up Decius his head a wreath of green graffe, in token of a delivery from siege, and with notable louses and loud cries approved this gift. Another chaplet or garland, also, in token of like honour, did his own band and company set upon him. And thus being adorned with these ornaments of honour, he sacrificed that chosen white oxen unto Mars; and belowed his hundred oxen among those his fouldiers, who had accompanied him in that exploit and service. To the same fouldiers the legions gave a pound measure of wheate meal, and a x textar of wine, a piece. All these particulars were performed and done with great cheerfulnes, and seconded with shouting and acclamation of

viuels, and was both by their lying before Suessa, and also by their long stay there without fight brought to scarcity well-near of all things: it was thought good, that whiles the enemies kept within the wall as affrighted, the soldiers should be sent about the country to foraging. In which mean time they supposed that the Romans likewise would have spent all, who were thither come lightly appointed, and found no more corn with them than they could carry on their shou- ders, besides their armour. The Consuls having eloped the enemies straggling over the country, and their guards tenderly manned, after a brief exhortation to his soldiers, led them forth to give an assault upon their camp. Which when they had won at the first shout and onlet, and killed more of the enemies within their tents, then either upon the gates or upon the rampir; he caused the signes that he had taken, to be brought together into one place : and leaving there two legions, I for a guard and defence, with a strait charge, that until he came again, they should forbear to fight and make spoil, he went forward in order of battell. And when the hordesmen which he made out afore, had like hunters driven the scattered Samnites, as it were, within net and toil, he fell upon them and committed an exceeding great slaughter. For frighted as they were, they knew neither at what signal they should rally themselves together, nor whether they should make speed to the camp, or the farther away. But to great was their fright and flight both, that there were brought to the Consul, 40000 shields, more indeed then there were men slain : besides 170 en- signs, together with those that were won in the camp. Then returning he unto the enemies tents, and bellowed the whole pillage there, upon the soldiers. And such was the happy success of this war, that it both caused the Falisci being in truce, to come unto the Senate, for a league: and also turned the Latins, who had prepared their forces already from warring with the Romans, to wage war upon the Pellenii. Neither relented the same of this so fortunate a victory within the marches of Italy: for even the Carthaginians also, sent their Embassadors to Rome, with gratulation, and a present of a golden crown weighing twenty five pounds, to be set up in Jupiter Temple within the Capitol. Both Consuls triumphed over the Samnites, and Decius followed after, all goodly to be seen, with his gifts and worthy praiies: whiles the soldiers, as their manner was, with merry jeds and rude ditties, magnified and renowned the name of the Colonell noles than the Consuls.

After this the Embassadors of the Campains and the Suessians had a day of audience: and upon their humble request it was granted, that thither should be sent a standing garrison to winter there, for to stop the excursions and invasions of the Samnites. But Capua, even then no good place for military discipline, wrought an alteration in the soldiers there: who having once got a taste, and taken a delight in a world of pleasures of all sorts, quite forgot their own natural country. For of the garrison, began to lay plots and devise how to get Capua from the Campains: even by the same wicked practice, by which themselves had won it first from the ancient polefensian inhabitants, saying, "It made no matter and they were but rightly served, in case their own precedent example, should return upon their own heads. Again, why should the Campains, not able to defend themselves, nor maintain their liberties and goods, be left to the most plentiful country of Italy, and of a City answerable and correspondent thereunto, rather than the victorious army, which with their sweat and blood had repelled and expelled the Samnites from them? And was it any reason, that they who had yielded to be vassals unto them, should enjoy that fruitfull and pleasant tryst, while they themselves wearied with fighting, starved till and wearied in a perilous air, and dry barren soil, about the City of Rome, and within that City, indured the fetter, and invertebrate and infernal milch and plague of slavery, that surcharged them daily more and more? Whiles those projected conspiracies were contrived in secret conventicles, and as yet not broached and divulged to all mens knowledge, the new Consul, C. Marcius Rutulius came in place: whose lot it was to be L. Deputy of the province Campania, leaving his fellow Q. Servilius in the City, who having intelligence by the Captains and Colonels, of all the particularities of those desig- nes: being a wise man, both for his old age and long experience (as who was now Consul the fourth time, and withal had been Censor and Dictator) thought it bell to difmisse the matter, and to make void and frustrate the present heat and outrage of the soldiers, by deferring and prolong- ing their hope, as if they might put in execution their plots at their best leisure, whenever they pleased. He raifeth therefore a rumour, that the garrisons should in the same towns winter a- gainst the year following: [*For divided they were into sundry Cities of Campania: & the web began at Capua, was spread from thence through all the forces.] By means of this good reip to think themselves and advise of these matters, the mutiny for the present was well quieted. The Con- salts then led forth the soldiers into the summer places of wood and reposes, and purpoze while he had the Samnites in quietness to cleanse the army by the casting & discharging those, buff bodies and troublesome spirits: pretending colourably, and saying, that some of them had served already so long as the law required others were well now kept in years, or waxen feeble and their strength decayed. Some had their passports limited, and were sent home: the first one by one jingled out, afterwards certain whole cohorts or bands, as having wintered far from their dwelling places, from their goods and substancen. Under a pretence and colour all of military services and improvisions, whose one by one were dispatched one way, some another, a great part of them were rid clean away. All this multitude, the other Consul and the Pretor kept till at Rome; deviating this cause, and that, of delays and aising behind. And verily at thrust, they being not aware of this delusion, were not unwilling to visit home. But after that they perceived, that neither they who were disimposed first returned again unto their colours, nor any in a manner dis-charged else, but such as had lien in winter garrison at Capua: and those especially, who of them were the authors of the conspiracy; first they marvelled, and afterwards feared in very deed, that their complots were revealed and come to light: and that now presently, they should be put to examinations and tortures, abide straignment and judgement, be executed secretly upon one by one, and suffer the insolent loundneffe, and cruel tyranny of Coniulds and Senators over them. Those and such like speeches low they and whisper secretly, that were in the camp, when they saw the principal authors of the mutiny, who were the ffeaws and strengh of the, by the cilly policie of the Conful to be demembered from them. One cohort of them, being not fafe from Axurr: first them down at Lutulc, in a narrow place or wood between the fes and the mountains, to intercept and play, whomoever the Confulent about this or that pretended mutinefe and abovefeid. Soon were there gathered together a strong power: and nothing wanted to make shew of a full army, but only a head and Captain, and disordered as they were, they were robbing and spoiling, as far as the Alban country, and under the fhill of Lavin: Alla they encamp themselves within a trench and rampjier. Which work being finished, they sped the rett of the day in consultation about chusing a Commander, little trusting any one there present in place. And who possibly (if they) could be fent for as fafe as Rome? What Senator or Commercer was there, that either wittingly would venture upon to great and dangerous an entreprize to whom the cause of an army, enraged upon an injury received, might feafe be committet? The next morrow, whiles they reasoned still about this point, and fealfly debated the matter, some of the wandering and vagrant forragers of the Country therselfe, bring certain intelligence, that Titus Quinctius implied himself in husbandry, and held a farme in Tusculum, meaning neither the City, nor dignities of flare and Common weal. This man was come of noble linage, and having served with great credit and honour in the wars by a wound received, was lame of a leg, and gave himself, determining to lead the rest of his life in the country, fettled afar from all courting and ambitious figne of civil office. They had not to foum heard his name, but prefently they took knowledge of the man, and (that which might turn to their good) agreed with one accord, he should be fent. Small hope there was that he would willingly do any thing: they thought therefore to use force and to bring him to by fear. So, in the deadef time of the night, they that were went theroeto, entered the farm house, and finding Quinctius found, and a full asleep, they awaked him; propounded unto him either rule and honour, or else present death: and no mean between, in cafe he made itay and refused to go with them: and so they held and brought him to their camp. Incontinent he was faled L. Generall at his first coming. And when the man was affhifted in troubled and wonderful occurrent, they cause him with the ornaments and emblems to that honor belonging, and will him to lead them as their commander to the City of Rome. Thus having plucked up the standards, in this heady fit of their own, rather then upon any advice or counfell of their captain, they march in warlike manner with a army toward Rome, within eight miles of the City, upon the eufcly or street way now called Appien Fas: and had approached immediately in that train to the very City, but that they heard there was a power coming against them, and a Dictator created to withhold them, and to wit M. Valerius Corinmius, togethcr with L. Emnius Mancrus General of horfmen. So soon as they were come in interview one of another, and took knowledge of the armor and emblems: the remembrance of their native country wrought with them straight way a mitigation of their mood. They were not yet so far gone, nor so hardy, as to fhead cill blood meother had they knowledge of any other wars but forren: and the uttermost rage and maddett fit that ever they proceeded unto, was counted their Seceffion and departure away from their own countreymen. And therefore both captains and foelfiers on either fide fought means to meet together, and draw to imparre. Quinctius for his part, who being had already his hands full of war: in defence of his country, could work: broock taking arms against the fame: Corinmius like wife for himself, as one that with loving affection embraced all his fellow-citizens, but the foelfiers especially and above all others thel of his own army that fought under his banner, came forth to a peace. And forthwith as soon as he was once known, he had no less value renounce done of unto him of the advartice part, than silence and audience given of his own men. The immortal gods (quoth he) O foelfiers as well thefe which are common to you all, as mine own particular patrons, when I took my leave of the City, I adored and worshipped in this wife, craving humbly upon my knees at their hands, to vouchsafe me the honour, not of a victory over you, but of procuring concord and unity among you. Exclamations there have been, and will be enceffe elwe where, to win glory and warlike renown: From hence, peace onely is to be taught. And evenths which among my voles that I made to be devoted to the immortal gods, it lieth in you to make me enjoy. Doe, but call to minde that neither in Samnium, nor among the Volocium yee are encamped, but upon Roman ground: that thole this which yee behold, are the fins of your native foelfie: this army which yee fee, are of your own Countreymen and fellow Citizens: and my leffe your Countil, under whose conduct and Auipice, yee have the year to passe defeated the Samnite legions, twice by mere force woon their campe, and driven them out of the field. I am, first, that M. Valerius Corinmius, who above the ye have had triall of, not by any wrongs done, but by good turnes on your part received. Author Have I been of no proud law, nor cruel Act of Senate against you: a man in all my government and rule that I bare, more rigorous to my felfe than severe to you. And if ever there were one, who might be proud either of Noble race and gentry, or of his own vertue and valour, of majesty and high calling or honourable dignities; of such progenitors am I descended, such profe of prowess have I given: at that age attained I to Consular honour, and being three and twenty years old, I was able to have been feared and dared, not of Commons only, but alio of the Senators. But what deed or word hath passed from me in your knowledge, more grievous and odious when I was once Consul, then all the time I was but a Colonel? the fame course held. I still during my two Consulships ensuing: and such shall my carriage be, and none other, I whiles I am Dictator: that I will be no more mild and gracious to thee here about me that are mine and my countries fouldiers, then to your selves affronting; who are, I tremble to speake it forth, mine enemies. Ye shall therefore draw sword upon me, before I draw upon you. The trumpets from thence shall begin sound, the flourishing from thence shall trie, the charge from thence shall be given stuff, if we must needs go to it and fortune. Yee, find in your hearts (if you can) that doth which neither your fathers nor grandfathers before you ever could: no, nor they who went away and departed unto the mount Sacer, nor those who afterwards held and kept the Aventine. Expect, until your mothers and wives, with their hair hanging about their ears, come forth of the City to meet with you one by one, as sometimes they did to Corioliannus. Then, the Volscian legion were quartered and pacified, because they had one Roman for their leader: will not ye then, being a whole army, all of the Romans, surcease this unhind and impious warre? And then T. Quintius, howsoever thou art come there to stand, whether with or against thy will: in cale there be no remedy, but fight worthily, retire thy felle amongst the hindermost: ny, with more honesty the thou shalt, and shew thy naturlly counten the fair parre of heale, then fight against thy country. But stand full hardly with both nour and credit among the formalty to make attemotions: thou shalt, be a true maker in this our carly and conference, to all our goods. Ask and have, any reasonable and indifferent conditions: although in truth we were better to yeld unto hard and unequal capitulations, than wickedly and ungody, one to fight with another. T. Quintius with tears gulling out at his eyes, turning to his owne companies: And even me also (quoth he) of fouldiers (if need there be at all of me) ye have a much better captain for peace than warre. As for him who even now uttered those wordes in your hearing, was neither Volscian nor Samnit, but a Romane, even your owne Consul sometyme, fouldiers, and your own General heretofore: whole Aupictecraft, you having tried for you, and in your defence: doe not prove now against your selves to your perdition. Others had the Senate to lend as captains, who would have fought more maliciously with you: but they have made choice of him who above all others, could beseare with you, yes, and bor hear you that have been his fouldiers: whom you of all others especially might trust, as having been your General. Peace, yee see, even they desire that are to get the victorie. And what is it then we ought and should do? Why then for we not angre and hope affide, two fafe motives, two deceitfull guides and counsellers; and betake our selves and all wee have to a man of approved truth and fidelity? These wordes being liked well of all (as appeared by a General shout) T. Quintius went forth before the enigne in the forfront, and pronounced that the fouldiers should be at the Dictator his devotion and pleasure: bethecheing him to consider and undertake the cause of poor and wretched citizens: and having taken it into his hands, to maintaine and protect the same, according to that faithfulness whereof with he used to governe the Commonwale. As for himselfe privately, he would not intend ought for his owne security: neither repose the hope in any thinge the but innocence. The fouldiers indeed were to be capitate, as once heretofore the Commons, and a second time the legions had done with the Senators: namely, that this their revolt and petty rebellion might not be laid unto their charge, and their hurts and utter undoing. Then the Dictator, after hee had first commended Quinittis, and willed thefe to be content and of good cheer, rode poht to the City, and by the advise of the Senators, preferred a bill unto the people in the grove Petulentia: That the mutiny and insurreccion should turn no mans fear and danger. He belought the Quiritis alio of this much favour besides, That neither in yft nor carnall, this should be laid in no mans dijt. The same time there was prepared besides, a faced military law under pain of death, That no fouldiers name once entered into the musetersfer his books, should be rased out against his will: With this branch annexed over and besides, That no man who had been aforetime a colouell or Tribune, should after have the leading of bands, and be a Corporall. This was followed hard and urged by those of the conspiracy, in regard of one P. Salaminus, who in maner each other year had been either a Colonel, or a chief Centurion, whom now they call Frampili. Him the fouldiers spighted much, and were maliciously set against, because he had always opposed

The Latines, together with the Capitans resolved: and the Latines having sent their Embassadors to the Senat of Rome offered and presented peace upon this condition only, that they would create one of their Capitans out of them. This Embassage thus declared, Annius their President, who had audience in the Capitol in going down from thence, took such a fall, that he died in the place. T. Manlius caused his owne son to loose his head, because contrary to his express commandement, he had fought against the Latines, notwithstanding his good success in that combat. At what time as the Romans were greatly distressed, and like to lose the field, P. Decius then Consul, with Manlius devoted and offered himselfe to present death for to save the Army: and setting spurs to his horse, rode into the midst of the enemies battall, where he was slain and by his death recovered victory to the Romans. The Latines yielded and received themselves. When T. Manlius returned into the City, there was not one of all the youth came forth to meet him, and do him honour. Minuitia a professed friend of Virginius, was condemned for her incest, or incontinent life. The Auantius being Judith, a Colony was planted in Cales, and another like wise in Frigilia. Many Roman dames were detected of practising poisons: and most of them were forced to drink of their own emposyed cups first, whereof they died presently. Wherupon was the first Law then ordained against poisons, The Priurnates, when they rebelled were overthrown and after wards disband with the Roys office of the City of Rome, The Palatins were defeated in battall first, and after he was surrendred upon Composition, Quintius Publilius who block'd them within their wall, was in the first month that had his Comission revoked, and continued fell in government, when the ordinary time was expired: and by means of the Consuls had a triumph granted unto him. The common people were delivered from the danger of their creditors, by a cession of the fifth part of one of them, Lu. Papirius, who would have forced, and against were accused C. Publilius, a debtor of his. When L. Papirius the Dictator was returned from his Army into the City, for to take the Ausciyes away, by reason of some error supposed in the former conduct of C. Fabius, the General of the horsemen. In his absence the opportunity and advantage of performing a worthy exploit came to his notice, and put the Samnites to the war, for which cause when the Dictator seem'd to punish him accordingly, Fabius made an escape and fled to Rome. And when his cause would not bear him out, he had his pardon at the earnest request of the people. This book containeth also the fortunate exploits against the Samnites.
Now was C. Plautius Consul the second time, with L. Emilius Paulus, when the Sicines and Norbans brought tidings to Rome of the Privenants revolt, with complaints of harms inflamed at their hands. News came likewise that an Army of Volsciens, under the conduct of the Antists, were encamped at Satricum. Both thes were fell by lot to Plautius. Who taking his journey first to Privernum, forthwith bad them battle: and with no great concern gave his enemies the overthrow. The Town was won and retafted again to the Privenants, with a strong garrison therein placed, but two parts of their Lands were taken from them. The Army thus having obtained victory, was conducted thence to Satricum against the Antists. Where was a cruel battle fought with much bloudshed on both sides: and when as the tempestuous and stormy weather parted them asunder, before that either side enclin'd to victory, the Romains ⟨no whit weaken'd with that conflict so doubtful⟩ addressed themselves to fight against the morrow. But the Volsciens having taken a view and account what men they had lost in fight, were not of like mind to adventure the hazard again: and therefore as vanquisht men they dislodged by night in disorder, and fearfull took their way to Antium, leaving behind them their wounded, and part of their baggage. Great store of armour was there found, both upon and among the slain bodies of the enemies, and also within the Camp: Which the Consul promised to dedicate to C. L. For the Consul, that had put to death their/common friends, and Consul, that had put to death their/common friends, and was bold to enter into the Sicilian land, neither were the Samnites encamp'd, nor theirLegions oppos'd any where. Whiles therefore with fire and fword he waited their Countrie, the Samnites Embassadors came unto him, craving peace: but being by him ])ept off to the Senate, after they had audience given, they let fall their flout Romans, and reques'ted peace for their selves with the Romans, and liberty to make war against the Sicines: which petition they enforced with more reason and equity. "First, in that they had entred into amity with the people of Rome, during their prosperity, and not as the Campains in their adversity: again, they were to take arms against the Sicines, enemies always to themselves, and never friends to the people of Rome: who also, neither in peace (as the Samnites) used for friendship and alliance; nor in time of war (as the Campains) fought for aid and succours: and finally, were neither under the protection of the people of Rome, nor yet their vassals and sujects. When as T. Ennius the Prætor had confuld with the Senate, about these points demanded by the Samnites, and that the L. thought good that the league with them should be renewed: the Prætor in the name of the Refp. made answer to the Samnites, "That neither the fault was in the people of Rome that the confederacy between them was not perpetual: neither gain'd their trust, but onely as much as they were weary themselves first, and re pented of the war commenced through their own defect. The league might yet be newly made again. Touching the Sicines, they would be no hinderance, but that the Samnites, people, might use their liberty, and do what they thought best, either for war or peace. The M. League being thus concluded and confirmed, and they returned home, presently the Roman Army was brought from thence upon receit of a years pay, and corn for three months, according to the capitulation covenanted with the Consul, in consideration of a truce granted, untill their Embassadors were returned.

The Samnites, with the same forces which they had employ'd to withstand the Roman war, went forth against the Sicines with undoubt'd hope, specially to win the City of their enemies, Then, had the Sicines before made an offer to yield themselves unto the Romans, but seeing the Nobles to reject them as coming too late, and wretl'd as it were perfecute from them in their last extremity, they tendred the same to the Latins, who were already of their own accord rifen up and had taken arms. The Campains likewise (so ready and forward as they were to bear in mind an injury of the Samnites, rather than a good turn of the Romans) forbare not to joy in this quarrel. Thus was there rais'd a mighty power of so many Nations band'd together, under the conduct of the Latins and invaded the borders of the Samnites, where more hurt was receiv'd by robes than skirmishes. And albeit the Latins in fight had the better hand, yet were they well content for avoiding many conflicts, to depart out of the enemies country. Which gave the Samnites leisure to send Embassadors to Rome, who before the Senar complaining, that they endured the same menace still, being now associats, which they had abidden before when they were enemies: begotht most humbly, "that the Romans would be satisfied with that victory of the Campains and Sicines, their enemies, which they had got out of the Samnites hands, and not suffer them to be deduced under foot by those Nations, the most dangerous, and cowards of all others: requesting moreover, if so be the Latins and Campains were under the dominion of the people of Rome, that they would command them by virtue of their authority to forbear the Samnites country: and if they refused to obey them, to chastifie and keep them in by force of war. To these demands they fram'd a doubtful answer, as being loath and abashed of the one side to consels, that the Latins were not at their devotion, and fearing again on the other side by reproving and provoking them to turn away their hearts, and lolesthem for ever. And this was the answer. As touching the Campains, their case was otherwise, who were not by covenants and conditions In that year, it is recorded for certain, that Alexander, King of Epirus, arrived in Italy with a Navy; who, no doubt if he had sped well at his first entrance, would have proceeded farther and warred upon the Romans. In this age flourished Alexander the Great in glorious conquests, who being this man his father, and a warrior invincible, while he achieved feats of arms in another part of the world, hapned to die in his belteime and prime of his youth. But to proceed forward, the Romans although there was no doubt but that his associats, and namely, the Latines were revolted; yet, as though they were carefully buried about the Samnites only, and nothing intended them; they sent for to Rome ten of their chief Peers, pretending to give them in charge what their pleasure was to have done. At that time the Latines had two Prxtors or Provoits, L. Annius of Setia, and L. Numitius of Circeia, both Roman Colonies. By whose means, besides Signia and Velitrae, being also Colonies of Rome, the Volisians were liccitated likewise to take arms.

And thought good it was, that those Latine Prxtors by name, should be citted with the rest. No man was ignorant for what intent they were sent for, The Prxtors therefore, called a Council before they went, and there declared how they were convented by the Senat of Rome, demanding their advice what answer to make as touching those matters, wherewith, as they supposed, they should be charged. Whence some were of this opinion, some of that; then Annius spoke and said:—

"Although I myself have moved you to return upon an answer, yet I think it concerneth us more in our main extate, to determine what to do, than what to say. And when we are grown to a resolution once of our affairs, and what course to take, an easie matter will it be to frame words fit for the purpose. For if even now already under a shadow and pretence of an indifferent league, we can abide and find in our hearts to endure bondage, what handeth in the way, but that having abandoned and betrayed the Sidicines, we be obedient not only to the Romans commandment, but also to the Samnites? and answer the Romans in these plainters. That at their beck only, and if they do but nod their head, we will presently lay down all arms? But if at length, the define and longing after liberty do touch our hearts, and give an edge unto our spirits: if there be a league between us; and if confederacy ought to be nothing else but a society and equal fruition of liberty and privileges: if, I fly, we may now glory and vaunt, whereof sometimes we were ashamed that we are of kin to the Romans, and their friends: if they have an army of associates, by the addition whereof they redouble their forces and which the Consuls in leaving or levying their proper wars, will not part and sever from their own: why is there not equality in all things else? Why is not one of the Consuls a Latine? Look where is part of power and forces there also is part of rule and command. And certainly even this in it self is not a matter of soe great honor unto us as who have granted and confided Rome to be the head of Latium: yet by long patience and continual submission only, we have brought to pass that it might seem honourable. But if ever ye wilfully to see the day wherein ye might, participate in government and retain cover your liberties again, to that time is now come presented unto you by your own valour, and the gracious goodness of the immortal gods. Tried their patience ye have in denying souliers; who doubted not but that they were in a great choler and angry at the heart, when we brake our custom of two hundred years pecription and above; yet nevertheless this grace have they put up and given us not one foul word. We warned upon the Pelignians in our own name and quarrel they, who aforesoetime allowed not us the liberty so much as to defend our own marches of our selves, nothing gained and crofted it. That the Sidicines were taken to our mercy and protection that the Campains revolted from them and sided with us, that welevied an army against the Samnites their confederats, they heard and knew well no hand yet they flirred not once forth of their City. How come they to be so calm and quiet, but upon a privity and knowledge both of our puissance and of their own weaknes? I am able too avow by the report of a certain hundred years of good credit, that when the Samnites complained themselves of us, they had such an
"Iwer again of the Senat of Rome, that it plainly appeared that they themselves pretended not to be require that Latium should be under the Roman Empire. Do ye but take upon you, and lay claim unto that which they fictly yield unto you yourselves, and reposisit it at your pleasure.
Now if any man be afraid to be the speake, Lo, here am I, who profes to be the man, and to say thus much not only in the audience of the people and Senat of Rome, but also of Jupiter himself, who is resident in the Capitol, namely, That if they will have us to be of the League and confederacy, they shall admit from amongst us one of the Consuls, ya and a part of the Senat, As he with great spirit and boldnes, not only advised this, but promised also thus to do; all that were present with a general applause and silent permitted him to do and say whatsoever he thought expedient for the common good of the Latine nation, according to that truft which they rec-pole in him. So soon as he was come to Rome, (with other Embassadors) he was admitted into the Senat, and audience given him in the Capitol. Where when T. Manlius the Consul by the authority and direction of the Senators, had dealt with him and the rest, not to make war upon the Samnites their confederats; Annim. raging like a conqueror, as if he had won by force and arms the Capitol; and not as an Embassador, who was to deliver his mind and meafage safely, by the protection of the Law of Nations, began in this for: " The time required (quoth he) now at length. O T. Manlius and ye Senators of Rome, not to treat and deal with us in any affairs by way of authority and commandment, namely when you law Latiums by the favour of the gods "to flourish exceeding both in men and munition, as having subdued the Samnits, confederatewith the Sicilians and Campania, and now also combined with the Volkians; and besides, even your own Colonies, and townsip too, have made choice to submit themselves to the Latines rather than the Romans. But remember you cannot find in your hearts of your selves, nor see how to make an end of your proud and outguarding Lordship and tyranny; We, albeit we be a-cable to restore Latium unto her ancient freedom by force of arms, yet for kindred like will be conient to offer indifferent articles and equal conditions of peace, forasmuch as it hath pleased the immortal gods that we are equal unto you in power and force. Imprima, there is no remedy now, but your two Consuls must be one a Roman, and the other a Latine: T. Manlius, that the number of Senators be elected as well out of the onecation as the other, Tenu, that we become the better and more noble: and let us be called all by the name of Romans. By good hap it so fell out that the Romans also had for their Consul T. Manlius to match him, one as stout and not as the other: who could not contain his anger no longer but openly said, " That if the Senators were for ever overcircle and besides themselves, as to take conditions of a Setine, he would come with his sword by his side into the Senate house, and what Latine foever he saw there in Council, he would not blufh but flay him with his own hand in the place. And therewith turning to the Image of Jupiter: Hearken (quoth he) O good god Jupiter. Hear this wickednes and indignity, hear O Justice and piety to Godward. Wilt thou abide to see, O Jupiter, in this thy hol-dy; and facred temple, will thou endure, as taken captive and troden under foot to see Consuls of M aliens, and a Senat of forreinners? Are thebe the covenants, O ye Latines, which Tullus King of Rome made with the Albans your forefathers? or which L. Tarentinus after him, confided with you?
Remember ye not the bared at the lake Recillus? Have ye fo forgotten indeed, both your own calamities and overthrowes of old, and also the good turns and benefits received at our hands? When this speech of the Consul was seconded with the indignation also of the Senators, it is recorded that when they called upon the gods, witnesses of those covenants, and reitterated their names oftentimes. Annim in mockery of those protestations, was over-heade to despire and scorn the power and godhead of the Roman Jupiter. But this is certain, that as he in heat of anger shaffed hattily to the entry or porch of the temple, and went apace, he fell down the stairs, and so hurt his head that daifed against the bottom flate, that he twooned withall, and lay for dead. But N because all writers agree not, that he yielded up his last breath thereupon, alfo will leave it doubtful, as I find it; as also this, that in the very charging of him with break of covenants, there pour-ded over a tempestuous storm, with many mighty thunders clapps, Fox, as thebe and such like things may be very true, fo they may be pretely devised and invented on Ier purpose to repreff & shew the wrath and vengeance of God, Tarentinus being sent by the Senat to give the Embassadors their disparl, seeing Annim there to lie along, cried out aloud in the hearing both of the Senat and the people, and said, " No force, it is well, and as it should be; thus begin and beles, O ye immortal Gods, our just and rightfull war. Surely there is a God above, there is a power divine and deity in heaven, ther are not feigneded and imaginary god O mighty Jupiter & not in vain have we hallowed thee in this place, as the fearther both of gods and men. Why stay yet, O Roman Quiorities ye likewise my LL of the Senat, to take arms in the name of the gods, having them already as you see to your Leaders? I for my part shall Jason overthrow and lay the Legions of the Latines alone on the earth as ye now see their Embassadors, lying here at the stairs foot. The words of the Consul, received with so great applause of the people, animated and enthralled them in such fort, that had not the careful diligence of the Magistrates been more (who by commandment of the Consul accompanied the Embassadors as they went) than the ordinary fate conduct of the Law of Nations, they had not escaped the rage and fury of the multitude, The Senators also gave their attention to this war, and the Consuls having levied two armies, and palled through the country of the Martians and Petilians, and joined unto them the Samnites power, encamped themselves before Capua, whither the Latines with their allies, were already come together. There, as the report goeth, the Consuls both of them in their sleep had a vision; and there appeared unto them one and the same shape of a man: Personage much greater and more lofty than the ordinary port of men, who should deliver their words unto them. That of the two armies, embellishing and adorning one another, the one was appointed as a due tribute to the internal spirits, and to Mother Earth: and of the other the chief General only. And look of whether army the said sovereign General should devote and offer unto those infernal spirits, and to mother Earth, the Legions of the enemies, and his own person withall, that part and that Nation shall have the victory. When the Consuls had imparted one to the other these night visions, it was thought good and agreed (for to divert and appease Gods anger) that certain sacrifices should be plain, and also if the same wove in their inwards, as appeared in their sleep, then one or other of the Consuls should fulfill the destinies, and accomplish final appointment. When as the answers of the Soothsiers agreed also to that secret religion which was now entred, and settled already in their minds, then the Consuls calling together the Lieutenants and Colonels to a Council, and openly declaring before them all the pleasure of the gods, (to the end, that the willful and voluntary death of one of the Consuls might not fright his army in the field) they agree between themselves, that of whether ride the Roman battalions began first to give back and retreat the Consul of that Army, should devote and betake himself to die for the people of Rome and the Quirites. It was debated also in that assembly, that if ever at any time before there had been war managed by severe rule and government, the military discipline should now be revived and reduced to the old manner and ancient rigour: their care in that behalf was the greater and more redoubled, for that they were to fight against the Latines, fighting altogether to them in language, fashions, armours and especially above all, in the orders and laws of warfare. For many a time, in these two armies, Norfolk with Norfolk, Centurion with Centurion Colonel with Colonel, had forced and converted together, as colleagues and companions in the same garrisons: yet under the same colours and ensigns. By reason whereof, to the end, that by no mean the foes should be overtaken or deceived, the Consuls made proclamation through the Camp, That no man should fight with his enemy out of his own rank, and place appointed unto him. It formed now, that among other Captains and Cornets of horsemen, which were sent out every way as scouts and spies to discover the coasts, T. Musius the Consul his son together with the left of his Cornet and Troop, was placed above the enemies Camp, to near, as he was within an arrow shot of their next Corps de guard, In which was quartered the cavalry of Tusculenus, under the leading of Germius Metius, a Knight both for birth, and also for his noble feats of arms highly esteemed in his country. He copied the Roman horse, and knowing the Colli, on, advancing before them, and of especial mark above the rest (for all Noblemen and of quality were well enough known one to another.) What will ye Romans (quoth he) with one Colonier of horse fight with the Latines and their confederates? What shall your Consuls, what shall two Consular armies do the mean while? Marry (quoth Mius) they will be here time enough for you, and with them Jupiter himself, a witness of league and cornets by you broken. Jupiter I say, who only can do more than all men forces in the world. And we who at the pool Regillus, have given you fighting your bellies full, will here also quit our selves so, that never after ye shall have any great joy and pleasure to encounter and joyn battel with us again. With that, Germius, riding forth as he was on horseback, alit from his company, Wilt thou then (quoth he) till that day come wherein ye mean with so great a do do for forward your armies to a general set field, break a staff with me in the mean time; that by the proof and event of us twain, it may henceforth appear: how for the Latine men of arms, surpase the Roman? The young man his blend and courage was soon up either upon anger and choler, or for very shame to refuse the combat, or because God would have it, and it was his destiny that could not be avoided. Forgetting therefore his fathers commandment, and the exple Edict of the Consuls, he returneth on head and rashly, to a single fight: wherein it skilld not much, whether he had the better or the worse, for any great odds thereby in the main trial of the quarrel. Thus when the right of the horsemen of both parts were retired aside (as it were) to behold some spectacle or running at rati: in the void place of the plain field that lay between, they ran their horses in full career one against the other, with sharp and deadly spear in rest, Miusus with his lance alight did over and railed the Motion of his enemy, and Metius with his spear lightly touched, and passed by the horse neck. Then having turned about their horses, Miusus came upon him first with a second charge, and so redoubled the push, that he thrust the others horse in between the ears. At the instant of which wound the horse reared and mounted with his forefeet, and with great force shaking his head cast his rider.
And as he bare his spear and shield, to raise himself from his grievous fall, Miusus ran him through at the throat, so that the spear-head came forth at his ribs and nailed him fast to the ground. And having disarmed & dispoled him rode back to his own troop and both together with exceeding joy hasted to the Camp, and to the Generals Pavilion, event to his father: I little knowing his fatall destiny, and what was to befall unto him, whether he had deferred praise, or incurred danger of punishment, That all the world quoth he, (O father,) may be perfused and report truly that I am defended indeed of your bloud, and your undoubtton (On here I am, who being defed defied and challenged to fight man to man, have killed mine enemy a man of arms: see here the pains of him flain and dead. Which, so soon as the Cof, heard, precisely he could not abide to look on his son, but turned away, and by sound of trumpet, commanded the host to a publike audience, Which being assembl'd in great number,^2 Forasmith (quoth he) as then, T. Manlius, with out regard of Cof's authority, or dread of my fathers majesty and power over thee, against our Edict and exprest commandment, halft fought with the enemy, and that without thy rank and place; and as much as lay in thee, hath broken the discipline of war, whereby to this day the State of Rome hath freed maintained, and hath brought me thy father to this hard point, that I must forget either the Common-wealth, or else mine own strength, and we will abide thither the pu-imnent and smart for our own misdeeds, than the whole state to her good prejude and deli mage, thou'd pay for our folly and transgression. A fearful and dolorous example will we afford: but good & profitable to all youth for ever hereafter. As for me verily both the inbred love and affection of all fathers to their children, and also this swim and proof of thy valour and knighthood (although seduced with deceitful appearance and vain resemblance of honour) moveth me not a little: but since that, either by thy death the Cof's commandment must be established, or by impunity of thy disobedience for ever disannulled, I would not with thee to redeem (if there be any of my blood in thee) but by thy punishment to restore and set up again the military discipline which this day by thy default is lain down and ruined. Go speake, and bind him to a stake. At this tis cruel a sentence, they were all amazed and in an estate, that were present: and as though they had been the edge been against themselves, for fear more than for any modesty or reverence, they were quiet. So when they were come again to themselves, as if their spirits had been recovered after some deep impression of a wonder which had astonished them, they flound still with fiencebut so soon as the poor wretch's head was chop't off, and his blood seen to gush and spurn out, then began they all of a sudden to speak freely and complain with open mouth, so as they forbore neither lamentations nor curties: they covered the youth his body with his own victorious spoils, they erected a funeral pile of wood over his corps with fire and rampiers, let on fire, and burnt him accordingly: and so as great love and affection did them all, performed their last duty unto him and solaced his obsequies. Thus the commandments of Manlius were not only dreadful for the present, but gave an heavy and fearful precedent for the future, to all sovereign Commanders of an Army. Howbeit, the rigour of this punishment made the foildiers more dutiful to their Captains and Leaders: and besides that, the rounds and sentinels, and the let corps de garde, were every where more carefully looked unto and observed: even in the very hazard and extremity all of the battalion afterward, that earlier severity did much good.
For their fight was much like unto a civil war. So little, or nothing as all in a manner, differing the Lattines from the Romans Common-wealth, but only in heart and courage.

Aforetime they used Roman long large shelves, covering their whole bodies; but in proeess of time, after that they became Stipendaries and to take pay, they bare shorter targets. And whereas aforetime they had their battalions thick and close together, like to the Macedonian Phalan-eges, afterwards they began to range their battle into bands more loosely and distinctly, and left of all, they were divided into thinner orders and squadrions: every such order or squadrion contained three or four soildiers, two Centurions, and one Port enign. The forefront of the von-dare were javeliners called Hospit, in fifteen squadrions, distant some little way one from another; such a squadrion had twenty soildiers lightly armed, and all the rest a fort of Targeteers, and those were called light-armed, who carried only a spear or javelin to fight with at hand, and other darts to lance from them aloof. This forefront contained the flower of youths, that grew up as apprentices to war-service. Then followed after them of stronger and riper age, as many bands or squadrions, which were called Principes whom there followed hard at heels, thirty squadrions, all targeteers or shield-bearers, with brave armours above all others. And this battalion of thirty companies, they called Antepslma or avant-darters; for that the other fifteen orders or bands were placed hard before the enignes. And of these, every band consisted of three parts: and each of them they called Primopslma, and it was composed of three banners or pannels; and every such banner contained 186 men. The first Pannel or banner conduct'd the Triarius, who were old soildiers of approved valour: the second, those that were called Vararis, of less puissance both for age and prowess; the third such as were named Accretis, who were of least account and fruit, and therefore they were cast behind unto the tail of the battalion. When the Army was thus ordered in battel array into these bands & squadrions, the javelineers form'd of all began the fight: if they were not able to discomfit the enemies, than they with steady footing and swift pace reired back into the void places between the squadrions of the Principes, who received them: then began the Principes, to enter into the battel to maintain fight, and were secured by the Hauflats or Javeliners. The Triarius remained standing all this time firmly about their enignes, setting out their left legs afore them at length, with their Targes on their shoulders, and their pikes or javelins sticking on the ground, with their heads somewhat bending forward, much like as their battel were fortified with a Pallisado or rampier of pales and sharp stakes. Now if those Principes had not good successe in fight, they retir'd themselves by little and little from the forefront to the Triarius. And hereupon grew the proverb that when a thing was a dead lift and in difficulties they would lay, We are come to the Triarius. Then the Triarius standing up right, so soon as they had received the Principes and Hospit, into the void places between their files, presently drew in their ranks.
A ranks and files close together, and shut up as it were all waies of passage and entrance, and with one main joint and close battalion (as it now there were no more hope behind) advanced toward the enemy. And this most of all feared and terrified the enemies, when thinking to chase those that they seemed to have vanquished; they saw a new battal of fresh men starting up, and the fame increased in number.

Now there were commonly four Legions enrolled, consisting of five thousand foot, and three hundred horse to every legion. As many more were added unto them, and those murthered out of the Latines, who at that time were enemies to the Romans, and had ordered their battalions after the same manner in all respects. And they knew well enough that not only enign with enign,

B all pikes and javelins with pikes and javelins, Princes with Princes, but one Centurion with another, if the arraies were not broken, were to encounter, Two Principes or chief Centurions, there amongst the Triarii in the one army and the other. The Roman, of body not so strong and well set, howbeit a good foildier otherwise, skillfull and of great experience: the Latine, exceeding mighty, and a notable fighter of all others. Well known they were one unto the other, because at all times they had the fame conduct and equal place of charge. The Roman not greatly trusting to his own strength, was permitted even at Rome by the Col. to shew unto him an under-Centurion whom he would: who might protect and defend him safe from an enemy that should hap to deal with him hand to hand. And it fortuned that the yong man by him elected, fought in the throng and got the victory of the Latine Centurion. As for the battel, it was fought not far from the foot of the hill Sævius, in the very way that leadeth to Pistoria. The Roman Coniples before they came into the field killed their beasts for sacrifice. And the bowe-paring Sophaier (as it is reported) theyed to Decius the head of the Liver on the inner side wounded (as it were) and cut off: otherwise in all respetcs, his sacrifice was acceptable to the gods. As for M. Claudius he had as good signs of Gods favour in his, and all as well as might be. That is well yet (quoth Decius) if my colleague speed well, and have good success by his sacrifice. Their battel being so ordered, as I laid before they marched into the field, M. Claudius led the right wing, Decius the left. At the first they fought on both sides with equal forces and like courage and heat of fork. But afterwards on the left wing, the Romans Hafnius, not able to sustaine the violent charge of the Latines, retired to the Prinicipes. In which trouble and fearful disorder, Decius the Col. called aloud to M. Valerius. "We have need of Gods help (quoth he) O Valerius, Where art thou, the publike high Priest of the people of Rome? Come and say acere that form of words, whereby I may devote, and betake my self for the Legions. The Priest commanded him to put on his long purple robe embroidered before, called Pretentia, to cover his head, and to put forth his hand under the said robe at his chin, and standing upon his javelin, with both his feet, to pronounce these words after him, as follow: O Jupites, Jupiter, Father Mars, Quirinus, Bellona, Oye Latins and domesticall gods, the gods Novenatles and Indigetes; ye gods likewise whose power extendeth over us and our enemies, and M. Oanes the infernal gods, ye I invocas, ye I worship and adore, ye pardon I beseech and favourable excus, that ye would prosper all power and victory unto the people of Rome and Quirites; and put to fear, fright, and death the enemies of the people of Rome and Quirites. And as I pronounce these...

E words, so for the went publike of the Quirites, the Army, Legions and aids of the people of Rome, I beseech you, and I beseech you with me unto M. Valerius the infernal spirits, and dame Tellus, the Legions and aids of the enemies, and my self after them. Having made this prayer, he willed the Sergents or Lieutons to go to M. Claudius, and with all speed to tell them, that his colleague was devoted for the army. Himself girled after the Galine fashion, and armed at all pieces, mounted on horseback and forode into the midst of his enemies. Of both armies he was seen to carry with him much more stately and venerable port than a man as sent from heaven to be a satisfaction of all gods wrath; and to turn away all plague and mischief from his own people upon the enemies. All terror and fear he carried with him as he went, and first disordered the ensigns of the Latines in the edge and border of the battalions, and afterwards entred within into the whole army. This was noted and fear most evidently, that which way so ever he rode the enemies were smitten with fear, as if they had been blasted and struck with some untoward aspect and influence of a planet. But so soon as he was fain and overcharged with fliot of dartts, presently from that place all the, the cohorts of the Latines (out of all question) as amazed men fled away and avoided. And therewithal likewise the Romans as if they had been discharget and freed from their religious fear and spirituall consternation, and as if they had but then and not before heard the sound of the trumpet to battel, began to charge and fight as a fren. For both the Romarii advanced forward and ran among the ranks of the Apostuli, and thereby enforcing the Hafnius and Principalis; and caused them to fight more freely: and the Triarii kneeling on their right knee, waited till the Col gave them leam to strike. Afterward in process of time when in other parts the Latines in their number prevailed, M. Claudius the Conal, having heard of the final end of his companion and (right as it would) accompanied as well with painted and tears as with due prayers to worthy and memorable a death for a while doubted, whether it were yet time for the Triarii to strike. Afterwards thinking it better that they should be reserved in heart and fren, unto the left path of extremity, he biddeth the Accedes from the hindmost tail of the rewrade to come forth before the standards. Who so soon as they were come in place forth with the Latines, supposing the enemies had done the like raised their Triarii. Who having for a good while fought fiercely and weared themselves, and either broken their javelins or, duddled their points, and yet by mere force repulsed the enemies, thinking now all had been done, and and the victory achieved as being come as far as to the utmost skirts of the battalions: * Then H and the Conful to the Tribuns rife now fresh and lusty as ye are, against the wearied, mindful of your country, parents wives and children, mindful of the Conful, who for your victory hath taken his death. The Tribuns all hearty & unfoiled, were not to soon rife up, shewing themselves in their bright and glittering armor, but there began on a sudden & unlooked for, a new skirmish and conflict, For, they receiving the Aspersion between their files, set up a shout and outcry troubl ed & disordered the ranks of the Latins, gored their faces with their javelins, swel the principal flower and strength of their bale & formed men, and passed untouched in a manner through the other bands, as if they had been drained and brake through their pointed and close bat-tallions, with no great a murder, that Raecly they left behind them a fourth part of their enemies drive. The Samnians also under the hill being seen a far off in battal array, smote a terror among the Latins, but among all were none but Romans or Allies, the especial commendation of that service rested in the Conful, of whom, the one turned all the threats and dangers from the gods both above and beneath upon himself alone; the other in that battle showed such valour and policy, that it is confidred both of Romans and Latins, who have written of that journey and commented it to pedantry, that of whether army T. Marcellus had the conduct, that way doublets would the victory go. The Latins after their defeat and flight retired to Minturnae, their camp previously upon the battal was won, and many a man there surprized alive and cut in pieces, but the Campains especially. That day could not the corps of Decius be seen, for that the night came upon them as they fought for it: the morrow after it was found amongst a mighty company of plain enemies, overwhelmed with swords, darts and javelins; and all alike, honour and solemnity according to his death performed by his brother Conul were his funeral.

This also amongst the rest, seemeth worth the remembrance and to be inserted in this place, namely, That it was lawful for Conul, Dictator, and Praetors, whenever they sacrificed and betook to the Devil the Legions of their enemies, for to vow and offer withall, not themselves in a nasty but an Citizens: the Pagan, that they would provided all that were one of the enrolled legions of the Conul. And if of the men, who is thus addressed and done, to death, to be done with it, as it ought to be: But if he die not, then was the image of him even then high or above buried in the ground, and a proper or propriatory sacrifice was slain in his stead: but wherefore it chance that I may be so insert, thinker was it not Lawfull for any Roman Magistrate to set foot and come, But if a man would oce only for, and himself to death, as Decius did, and died as he, shall not pervert any sacred duty or sacrifice, either for himself or the City, that hath once thus taken himself. If he will begin and offer his armour to Vulcan, or to some saint whomsoever he like, he permitted and Lawful for him so to do, either by way of sacrifice or other offering as to pleases. As for the weapon or spear by which the Conul standing on Ioth his foot, made his prayers and invocation, it is not lawful the enemy to prise thereon: but if he fortune to win the same, a propriatory sacrifice must be offered to oppose Mars, so wise a saviour, a spear, and a Bull." And albeit the records both of all divine and human customs and traditions, make no mention hereof, and are now grown out of use and remembrance by reason that we prefer new and foreign ceremonies, before the old ancient rites of our own country and ancestors yet I thought not amiss to make report hereof, even in the very words and sense as they were used delivered and pronounced.

In some writers find, that the Samnians having waited to see the event of this battal, came to aid the Romans when all was done and pass. Also, that there was nocturne coming from Law-niums unto the Latins, but not before they had the overthrow: by reason that they spent a great time in deliberation. And when as now the most ensigns and some part of the army was gone forth of the gates, and news came of the death and slaughter of the Latins; as they turned their banners and returnned into the City, it is said, That their Praetor or Provoft, named Miliarius, spoke these words, "That to small a way as they had gone, muff colt them dear, and full slyly would the Romans be paid therefore. Such as were remaining of the Latins after the battel, and were scattered thinder in main and divers waies, when they were rallied together, shrowded themselves for safety in the City Fecio. Where in their Councils and assembles, Namists the Generall, averred, and altered them, that Mars indeed was common, and the hazard indifferent to both parties, as having made an equal massacre in the one army and the other: and that the bare name only of victory went with the Romans: for otherwise, they carried away with them the formes of men vanquished, and spes no better than they. For (with he) The two royal pavilions of their Colours pollied and defied: the one with the particide of his own, the other for the death of the Cof, who had vowed himself to die: all their forces in manner sain: their Javeliners and principals killd; a bloody slaughter committed both before and behind the Standards; and only the Triumvirs at the last uplift: renewed the fight and set all upright. And albeit (quoth he) the power of the Latins also be freelyly shated secur a fresh supply, even Latinims or Volsci are nearer than Rome. And therefore if they thought good, he would with all speed raise the lily flower and chosen manhood both out of the Latins and the Volscians, and return again with a fresh army to Capua: and with his sudden coming unlooked for, surprize and defer the Romans, expelling as then for nothing less, the second battel. So by dispatching his cancellous and decretal letters into all parts of Latinum and the Volscian nation (by reason that they who had not been present at the battel were sooner induced to give rash credite) there was a summauky army in great haste levied, enrolled, and assembled together out of all quarters.

A This host as it marched, Terragna the Consul met at Tifinanta, a place between Sinuessa and Maturna. And before they could chuse one a plot of ground to encamp in, they believed their carriages and baggage on heaps of either side fell to a baleful present and made a final end and conclusion of all the war. For the enemies were brought so low that as the Consul led his victorious Army to waive their Country, all the Latines yielded themselves to him: and this their rendring the Campains likewise followed, Thus Latium and Cupa forsettied and lost part of their Territories. The lands of the Latines with the Pivilernats laid thereto, and the Territory of Aleris, which belonged to the people of Cupa, even as far as the river Vulturius was divided amongst the Commonwealth of Rome. Two acres in the Latine Country, with a supplemment of three four parts out of the Pivilernats land to make up the whole: and three acres in the Territory of Faleri, with addition of a fourth part to boot for amends, because it was so far off, were all assigned for a m. The Laurentins only, of all Latium, and the horsemens of the Campains cleared this punishment and were exempted from the rest, because they had not revolted. And a decree passed that the League with the Laurentins shou'd be renewed: and from that time vitally every year is it renewed, after the tenth day of the Latine holidays, Those Campain horsemen were made free denizens of Rome: and for a monument and memorial thereof, they set up and fenced a brazen table at Rome in the Temple of Vubbo, The people of Cupa were enjoyned to pay yearly to every one of them (and they were a thousand and fix hundred in all) 45 Deniers.

Thus after the war fully determined, and both rewards dealt, and punishment indicted according to each mans defeter, T. Mamilus returned home, whom the elders only for certain went forth to meet on the way: the youth, not only then, but ever after, during his life abhorred, and with curles defetled it. The Antonians made certain roads into the Territories of Hostia, Aridea, and Solone. And for that Mamilus the Consul was not able himselv in person to intend and manage that war, by reason of sickness, he nominated for Dictator L. Popilius Crassinus, who as it happened was at that time Praetor: by whom was named for General of the horsemens L. Popilius Cur-For, This Dictator, altho' he kept the field, and lay encamped certain mouths within the Conines, yet achieved no worthy and memorable exploit. After this year thus renounced for the victory of so many and so pulissant nations, and withall, for the noble and famous death of the one Consul, and for the government of the other, albeit stern and rigorous, yet notable and renowned; threexsucceeded Conulis, T. Aemilus Munerenses, and Q. Tullius Philus, who met not with the like subject and matter of great affairs: and they themselves were more mindful either of their own private businesses, and studious to maintain a fide and faction in the Common-wealth, than to advance the State of their Country. Howbeit, the Latines (who rebelled for anger that they lost their lands) which inconstanted in the plain of Fenele, drove them both out of their Camp, and forced them to leave the field. Where, whilst Tullius (by whose government and conduct that victory was achieved) received surrender of the Latines, the flower of whose youth was there all slain and killed. Aemilus led his Army against Pedam. As for the Pedans they had maintenance from Tybr, Preceate, and Vellcrn, who took their parts: there came also aid from Lomanaum and Antium. Where the Roman Conulis, albeit he had the better hand in skirmish, yet for E that there remained behind a new piece of servise about the City it itself Pedam, and the Camp of their Confederates which was adjoynd close to the Town: all of a sudden he gave over the war unfinished, because he heard that triumph was decreed unto his brother Consul. He also himself returned to Rome, and called earnestly for triumph before victory. At which untimely and coves- tose desire of his, the Nobles being offended, denied flatly: that unless he either forced Pedam by assault or won it by composition he should not triumph. Hereupon Aemilus being discomfited and alienated from the Senators, bare his Concision afterward like to the seditious Tribunes. For so long as he was Consul he ceased not to charge and accuse the Nobles before the people; and his Colleague no whit gainfald him as being himself one of the Commoners. He took occasion of these accusations upon this, that the lands in the Latine and Faleri Countries, were divided in F pinching and scant measure amongst the Commons. And after that the Senat, deeming to assist the time of the Conuls government, had decreed that a Dictator should be declared against the Latine rebels: Aemilus (who's turn it was at that time to govern) nominated his own companion in office to be Dictator, by whom Tullius Sempronius was named General of the horse. This Dictatorship was popular and a together framed to the humour of the common people both by reason of splendid and accuratly Invites made against the Nobles: and for that it enabled three Statutes most favourable and pleasing to the Commons, and as crofs and adverse to the Nobility: first, That the Acts devised and enacted by the Commons, should bind all the Quirites or Citizens of Rome; secondly, That all laws which were proposed and to pass by the suffrages of the Centuries, before the Scrutiny began, and voices g-thered, the Nobles should allow G and approve: thirdly, That forasmuch as they were come thus far already, that both the Conuls might be of the Commons, now one Conul at the least should be a Commoner of necessity. Insomuch as the Nobles thought verily that there was more lost at home this year by thee Consul and Dictator, than gained to the Empire abroad, by their victories and warlike exploits.

In the year following when C. Furio Camillus and Q. Menes were Conuls, to the end that Aemilus the Consul of the former year, might be more notably reproachd for the quitting and letting slip of a victory that should have been achieved in his year, the Senat began to muster in their speeches, that Pedum by force of arms, by valour of men, &c all possible means; whatsoever, should be destroyed and raised to the ground. Whereupon the new Consuls being forced to lay aside all other affairs and to go in hand with that service, first took their journey thither. Now was Latium grown to such terms, as they could neither abide war nor endure peace, 1 to maintain the wars they wanted means; and peace they could not away with nor abide to hear of, never since the loss of their lands, so they thought best to hold a middle course; to stand upon their guard, and to keep themselves within their towns; that the Romans being not provoked, should make no quarter of war; and if there were tidings brought of any town beleaguered there might be aid sent from all parts to the beleaguered. And yet for all this were the Pedum succoured but of every view. The Tiburtins and Praenitins, whole country lay nearest came to Pedum, but the Aricins, Latovs, and Veltirmans, who joined their forces with the Anitrians and Volsciens, were suddenly assaulted and set upon near the river Anio by Menestius, and vanquished, Camillus fought before Pedum with the Tiburtins, who came into the field with a right puissant army, and put him to much trouble and hazard; bow boilke he had as good success in the end as Menestius. The greatest tumult and trouble was caused especially by occasion of a sudden fall of the townsmen in the very time of the conflict. Against whom, after that Camillus had opposed part of his forces to make head, he not only drove them within the walls, but the same day also, when he diiscomfited both them and their succours, he scaled the town and was Master thereof. Then it was thought good with greater preparation of power and courageous resolution after the winning of that one City to go about with the victorious army from one to another and to subdue and tame for ever the whole nation and name of Latium. Neither refted they, untill partly by main force, and partly by taking one City after another by way of surrender, they had brought all Latium under their subjection. After this, having disposed and placed garrisons in every town which they had got, they departed to Rome for triumph; which was to them by a general consent of all men granted. Besides their triumph this honour was to them done, that two titluses of honour (a rare thing in those days) should be erected for them in the Grand place called Forum. But before that they gathered the suffrages of the people, in the assembly for Election of Cons. against the year following, Camillus in this wise made the question, and the Senate, touching the Latin nations, 'My LL. and Senators of Rome, That which by war and force of arms was to be done in Latium, is now by God his goodneff and the valour of our foles, brought to good part. The Armies of our enemies being betrayed before Pedum and Anio. The Latium to all, and in the City of the Volsciens either by force of arms, or rendered by composition, are now held and kept to your behalf by your own garrisons. It remaineth now to confult (forasmuch as they troubles us by rebellion) and to devise some means how to keep them quiet in continual peace. In this consultation, the immortal gods have given you such powerful help to resolve upon it that both wholly in your hands to choose whether Latium shall continue still a parthio or no: and therefore may ye for ever procure your selves repose and security from thence either by vigour and punishment, or by clemency and pardon chuse you whether. Are ye minded to proceed by way of war or by means of conciliation, to try against those that have yielded themselves, and are vanquished? Ye may, indeed destroy all Latium, and make all war and a delart wilderness from when it was sometimes in land and dan. Meagre wars of yours ye have had the help of an army of Allies, which found them fall and valorous. But will ye (as your ancestors have done before you,) enlarge the Roman Empire by receiving into your City those whom ye have conquered? Then have ye matter and means to grow up still and was mightly, to your great honour and glory. Surely that government and dominion is of all other most strong and sure, wherein the subjects take joy in their obedience. But whatsoever you mean to determine in this behalf, ye need have made speed and resolve betimes, so many nations yet hold in part of mind between fear and hope: and therefore be bold and do it. And ye ye shall be able to win your efforts; and also whereas their heads are bowed and minds unresolved, (handing as they do amased in doubtful expectation,) either by punishment or by benefit, so foretell and prepare them before they take heart again. For our part, it was hitherto to our endeavour to effect and bring about, that ye might be able to dispose of all at your pleasure, and as ye would your selves: now your duty it is to determine what is best for your selves and the Common-wealth. The Lords and chief of the Senate prati冰箱ed this motion of the Col. and deemed good in general. But formerly as the condition of the parties was divers and their cause not all one, they said that they might resolve and determine betimes, according to the defect of each state, if they were specified by name and the opinions asked in particular. So they fell to consultation of them severally as they were proposed, and set down this order and decree. Inprima, that the Latinus be enfranchised Citizens of Rome, and enjoy against their own religion and sacred ceremonies, with this proviso, that the chappel and grove of Impepina should be common to the Burefles of Lanuvium and the people of Rome, Item, that the Aricins Nomentans, and Pedum shall be made denominates of Rome, and endued with the liberties and privileges of the Latinus. Item, that the Tusculans retain still that freedom of their City that, which as they then enjoyed; and the crime and attainder of rebellion to be charged upon a few of the chief to save the common state from danger, Item, that these should be grievous punishment inflicted upon the Veltirmans, who being ancient Roman Citizens, had notwithstanding taken arms and rebelled; that their was to be dismembered and razed: their Senators from thence transferred, and confined beyond Tyrris, there to dwell, upon pain of that

A whoever were found on this side the water, it might be lawful for any man to take him as his prisoner, and to ransom him at a * 1000 Áfles. Provided always that he should not enlarge him, nor release him of his Irons, until the money were fully satisfied and paid. Into the possession and lands of those Senators, were tenants and Colonizers sent to inhabit: who being once enrolled,  Velleius deemed again as populous as before time. At Antium was there a new Colony planted, with this proviso, that the ancient inhabitants of the Antians should be permitted (if they themselves would) to be enroiled there, and remain still. From thence were their long Gallics and war-ships, with the people of Antium wholly forbidden the sea: but the freedom of Roman Citizens to them was granted. The Tyburns and Pretelins forfeited their lands, for their late treachery, and perjury.

B Common with other Latins, but because they repining and envying the good estate of the Romans had in times past joined arms with the Frenchmen, a savage and uncontrollable nation, from the other Latins cities and states, they took away the privilege of marriage, the commerce of traffic, and entercourts of mutual intelligence, and holding comice themselves, for ever after. To the Campan Gentlemen that lived with horse abreast, for that they would not give consent to revolt with the Latins: to the Fundans also and Formans, through whose country they had always had free, safe, and quiet passage to and fro, this honour was done, as to be made Citizens of Rome; but without the liberty of giving voices. Items, it was decreed, that the Camans and Suflians, should be of the same condition and state that Cupa was. The Ships of the Antians were part of them transported to the Arsenals at Rome, and the reflect on fire and burnt. With the Items, bezel heads, and brazen piles whereof, it was thought good, that the pulpit of Common fame and Orations in the grand pace of Rome, should be beautified and adorn'd with. In publick Pulpit was thereupon called

C Whiles Sulpicius Longus, and P. Flavius Petus were Conuls, when as the Romans held peaceably under their dominion all the countries, as well through the favour which they won by bountiful dealing, as by might and strong hand, there arose war between the Sidicins and Aurumians. The Aurumian, who had yielded atore to T. Manlius Conul, and were taken into protection afterwards, rebelled not: whereby they had a more just cause to request and seek for aid at the Romans hand; but before that the Conuls had led forth their power out of the City (for the Senate had commanded, that the Aurumians should be defended) tidings came, that the Aurumians for fear had quit their town: and being Red with their wives and children, had fortified Sinesia, which now at this day is called Aurumana: and that the ancient wals, with the town is fell, were by the Sidicins destroyed. Hereat the Senate offended with the Conuls, by whose delay and lingering their allies had been betrayed in time of their necessity, ordained a Dictator to be chosen. So there was elected C. Claudius Regillensis, who appointed for General of horsemen C. Claudius Hortator. But hereupon rofe a scruple of conscience about the creation of the Dictator. And when the Augurs had pronounced, that they thought him not rightly created, both Dictator and General of horsemen gave over their rooms. The same year Minuittus, a Vexal Nun, was first suspected of impropriety, for going in her apparel more trim than was decent for one of her calling and profession: and after that brought in question and accused by a bond-servant, that inform'd against her to the High Priests, First, by a decree of theirs she was awarded to abstain from divine service, to keep her house, and not to manapurse and set free any of her bond-slaves: but to have them forth coming, whenever they were called for: and after farther examination and judgment pass'd, was buried quick under the ground, at the gate Collina, in the paved caucy on the right-hand, within the plain or field called Secedenans, i.e. Extantable or polluted. I suppose that place took the name of such in eff of filthy whoredom. The same year, Q. Publius Philo was elected Praetor, the first that ever was of the Commons, not withstanding the mind of Sulpicius the Conul, said That he would not take his name to propound it for Election nor admit him among other competitors. But the Senate strive the less in impeaching this Praetorship, seeing they could not have their will in the highest rooms and dignities.

D The year next ensuing, under the ConulsHIP of L. Papirius Crassus and Cæs. Duilio., was notable and famous for the war of the Aurumians, in regard rather of the novelty, than the greatnes and danger thereof. They were a people that inhabitied a town called Cales and had joyned their power with the Sidicins their next neighbours. The whole power of which two nations being discomfted in one battell, and the same not to memorable, was for the nearest of their Cities more ready to fly, and in their flight more sable and secure. Yet the Noblest of Rome omitted not the care of that war: for that the Sidicins to often, either had themselves mov'd war, or aid'd those that began, or else were the cause of all troubles. Whereupon they endeavoured all that they could to make Conul the fourth time, the noblest warrior in those days, M. V. Lentulus Condovius, who had for his brother in government M. Atusius Regillini. And left haply some errour by chance G should be committed, but was made to the Conuls that extraordinary, and without calling for, that province might fall to Conus: who having received the Army (after the victory at Cales) of the former Conuls, went forth. And when at the first shout and order he had di stomated his enemies, who in remembrance of their former late overthrow were affrighted he advis'd to assait their very wals: and so eager and hasty bent (I assure you) were the londiers, that even at the first they would have set ladders to, as making hill account to scale up to the top, and enter the town. But Condovius, because that was an hard adventure, was desirous to accomplish that enterprise by the long toil of his londiers, rather than their present peril the raised therefore therefore a countermarch and platforms and rolling frames, mounted against the walls but as good a hap was by an opportunity that fell out they had no use of these munitions and fabrics, for M. Fatini a Roman prisoner, taking vantage of the negligence of his keepers upon a festival holiday, and making means to break his bonds, let himself down by a long cord, fainted at one end to a pinacle or battlement of the wall, and slid by the arms, among the munitions and fabrics of the Romans who so perverted and prevailed with the General that he caused him to give an assail upon the enemies now being fast asleep, as having filled their bellies with wine and good meals.
So that with as little ado were the Aulonians and their City surprized, as they were moreover vainished in night. A great booty of pilage was there got: and after a garrison placed at Cales the Legions were brought back to Rome. The Consul by decree of the Senate triumphed: and that At.

Titus should not be without his glory too, both Coll, were appointed to lead forth an Army aga-

In this Election held by this Dictator, there were created Consuls, T. Veturius, and Sp. Pohehumus. Who albeit there remained some part behind of the Sidicins war yet to the intent they might gratifie the Commons by some good turn, and prevent their longings before they speak:

of them promised an Act concerning the bringing of a Colony to Cales: and when as the Senate had ordained that two thousand and five hundred men should be enrolled and assign that: they created Triumvirs to bring them thither. and to divide the lands, namely, Cceo K Dullius, T. Quinatus, and M. Fabius. After this, the new Consuls having received the army of the old, entred into the enemies confines waiting all before until they came to the very walls of their City. Now, for that the Sidicins had assembl'd a puissant army, and seemed themselves fully relo-lent, and bent upon utter despair to put all unto the last adventure, and to fight it out to the last man. Moreover because it was noticed that all Samnium was risen up in arms: by authority from the Senate the Consul's appointed T Corvinus Rufinus Dictator, and M. Antonius was nominated General of the horde. But hereupon grew again another fuppose, that there was some error effa-ed in the creation: so they resigned up their places; and because they enfolded also a plague hereupon (as all their Authoric for Elections of Magistrates had been touched and infected with that error and default) the managing of all affairs fell to an Interregne. Which being now entred upon by the fifth Interregne, M. Valerius Corvinus, then Consuls were created, L. Cornelius the second time and Ca. Domitius,

When all things else were at quiet the rumour of the Gauls war was so rife and hot, that it was taken for a very Tumult. Whereupon it was thought good, that a Dictator should be created,

And M. Poppius Graffiti was nominated, who had P. Aelius Publicola for General of the hordemen. When they had multered the foundiers more strictly and with greater regard than would have been for war near hand the epsi, who were went out, brought word that all was well and quiet among the Gauls. But suspected it was that Samnium now the second year was ready to drop out of their allegiance and seek a change. Whereupon the Roman army was not withdrawn out of the Sidicins country. However the war of Alexander King of Epiroi, drew the Samnium into the Lucass country, which two nations uniting their forces, gave the King a barlett, as he made

with having got the upper hand entered into a League and amity with the Romans; though it was much doubted, with what faithfulness he would observe the same, if all his affairs prospered as well.
The same year a solemn Levy or Numbering of the people of Rome he did and the new Citizens were matriculated and enrolled.

and therefore two Tribes were annexed. Metio and Caepia: the Leviers that ordained them were Publ. Philo and Sp. Peflumius. The Aetians were some Roman Citizens, by an Act proposed by L.

Papius the Praetor: by virtue whereof they were enfranchised Denizens, but without the privilege of giving voices. Tullie were the Aetians for this year both at home and abroad.

The year next following were it through the unkind disposition of the air, or some N wicked prophet, that was in a storm when M. L. Marcellus and T. Valerius were Consuls,

If the fortune of this Consul to vary in divers Chronicles, in some Flaccoi, in others Pettin-

But it matters not whether be true, that rather I could willingly have wished (and yet all the thing is left in writing, I purpose to do over it, lest that I should seem to derogate ought from the credence of any wiser. When as the chief personages of the City died upon like diles, and after one and the same manner of symptoms a certain chambermaid presented her self to F. Fer-that publick and passions madly: if it might be assur'd by faithful promise from him, that by utterance thereof, she should not come to harm nor trouble. Forthwith Fertius delivered this matters to the Consuls: and the Consuls made relation thereof to the Senate: by the consent of which State affianz was made according unto the pitty foresaid, to reveal the matter. Then she declared that by the wight and mitieious wickedness of women the City was thus affianzded: and namely. That certain Daughters of Rome, even their own wives, boilded and tempered rank poimanner. So they went straight wayes with the wench, and found some women as they were Afeething and preparing venomous drugs, yea and some poiyoned cOnfections already put up. Which were brought into the market place, and about zo, of thosc dames, with whom the poisons were found, were sent for by a sergeant. Two of thern Concinus and Serrus, both noble women born, suddenly standing upon their teatms, and stiffly avouching, That they were for reignime-dickes and wholem for the body of man, were by the chamber-maid aforesaid confused, and enjoyed to drink thereon, that they might disproove her, and make her a liar, and to have devi d of her own fingers ends this false slander. Who took a time to commune and confer together, that the people were avoided aside to make them way. Now when as in fight of all the World, these two Dames had propoundcd the matter to the reil there in place, they all refuted not: and Bio having drunk the poiyoned potion they all perished by their own apothecary's practive. Then presently were the commodities apprehended, who detected and discovered a great number of other Wives: of which 170, were condemned. Never afore that day was there any inquisition nor proces at Rome, about poiyoning and forcery. So as the thing was taken for a prodigious wonder, and imputed rather to their minds besotted and bewitched, then to any criminal intent of their. Whereupon the Magistrates of the City, calling to mind and fearing the old Chronicles, found, that in times past, at what time as the Commons in a mad fit withdrew themselves and departed the City, there was a spike or great rail driven and fixed by the Dictator: and that the minds of the people, which by discord had been distracted and out of their right wits, were by that ceremonical satisfaction, brought again in good tune: and therefore it was thought good, that for the failing or sticking up of such a nail, there should a Dictator be created. So Con.

Qun-tulius was nominated, who named L. Valerius General of horlemen, who so soon as the nail was fallen, gave over their places.

Conulse then were created, L. Papirius Craffus the second time, and L. Plaucius_Verres. In the beginning of which year, there came from the country of the Volcians as Embassadors to Rome, the Fabrinius and Lucas, making request that they would take them into their protection, promising that if by them they were defended from the forces of the Samnites, they would become loyal and obedient subjects to the people of Rome: Then were Embassadors sent from the Senat, to give commandment to the Samnites, to forbear doing any violence upon the borders of thosc nations, which Embassages speed well and took place; not so much for that the Samnites desired peace, as because they were not as yet prepared for this war. The same year began the Priverernum war. The confederates whereof, were the Fundans, and their Leader likewise a Fundan, one Vitruvius Vecius, a man of great name and reputation, not only in his own country, but also at Rome. His dwelling house stood sometime in mount Palatine, even the very same, which after the building was pulled down, and the ground forfeit and confiscate, was called Avec Prius, Against whom as he waited and spoiled far and near the Serin, Norban and Coran countries; L. Pa-pirius went thither with a power, and refted nor far from his very camp. But Vitruvius neither had the wit to keep himself within his trench against a mightier enemy, nor yet the heart to encounter far from his host. But having put his foildiers in battle array, before they were all well out of the gate of the camp, while the foildiers had more mind to file backward, then march forward and encounter the enemy: without either advicc or confident courage he fought: and with a little ado, and without any question of the matter he was vanquished: to by reason of the shortnes of the way, and the easie retire into the camp so near, he found no great trouble to face his foild-iers from mutt'l laughter. For in the very conflict, few or none in a manner were slain, and not many in the press of the rout and fall of the flight, at what time as they rushed into their Camp. And in the beginning of the night, the army thus discomfired, made halfe to Privennum, there to defend themselves within a wall rather then a trench. Plautus the other CoU, having from Privennum, overrun and forragrd the territory, and driven booties away, conducted his army into the Fundan country. The Senat of the Fundans as he entered into their confines met him, saying: 4 They were not come as Orators to entreat either for Vitruvius, or for those that took this war; but for the people of the Fundans: who that they were innocent and not culpable for this war, Vitruvius himself hath plainly proved and declared, in that he chose Pri-vernurn to be his place of retreat and retire and not the City Fundis; the very place of his nativity. And therefore at Privennum the enemies of the people of Rome were to be fought for and punish'd, who unmindful of both their own countries, had revolted as well from the Fundans as the Romans. As for the Citizens of Fundis, they were at peace with Rome, they, they were Romans in heart, and carried thankful remembrance of a benefit received: they entreated therefore and besought the Conul to forbear hostilities with a gentle people: affuring him that their Lands, their City, their own Bodies, their Wives and Children were and should be at the devotion of the people of Rome; The Conul after that he had commended the Fundans, and sent Letters to Rome that they remained firm and fast in their allegiance, turned his way to Pri-vernurn. But before he dilleged (as Claudius writeth) the Conul executed those that were the heads of the conspiracy, and three hundred and fifty of those rebellious conspirators were sent prisoners to Rome. But the Senat accepted it not, and were not content with this submission, as judging the Fundan people, defirous to be excused and discharged, with the punishmenl of the needy and base fort of people. Now when as Privennum was besieged and invested with two Consular Armies, the one of the Consuls was called home to hold the Election of Magistrates. That year were re-lected in the great race called Circus, the Barriers from whence the stories and their chariots are let forth, when their prizes. But before they were well past the care of the Privenats war, there arrived a terrible and fearful boute of the Gauls war, which never was regarded slightlie of the Nobles of Rome. Incidentally therefore the new Conuls, L. Aemilius Mamercus, and Cn. Plautus, on that very day, namely, on the Calends of July, wherein they entered their offices, were commanded to determin and agree between themselves upon their Provinces: and Mamercus, who had the charge of the Gauls war, levied and enrolled an army without allowing any immuni and exemption from warfare. Moreover and besides, even the poor handcrafts men and arrists, liv as keep their shops, and live by sedentary occupations, a sort far unmeet for martial service, are said to have been called forth, and prett to the wars: and a mighty army was assembled and met together at Veii, that from thence they might march to encounter the Gauls: For it I was thought good that they should now go farther forward, for fear lest the enemy taking another way, might receive them and march directly to the City of Rome. But a few days after, when it was known for certain that all the trouble and fear for that time was overblown, they divered their forces from the Gauls, and bent all against Privenat. But the issue hereof is reported two manner of ways, some write that the City was forced by assaulet, and that Virsavia came alive into their hands: others, that the utmost extremity of assault was used, they of their own accord, carry ing before them white bands in token of peace, yielded themselves unto the Conuls: and that Virsavia by his own Country men was rendered and delivered unto him. The Senat being moved, and their opinion asked concerning Virsavia and the Privenats; sent for the Conul Plautus to triumph, after that he had dismantled the walls of Privenum and K there placed a strong guard: and they gave order in the mean time that Virsavia should be kept in prision until the Consuls return, then to be whipped and put to death. They appointed also that his habitation in Palantium should be pulled down, and his goods consecrated to their Dol Sena Sanguis. And look what money [of brass] was raised thereof, it served to make bran round Plates, which were offered and put up in the Chappel of Sangus towards the temple of Quir-ins. Touching the Senat of the Privenats, thus it was decreed, that every one of the Senators cal-ing, who remianed at Privenum after their revolt ing from the Romans, should in the same condition and state as the Veliterns, be confined beyond Tylbris, and there dwell. These Ares being thus let down, there was no more talk of the Privenats until the triumph of Plautus. After the triumph, the Conuls having executed Virsavia and his complices, supposing now that he might safely propound the cause of the Privenats, to the LL of the Senat, whereas they were newly satisfied with the execution of the guilty offenders, "Since that (quoth he) my LL of the, Senat, the principal authors of this revolt and rebellion, have both at the hands of the immortal gods, and at yours, suffered now already condigne punishment: what is your further plea-ture, and what shall be done with the innocent and harmless multitude? For my part verily, although I be rather to demand your opinions then deliver mine own: yet seeing the Privenats neer neighbors unto the Samnits, with whom we now at this time entertain a most uncertain and slippery peace, I would have as little grudge and tancer left as may be, between us and them. As the question in it fell was doubtful and ambiguous, whereas mengave advice tome proceed cruely, others to deal gently, according to each man his nature and inclination: so, there was one of the Privenat Embassadors that made it more doubtful, and put all out of square; a man mindfull of that state wherein he was born, more than of his preferred and extremity, Who being demanded of one (that had spok en to the point, and delivered some sharp sentence and heavy sentence against them) What punishment he judged the Privenats deserved? Matry (quoth he) that which they deserve, who deem themselves worthy of liberty and freedom. At whose flow and arrogant answer, when the Conul law tiose to be more eagerly and bitterly bent, who before impugned the cause of the Privenats: to the end that he himself by some mild and gentle demand might draw from the party more modellanguage: What (quoth he) if we should remit and pardon your punishment: what kind of peace might we hope to have at your hands? If (quoth he) ye offer us good peace, ye shall find it on our part loyal and perpetuall: but N if ye tender hard conditions of peace, ye shall have it last but a small while. But then one gavo out that the Privenat began to threaten plainly: and said moreover, that such speeches were eough to stir up any peaceable and quiet people to war, that never thought to have fought. But the better part of the Senat drew he his answers to a better tene, and said that it was the speech of a man and of a man true born. For, was it credible (quoth they) that any state, may any particular person, would longer abide (than needs he must) that condition which he gathered and goeth against his stomach? There only is peace sure and like to hold, where men are contented and willing to keep themselves in peace: and never let men look or hope to find faithful loyalty, where they will impose their demands and servitude. And to this purpose the Conuls himself emovably and enclosed his hearts, reiterating these words to the Senators that were first to give their opinions, and that to fond, as he might of many more be over-heard. That they above al-other and none but they indeed were worthy to be made Roman Citizens, who minded and efeemed nothing in the world but their freedom, Whereupon, both in the Senat they obtained their just and also by the authority of the LL, a Bill was exhibited to the people, That the Privenats might be enfrancbied Romans.

The same yeare were three hundred sent as a Colony, to inhabit Anxur: and had two Acres of ground a piece allowed them. The year following was memorable in no respect, either of the home
A home affairs or foreign, in the time of P. Plautius Proculus, and P. Cornelius Scapula Coff. Only this till out that year, that in Fregella (which some time was in the territory of the Sidicines, and after of the Volcians) there was a Colony planted and unto the people there was given a dole or distribution of raw flesh amongst them, by Marcus Flaminus, at the funeral of his mother. Some there were that thought, how under a colour of honoring his mother, he defrayed and paid unto the people a defered hire & reward; in that when he was by the Eldies arrested & brought to his answer for adultery committed with a Dame or married Wife in the City, the people had by their voices acquit him. This dole givenon a favour part at his trial, was the occasion also of a dignity following: for in the next Election notwithstanding he was able, he was preferred to the Tri- Bunship of the Commons, even before those Competitors that were in present place.

There stood sometime the City Paleopolis, not far from thence where was now Nupti Standeth. In theo two Cities, one and the same people inhabited, defended and deriving their beginning from Cumae, and the Cumans fetched their off-spring from Chalcis in Euboea. With that fleet where in they failed from their own country, they were able to do much a sea, and were mighty upon those coasts where they dwelt. And first landing in the Hands Acastia and Perseus, afterwards they adventured to set themselves in the main and continent. This City relying and trusting in their own power, as well as preening upon the faithfull and disloyal society of the Samnites with the Romans or bearing themselves bold upon the rumor that ran of a persistence that reigned in the City of Rome, wrought much mischief and hostility against such Romans as inhabited the C. Campain and Falernian Countries. Whereupon when as (in the time of Lucius Cornelius Lentulus, and Quintus Pulius Philo Confuls, the 2ed. and 3. time) there were Facials sent to Paleopolis, fort to demand restitution again, and a proud answer returned back from the Greeks, a Nation more fluent and valiant in tongue then in deed and execution; by the authority of the Senate the people declared, that there should be war made upon the Paleopolitans. And when as the Confuls had divided their own selves between themselves, it fell to Publius, his turn to war upon these Greeks. Cornelius with another army was opposed against the Samnites, if they should hop to stir any way. For the report went that they looking and expecting silently the revolt of the Campains would encamp nearer and join with them. There, Cornelius thought it best to keep a standing camp, The Senat was certified from both Confuls, that they had small hope of peace with the Sam- nites, Publius gave intelligence, that two thousand Nolan soldiers, and four thousand Sam- nits, were rather by the compulsion and importunity of the Nolans, than with the good will of the Greeks, received at Paleopolis. At Rome it was for certain known, that in Samnium there were new mutters taken by the Magistrates direction, and that the whole country, and the people adjoining, were raised, and out in arms. Moreover, That the Privernata Fundians, and Formians were without all dissimulation jubilicited and moved to rebel. Upon which causes, it was advised by the Senat, first to send Embassadors to the Samnites, before they made war; and from them they had an infeolent answer, And they themselves made quarter, and charged the Romans with wrongs offered first: and nevertheless they justified themselves for anything by them done, and answered all objections that were laid against them full freely. "Namely, that the Greeks were not aided by any publick counsel or order of theirs, nor yet were the Fundians and Formians by them jubilicited, as who need not be ashamed of their own power, but thought them- selves sufficient enough to war if they lifted. Thus much moreover, they could not differ- bly, but speak it out in plain terms, That the Nation and Senat of the Samnites take it ill "parts, that the people of Rome had re-edified and repaired Fregella, a town by them conquered, and won from the Volcians, and by them laid ruinate: and not only so, but they had placed a Colony also in the Samnies Country, which the inhabitants called Fregella. Which contumely and reproachful injury, unless they that were the authors thereof would do their best to "abolish and cancel, they would with all their might and main repel it from them. And when as the Roman Embassadors made a motion, and would have had them to put the matter for to be decided into the common Conferendates and friends of both parties; What double and indirect dealing is this (quoth the Samnites?) What jagging is here to no purpose? As for the quarrels and differences between us (O ye Romans) neither the babbling words of Embassador, nor yet any days-man, or arbitrator, but the very Campain field, wherein we must encounter in earnest, even dint of sword, and the spears point, and the doublet chine of battel shall determin. And therefore encamp within Campan and Scaevola, in the sight one of another, and let us then try the latter, whether Sammit or Roman shall be Lord of itself. The Embassadors of Rome made answer, that they were not to go whither the enemy called them, but whither their General and Captains led them. In this mean while Paleopolis had already got a convenient piece of ground between Paleopolis and Naples, and thereby impeached the enemies of the mutual encounter of G. Successors from the one to the other, which they had used reciprocally as either place had need, and was distressed. Therefore, when at the time of Election of Magistrates at Rome drew on ap- pear, and expedient it was not for the Common-weal that Paleopolis (now approaching near the enemies walls, and read by affinity) should be called away from the hope which daily they had of winning the City: the Tribuns were dealt withal, to propone an Act unto the people. That when the time of Paleopolis Confulship should be expired, he might in quality and name of Proconsul, remain in government, until the war with the Greeks were fully ended. And into L. Cornelius were letters sent, implying thus much. That whereas it was not thought good, that he now being entred into Sannium, should be called away from the chief pith of the war, he should nominate a Dictator to be President of the Election of Magistrates: Who named M. Claudius Marcellus, and by him was appointed for General of horse Sp. Pojlimus. Yet for all this, was no assembly for the said election, helden by the Dictator, Forte came in question, Whether he were rightly created or no. And the Angurs being hereabout coniunct with, pronounced, "That the Dictator seemed not created right. But the Tribuns discredited and made fucipious "and infamous, by their acculatory speeches, this their sentence and declaration, saying, That nei-ther it was eafe to know the fault and error in the creation, seeing that the Cnuli nominated 'the Dictator in the beginning of the still night; neither had the Cnuli written to any man pub-lickly or privately thereof, nor yet was there any person could come forth and say, that he either I faw or heard ought, that might mar and interrupt the Auspicies, nor yet could the Angurs fe-tting at Rome, guests and divine, what error had hapned to the Cnuli in the camp to far off, And "who faw not ( say they ) that the Angurs found fault herewith, because the Dictator Elect, "was a Commoner? Thelie and other fuch allegations were (to no purpose) by the Tribuns given out, For the matter grew to an Interreign, and the forefaid Election being still put off and adjourned for one caufe or other; at length the fourteenth Interregnum, L. Emilius created Cnuliis, C. Petulius, and L. Pappirus, surnamed Mutillanum or Carfor, as I find in other Chroni-cles.

In that year it was recorded, that the City Alexandria in Egypt was founded: and that Alex-ander the King of Ephesins was murdered by a certain Lucan, a banished perion, to verify the O-K racle of Jupiter Ddananus, which had foretold his death. For when he was ent for into Italy by the Tarentins, he had warning given him, [To take head of the Acheronian Water, and the City Pan-dofia, for there it was his destiny to end his days: ] and therefore, with more speed he passed ovet into Italy, to be far off as might be, from the City Pandofia in Ephirus, and the river Acheron: which liuinf out of Malofis into the lower Meers and Lakes, dilcargeth it selt, and falleth into the Theptsonian Gulf, Howbeit (as commonly it is seen when men leck moth to fly and avoid their fatal death, they run headlong and plunge themselves into it) he, having oftentimes van-quished and overthrown the legions of the Brutians and Lucas: won by force Heraclea Celony- of the Tarentines, and Confedio in Lucan, and Sipontum, and also Acrerom a Colony of the Brutians, and other Cities afterwards of the Meepiains and Lucas: sent into Epirus three hun-dered Noble houses and families, whom he meant to keep as hostages: he encamped not far from Pandofia, a City situate neer to the Confinies of the Lucas and Brutians, And there he held three his somewhat distant aunder, from whence he might make excursions and rodes into every part of his enemies country: and he had in ordinary about him almost 200. banished men of the Lucas, for his future truly guard: who notwithstanding (as the nature are of such for the most part) changed with every wind, and carried mutable minds according to the variety of fortunes. Now it fell out so, that the continual wars which overbowed all the fields, had foreclosed and lopped the paffages three ways between his armies, fo as they could not help one another: whereby those two garrisons where the King was not in perfon, were surprized by the unexpected coming of the enemies: who having put them all to the sword, turn'd their whole forces to besiege the King. M From whence, there were by the Lucas exiles, meffengers sent to their own countrie-men: who in the name of the rest capitulatated that if they might be restored again, they would deliver the King either dead or alive into their hands. Howbeit he himfelf with an elect number of men, made a noble and hardy adventure, and brake through the midf of the enemies: and encountering the chief Commander of the Lucas hand to hand, killed him outright: and having rallied his men near together, who were scattered aunder in fight, he came at length to a river, by which he the fresh ruins of a broken bridge, that the violence of that water had been done, flowed passage, Which as the army passed over an unknown and blind foord, one fouldier wearied with fear and travel, cursing and deteighting the unlucky and abominable name of the Rivers, fortrow to Say, Thou hast not thy name * Acheron for naught: which word when it came once to the King his N ear, he prentely began to think and mule of his finallend: and there staid till in a deep fimpence whether he shall pas over or no. Then Settums, one of the Kings servitors and liege-men, asked him why he lingered and made delay, being so great a peril and jeoparde as he was ? and fhow-ed him withal, how the Lucas intended to play false with him, and fough occasion to forelay and do him a milchief. With that the King looked behind him, and epihed them afar off in a troop coming against him: whereupon he drew his fword, put his horifie to it, took the River, and rode through the midft thereof: and when he was now fo far pased that he was ready to take the land one of those banifht Lucas landed a dart alfo at him, and fluck him quite through. Whereupon he fell down dead with the dart (licking in his body, and the firem car-ried it down as far as to the Corps de guard of the enemies, Where his breathles enemies was O fhamefully minded and mangled: for having cut it crofs the middle, rent the one half to * Confedio, and kept the other with themelves still, to pradice a thousand villanies upon it. And as they shot and flung flones at it afar off, a certain woman being amongst this outrages multitude (raging beyond all measure of anger and malice that man heart canderior or beleve) after she had boughht them to forbear a while, with her eyes gushing out tears paid unto them. That her husband and children were prifoners, and in the hands of the enemies: but she hoped with the Kings body, howsoever it were abused and martyred, to redeem them again. This
The Eighth Book of T. Livius.

A flayed them from farther mangle thereof: Thus all that was left of the Kings body: by the means of one only woman, was burnt at Conteria: and his bones sent back afterwards to the enemies unto Metapontium, and from thence conveyed to Epirus, unto Cleopatra his wife, and his litter Olympia: whereas the one was litter, the other Mother to Alexander the Great, thus much concerning the woful and unhappy end of Alexander the King of Epirus. Whole fortune albeit was such, that he came thither, and was cut off before he intermeded in the Roman war; yet because he warred in Italy, let it suffice that briefly by the way I have touched his story.

The same year was there a Leetifern at Rome, (which was the fit after the foundation and building of that City) for the pacifying of the same gods as heretofore. Afterwards the new Consuls by the ordinance and direction of the people, sent defiance and proclaimed war against the Samnits. And as they had made themselves greater preparation every way than against the Greeks, so they had besides new aids, whereof (as then) they least thought of: The Lucins and the Apian towns (nations which to that day had no dealing nor commerce at all with the Romans) came to their liege and loyal Allies, offering men and munition toward that war. Whereupon they were by form of Covenant and league entertained and received into their amity. At the same time also the Romans had good success in the Samnits quarters: for three towns there yielded unto them, and they became Masters thereof, to wit, Albans, Callises, Ruffium: all the territory besides at the first coming of the Consul, was pill'd and spoiled far and near. These exploits thus prosperously achieved, the other enterprise also of besieging the Greeks, was well followed and at the point of an end. For over and besides, that by certain forges and blocusses between the enemies forts and forces, one part was cut from the other; they endured also within their own walls, much more misery and calamity, than the enemy menaced and threatened without and as if they had been captives to their own garison fondlers, whom they had called to them for their defense. They suffered infinite villanies, and indignities in the persons as well of their wives as of their children, and even the hardest extremities, that follow upon Cities forced by the enemy. And therefore when it was noised abroad, that there were new successe coming from Tarentum and the Samnits: they supposed that for Samnits, there were already within their walls more of them than they would marvel, as for Tarentins they looked willingly for their help, as Greeks both the one & the other, hoping by their means that they might as well withstand the outrages of the Samnits and Nolans, as the Romans their open and professed enemies. Last of all of many inconsideration, that they were driven unto, the least and least was thought, to yield simply unto the Romans. Charilans and Nyphius: two great men and the chief personages of the City, having laid their heads and plotted one with the other, parted the matter between themselves, that the one should flie unto the Roman General, and the other stay behind, to find some opportune and minister ready means to render the City according to their desig'nment. Charilans was the man who presented himself unto Philus, and laid unto him, "To the good and happy fortune be it: said and done of the Paleopolitians and the people of Rome, I am determined to deliver and render the City into your hands: in which Action, whether I may be thought to have been trayed or faved my country, it relleth only in the truth and fidelity of the Romans. As for my selfe priuately, I am come neither to indure, nor yet to crave ought at all: but publicly in the behalf of the City. I would rather by way of petition request, than article and capitulate, thus much, That if this enterprise incended, proposal, speed well and take effect, the people of Rome would think and consider, in what affection, endeavours, and jealousy, our City returneth again into their amity, rather than upon what felly and rashness, it brake their allegiance, and revolted. Then, after he had been badden wellcom by the General, entertained with good and gracious words, and highly commended, he received 5000 fondlers, to keep, surprize, and to seize that part of the quarter of the City, where the Samnits were lodged, and which they held: of this regiment and garrison, I, Quintus a Colonell had the conduct. During this time, Nyphius also did his part, and dealt so craftily under hand with the Prrest of the Samnits, that I induced and wrought him to this point, That for as much as all forces, were either about Paleopolis or in Samnium, he would permit him with the fleet to cast about to the Roman coastes, for that he intended to forrage and waste, not only the maritime parts, but the territories also adjoining to the City: and the better to deceive the enemy (quoth he) I had need to go by night, and therefore the Ships presently must lanch forth, and be set at sea. And to effect this more speedily, all the youth of the Samnits besides the necessary garrison of the City, was sent to the shoar. Where whiles Nyphius, in the dark, and amongst the multitude that hindered one another purposely, spent time in letting confusly, some to this and others to that, Charilans, according to the complot set before, was by his associates received into the City: and having filled the highest places of the town with Roman fondlers, commanded to let up a shout, whereas the Greeks upon a secret taking them by their Captains, kept themselves still and quiet. The Nolans then, at the backside of the town, escaped and fled by the high way, that leadeth to Nola. And the Samnits being excluded out of the town, as they had a more ready mean to fle from the present, to they found it, after they were put danger, a more shameful disgrace. For, they were disarmed and naked men, they had lost all the good they had amongst the enemies, and returned home spoiled, poor and needy, and served for a laughing stock and derision, not only to other nations, but also to their own neighbors and couritmen. Albeit I am not ignorant that there is another opinion... opinion, whereby it is given out that Palapoli was by the Samnites betrayed: yet as I have credited and followed herein such authors, as I think it were hard if they should not deliver a truth; for I am induced the rather to believe that the Neapolitans returned into amity with the Romans, because of the league extant in their name (for unto them afterwards the State and chief feast of the Greeks was translated.) Unto Publius was decreed a triumph, for that it appeared clearly and was believed constantly, that by his siege the enemies were tame, and to contrain to come to a composition and surrender. Two special favours happened to this man above all others before him, namely, the prerogation of his government not granted to any man aforesight; and triumph after his Magistracy was expired.

Upon the fall of this war, arose another with the Greeks of the other tract or coast. For the Tar- rentines having born the Palapolitans in hand a good while, and fed them with a vain hope of help, when they heard once that the Romans were possessed of their city, complained themselves like men forfaken, and not as those who had forsaken others, much blaming the Palapolitans, and with anger and envy raging against the Romans, Disquited all they were, for that news came that the Lucans and Apulians (for both these nations that year began to contract alliances) were under the protection of the Romans. For now (lay they) they are well near come to us, and shortly we shall grow to this pass, that we must acknowledge the Romans for our Lords; or have them our heavy friends. And verily the trial and hazzard of our estate, dependeth only upon the Samnits war, and the event thereof, which nation alone, and the same nothing mighty, remains now; since that the Lucans are gone and revolted to the Romans: who yet might be reclai med and moved to shake off the society with the Romans, if any feat were wrought and practiced to low some discord and contision between them. These devices and overtakes took place and prevailed with such, as were deliberate of change and novelty: in so much assert of the Lucan youth (better known, than trusted and reputed honest, amongst their countrymen and fellow Citizens, hired alo for a sum of money,) whipped one another with rods, came naked into the assembly of the Citizens, and with open mouth cried out aloud and said, that for preening only to come into the Roman camp, they were by the Cof, thus scourged, escaped narrowly the loss of their heads. The thing it felt pitious and unjeemly to behold, as bearing a fhew rather of wrong done unto them, than of any malicious & subtil practice by them intended, stirred the people up, to force their Magistrates with their unceasant outcries to assemble a Council. Some flanding round about the Senate in council, called hard for war again the Romans: others ran up and down to raise the multitude of Peasants to take arms and in this fir and uproar, which was able to disquiet and amaze even those that were well minded, a decree passed; that the league with Samnits should be resumed, and Embassadors dispatched forthwith, to the same purpose. This was a sudden change; and as it had no colour of caufe, so it carried final credit with it amongst the Samnits, who forced the Lucanians to give hostages and to take garrisons into their fortresses: and they, blinded with anger, and inveigled with flattery, refused nothing. But shortly after began the fraud to appear and thew itself namely, after that the authors and devilers of these false families and flanders, were retired to Tarentin: but having put themselves out of all, and being not at liberty to dispole of their own affairs; they had nothing else left them, but like fools to repent in vain.

That year hapned to the Commons of Rome another beginning of their liberty, in that they were no more either bound in chains, or held in thrall by their creditors. Which priviledg against poor debtors, was altered, by occasion of the filthy luft and notorious cruelty of one Ulitar, And L. Publius was the man unto whom C. Publius for his fathers debt, became bound, and configned himself his prifoner; whole tender age and lovely favor which might and should have moved pity, inflamed the mind of this Ulitar to unkind luft and shameful comnunely: for making foul accounts, that the prime and flower of his youth should satisfie and pay for the intereft of the debt, he first began to allure and entire unto him the youth with wanton & unchaft speeches afterwards seeing that his ears abhorred to hear such filthinesse he cried to minatory words, & ever and anon put him in mind of his present condition wherein he fiold but laft of all, perceiving by him, that he flood more N upon his honor and freedom by birth then respected his hard estate by fortune, he cauied him to be stripped naked and whipping chest to be presented unto him, The poor flripping thus pitifully rent and torn, ran forth into the open street, complained of the filthy luft & cruelty of his creditor, Whereupon, a number of people, enkindled as well with pity and commiseration of the flripping, and indignity of the injurie, so in regard of their own case, and of their children, came running into the Forum or common place, and so from thence in a long train to the court of the Council, The Consuls upon this sudden uproar were forced to call a Senate, and as the Senators entered into the Council chamber, they lay all prostrate at their feet, as they pass'd by, one after another, & shew'd unto them the young mans back and fides in what taking they were. And that one day, by occasion of the outrageous enormity of one person, brake the neck of that mighty bond, whereby, to that day, the creditors had their debtors, in danger unto them. For the Conft, had in charge, to pro pole unto the people, that from thence forward, no person whatsoever, unless he had committed some heinous fact, and until he were to suffer therefore, should be either kept in fetters and gives, or fet of upon the rack, Item, that for lent money, the goods of the debtor and not the body should be obliged. So they that were in bondage, became released and enlarged: and order was taken for the time to come, that none should be imprisoned by their creditors again.

The same year, whiles the Samnits war of it fell alone, besides the sudden revolt of the Lucans, together
The Eighth Book of T. Livius.

A together with the Tarentins the hatchers thereof, held the Senators of Rome in care and perplexity enough: behold over and above all these, the Veiiin people, as a furrocate to their troubles, joined and banded with the Samnits. Which new occurrent as, for that year it rather maintained this discord amongst men in their ordinary talk every where, than mimitated cause of ferior debating in public Council: to the Confuls of the year following, L. Furris Camillus the second time, and Jun. Brutus Servus, thought no one thing more important than it, and need ful to be creased of in the Senate with the frift. And albeit the thing were but new: and a breeding, yet to greatly were the L. hereabout troubled. that they feared no less to begin to take in hand, then to neglect it altogether, and not to see it: doubtless, lest if they were let go unpunished, the next neighbors would grow too lulty and prouer: and again, if they seemed to chastise them by war, the rest for fear of the like measure, might be provoked to anger, take arms, and enter into a general rebellion. And all, and every one of them, namely, the Martians, the Pelignians and Marins, were in tents of arms comparable and equal to the Samnits every which: every nation they might be sure to have their enemies, if they medled with the Veiiins, and touched them once never to little. Howbeit, that part prevailed and took place, which for the present, seemed to carry more courage and valor, then fage advice and wisdom: but the ill use and event thowed, that Fortune favoured Fortitude. So the people by authority and direction of the Nobiles. decreed war against the Veiiins: the charge whereof of light by lot upon Brutus, and Samnium left to Camillus.

To both places were the armies conducted: and by the care and industry employed in the defense of the marchs and frontiers the enemies were impeached for joining their forces together. Howbeit the Consul Furris Camillus, who had the greater and weightier charge laid upon him, fortunately to fail, gently only, and thereby could not follow the wars: who being commanded to nominate a Dictator, for to manage and conduct his affairs, declared the noblest warrior in those days, L. Papius Curtor: by whom Q. Fabius Rutilianus was named General ofhostmen, a couple hardly of great name and highly renowned for their worthy acts, achieved in this in their government: yet more famous and voiced abroad, by reason of variance and discord which fell between them: whereby they grew well near to the utmostterms of cancelling one another in extremity. The other Consul warred with the Veiiins many and findy ways, but more with like fortune and happy success. For he forraged and wafted their country: and b, by pillage, riving, and turning their houses and corn, forced them against their wills into the field: and in one battel so eneefbled and abated the forces of the Veiiins (but not without bloodshed of his own men) that his enemies not only fled into their camp, but also as not truing now to their ramparts and trenches, they were constrained to flee away into their towns, minding for to fave themselves, as well by the natural situation of the places, as the strength of their good walls. In the end, he made a fult upon those walled Cities, purpofing by force to win them. And first he gained Cutina by scaling, either through the exceeding courage of his fouldiers, or their anger, being so chafed as they were at their hurts received: that scarcely one escaped out of the throne and skirmish, clear & not wounded. Then he likewise took Cingioli: and gave the pillage of both Cities to his fouldiers. Neither gates nor walls could stand in their way and keep them out. But into Samnium the journey was undertaken by the Dictator with doubtful Antipaces and uncertain knowledge of the will of the gods. The default and terror whereof took not effect in the main event and illuse of the war, (for it was prosperous and fortunate) but turned to the rage and anger of the chief leaders, who fell out deadly one with another. For Papius the Dictator, advised by the Pullarius, that had the custody and charge of the fared Pullets, went back to Rome to take the Aufipices, (or the prefage by the bird-flight) and it sharply charged his General of horse to keep himself close within his hold, and in no wife to give the enemies battel during his absence. But Fabius after the Dictators departure, advertised by the ephials that the enemies were even as careless, as loose and disorder, as if there had been no Roman in Samnium? whether it were, that being a fhort and lively young Gentleman, he took into scorn and thought it an indignity, that all should not seem to ret in the Dictator only: or that he was induced with the good opportunity of doing some brave exploit (I wont not) but he went forth with an army in order of battle to Ismolinium, (that was the places name) & there fought a field with the Samnits. But (such was the happy illuse of this battel, that it the Dictator himself had been there in person, he could not have been better managed. For, neither Captain failed his fouldiers, nor fouldiers their Captain. The horsemen also under the leading of L. Cominius Colonel by his place, (who findy times charged and recharged again, and could not with force break the enemies arrays) unbred their horses, and ran them all on the spur; that no strength was able to abide them: such an hauock, such a race made they all about over armour and men. The footmen foering this hot charge of the horse, advanced the eniiogs against the enemies thus put in disorder: and twenty thousand men (by report) were that day slain. In some authors I find, that twice in the Dictators abfence he fought, and twice had the upper hand. But in the molt ancient writers I read but of one battel. In some Chronicles the whole matter is piffed over and let out clean. The General of the horse having gained a mighty mafs of spoil, as otherwise he could not chuse, upon to fraw a laughter & mischief gathered together into one heap all the enemies armor made a fire under, & burned them: were it that he had made some such vow to one of the gods: or as I lift rather to believe it was a motive of Fabius himself, that the Dict, should not reap the fruit of his glory, and enfile his name thereto: or in pomp carry those spoils before him at his triumph.
Moreover, the letters of this victory by him sent to the Senat, and not a word thereof to the Dictator, were some proof, that he was not willing to impart and communicate his praisethis with him. But certainly, the Dictator took the matter in all parts, that when every man else was joyful for this noble victory achieved, he only showed anger and disdain in his very countenance. Whereupon suddenly he dissolved the Senat, and departed in great haste out of the court, giving out and often uttering these words; Then hath the matter of hermesen in deeds as well exerted and overthrown, both Dictators Majesty and military discipline, as defeated the Samnites legions, it kec to go clear away and escape unpunished, with so manifest contempt of my express commandment. Whereupon, full of threats and indignation, he hastened to the camp, and took long journeys; yet could he not prevent the fruit of his coming. For there were Vanturiers that I posted from the City before, to bring word that the Dictator was coming, full of revenge, and set upon punishment, and at every instant word almost, commending the late exemplary justice of T. Mummius. Then Fabius immediately calling an audience, beheld the frontiers, that with what valor and virtue they had defended the Commonwealth from most deadly and mortal enemies, with the fame they would protect him from the outrageous cruelty of the Dictators, himselfe (I say) by whose conduct and fortune they had gotten so glorious a victory. "Furnow, reciting he is (quoth he) for envy out of his right wits, and beside himselfe: for anger at another mans mankind and dexterity, furious and horn-mad, and all is no more but this that in his absence, to his death, we have stood well; who withfeath rather in his heart, if he could change the course of fortune, that the Samnites had won the victory than the Romans: and nothing is so K face in his mouth, as, That his commandment was commended: as who would say, he forbade not bawd, until he had the same mind, wherein he now grieveth that we have fought. For so is his will, good, even tor very envy to hinder and suppress the troubles of another, and went a bout to take weapons away from most forward soldiers, detestous of fight, that in his absence they might not lay hand to their swords: so now, see how he retrencheth and limiteth in greater choicel at this, that without L. Papirius the soldiers were not disarmed, demembreth as it were, and maineth: and for that Q. Fabius forgot not his place, but bare himself General of the Cury, and not as a Servant and follower of the Dictator, standing at court, and waiting at an inch when some under Captainship would fall, that he might step into the place. What would this man (think ye) have done, how would he have treated, (as the fortune and L. doubtful chance of war oftentimes goeth) we had been put to the worst and left the day; who now that the enemies are vanquished, the field so well fought, the State so well served, asby the most singular Captain in the world, better it might not be, thus meanceth execution to me the General of the horfe, even in the honour of my counpell? Neither is he (my masters) jun ely bent and set upon mischief against the General of the horne more then against the Colonels, the Centurions and common Soldiers: may, he would (be ye sure) if he had been able, have raged and lated as bitterly, yer, and executed his ire and furious rage upon all, But because he cannot, now he doth harry his gale upon us alone. For even as envy, like a flaming fire, learned and moumet up to the highest, so runneth he upon the chief Captain, and aimeth at the head of this worthy exploit. If he had once extinguished him, together with the glory of M. this brave service, then like a Conqueror and Lord over a poor captive army, whatsoever he might by law execute against a General of the Cury, he would attempt and extend, upon the simple soldiers. Make reckoning therefore, that in running fall to me and in defence of my cause, ye uphold the liberty of all. For in case he shall perceive once, the same agreement of the army in the maintenance of the victory, which was well seen in the battle, and that ye all have a care and regard of the life and safety of one, his flomack will come down. his heart will relent and incline to clemency, and a milder sentence. To conclude, I recommend my life, and whole estate to your verme and faithful protection. Then from all parts of the audience they cried unto him aloud & bade him take a good heart: for so long as the Legions of the Romans were alive, there should no person do him harm or injury. Soon after came the Dictator, and presently S by sound of trumpet summoned a general assembly. And the public Crier after an Oieze made called by name for Q. Fabius General of the horfe. Who so soon as he was come from a lower place where he was, and approached near the Tribunal, (then quoth the Dictator) "I demand of thee, Q. Fabius, since that the rule of the Dictator is sovereign and highest above all others, whereto the Comuls ended with kingly pujiance and government, do obey, ye, & Pratrors are treated with the same authority that Comuls are whether thou elicent it meet and right, that a General of horfe should be obedient to his commandment or not? demand likewise, whether I my self knowing that I took my journey and went from home with doubtful and uncertain Anace, ought to have put the mainattake of the Common-wealth in hazard against the order and religious obligation in that behalf; and not rather, to go again to take new Apepia, that I might adventure & attempt nothing so long as I stood in doubt of the grace & favor of the gods? And withall, this I demand, whether the General of the horsemens could be freed, exempted & dis charged of that scriple of conscience, which checked and stayed the Dictator from execution of his charge? But what mean I to make these demands? Seeing that if he had departed with out laying one word, yet thou shouldst have framed thy opinion and applied thy mind according to the interpretation of my will and pleasure? Why layest thou nothing? Answer me I say, Forbad I thee not expressly, to do any thing in my absence? Forbad I not thee to fight with the enemies? How How dart thou in conceiue of my commandment, whiles our Aespiicia were uncertaine, when our confidences were unresolved and with scruples troubled, against Military custom, and that thou, against the discipline of our ancestors, and against the will and direction of the gods: how dart thou, I say, to be so hardy as to encounter with the enemy? To these interrogatories make answer directly. Answer I charge thee, to all these points, and nothing but these, and at the peril of thy life, not a word besides. Now come Sergeant and do thine office the while.

To whilk, his serving to, when Fabius could not readily answer point by point, one while comliaining that he had him for his accuser, who was the judge of his life and death: other whiles crying out aloud, that sooner might his life be taken from him, than the glory and honor of his benefactors: and as he justified and excused his own tell, he began again to challenge and accuse the Dictator.

Then Popirius being in more heat of choler than before, commanded the General of the horsemen to be stripped out of his cloaths and uncased, and the rods and axes to be brought forth ready. With that, Fabius calling earnestly for the help of the soldiers, whiles the officers were a tearing and rasing his cloaths from his back, made means to retire himself into the ranks of the Triaria, who began already to make a mutiny and uproar in the assembly. From whence there arose an outcry over all the audience, Some were heard to intreat, others to threaten, They who forsook to stand next to the Tribunal, because that being within the view and eye of the Dictator they might be known and noted, befought his Majesty to spare and pardon the General of the horse, and not with him to condemn the whole army. They that were farthest off in the skirt of the assembly, and especially that troop and company about Fabius, rated and cried out upon him with a rigorous and merciless Dictator. And a little thing more would have made them mutiny: nay, within the very compass of the Tribunal all was not clear and quiet. The Lieutenant or Colonels of whole legions, standing about his seat or chair of state intreated him to put off the matter until the morrow: to give his choler some time to cool, and allow space and respite to consider of it with advice and counsel: saying, 'If Fabius had played a youthful part, he had paid sufficiently for it already, and his victory had received disgrace and dishonour: enough, before him not to proceed to these extremities of utmost execution not to let him be a brand and noose of ignominy and shame upon the young Gentleman himself, to rare and gallant a Knight: or on his father, a most honourable and excellent personage, not yet upon the noble hone, and name of the Fabii. But when they saw how little they prevailed by their prayers, and as little by any reasons they could alledge: then, they admonished him to have a regard to the furious assembly of the soldiers: and that it was not for a man of his years and wit-teem, thus to put more fire to the hot stomack of Soulardis enkindled already, nor to administer more matter of mutiny: and if such a thing should happen, no man would impute the blame to Q. Fabius, who fought and humbly craved pardon of punishment, but to the Dictator: if he overcame with choler, should blindly forbear himself in willful peevishness, as to provoke the outrageous multitude against himself. Finally, that he should not think, how they laboured thus for any affectionate favour, but only to Q. Fabius: but were ready to take an oath, that they thought it not safe for the State and Commonwealth that he should proceed at such a time, to execute the rigor of justice upon Q. Fabius. By these and such like remonstrances, when as the Lieutenant had stirred up the Dictator his blood against himself, rather then pacified his mood against Fabius, they were commanded to go down from the Tribunal. And when as the Crier had assailed to make silence all in vain, for that by reason of the noise and tumult, neither the Dictator his voice nor any of his apparatus and harpards about him, could be heard, the night came upon them and ended the contention, as if it had been a battle in field. The General of the horse was commanded to appear on the morrow. Now when as every man gave it out and avouched unto him, that Popirius would proceed more vehemently, for that concerning the Lieutenant, and that the more he was dealt withal the worse he was: Fabius privately took out of the camp and fled to Rome. And by the means of his father M. Fabius, a man who had been already thrice Consul and Dictator, the Senate was called together immediately. And as he was in the midst of his grievous complaints before the Lords, touching the violent and wrong of the Dictator, all of a sudden, there was heard before the Council House door, a great noise and brawling of the citizens. Whiles they made way and voided the press. And no marvel; for the Dictator himselfe was come with a revenging mind. For so soon as he had heard how Fabius was departed out of the camp, he followed after with his light horsemen. Then began the bruit to be remov'd abroad, and Popirius called Fabius to be atticked, whereupon the chief of the Nobility, and the whole body of the Senate began to enterpose themselves by way of mediation: but all their intent was withstanding, he perilled his in impecable anger. Then leaped forth M. F. from the river. For as much as he, whether the authority of the Senate nor mine old age, whom you seek to make chidelnor yet the valor noble courage of the General of horse, by your own self chosen and nominated, can preval, nor any humble prayers which are able to appease the fury of the enemy, my offenders yea, and to pacifie the wrath and indignation of the gods: I implore the lawful help of the Tribunal, and to the whole body of the people I appeal. And since that you challenge and expect against the judgement of your own army, and of the Senate, I offer and present unto you that judge, who only is of more force and power, I am, then, your Dictatorship, I will see whether you will yield to this appeal, whereunto the Roman King Tribune, Fabius give place. Then out of the Council house they went straight to the Common place of audience: and and when the Dictator, attended with some few, was attended up, and the General of the Cavalry accompanied with all his whole troop of the chief of the City, Papirius commanded that he should come down or else be fetched from the Restraunto the lower ground. The father followed after him. "Well done (quoth he) in commanding us to be brought hither, from whence we may be allowed to speak our minds, if we were no better then privy persons. At the first there passed no continued speeches so much, as wrangling and altercation, But afterwards the voice and indignation of old Fabius, surmounted and drowned the other noise; who greatly blamed and cried out upon the pride and cruelty of Papirius. "What many (quoth he) I have been also a Dictator of Rome my self, and yet was there never so much as a poor Commoner, no Cen turion, nor Souldier hardly entreated or minced by me. But Papirius teelketh victory and triumph over a Roman Grand-Captain and Generals, as over the Leaders and Commanders of his enemies. See, lee, what difference there is between the government in old time, and this new pride & cruelty of late days. Quintus Cincinnatus a Dictator for the time, proceeded no farther in punishment against Minunus, when he was slain to deliver him lying entioned & beaten with in his own camp, but to leave him as a Lieutenant in stead of Conulu, in the army whereof he had charge. M. Furius Consulius, not only for the present tempered his choler toward L. Furilius, who in contempt of his own age and authority, had fought most untowardly and with disdiscount in the end; and wrote nothing to the people or the Senate but well, of his Collegue: but alo being returned, made a special reckoning of him above all the Tribuns consular, whom alo of all his colleagues, when as he had the choice granted him by the Senate, he elected to be K his coadjoitur in the charge of his government. Neither the people verify, whose power is Soverain over all, were ever more angry against those, that through rashness and want of skill left whole armies, than to fine them at a sum of money. For the lossf and miscarriage of any battel, that a General should be brought into question and answer for his life, was never heard of this day. And now, rods and axes, whipping and beheading, are prepared for the Com-mmanders under the people of Rome, and those, who are conquerors and have deferred most justly triumphs; which by no law can be offered to those that have been vanquished. What else I pray you should my son have endured, if he had bearedly suffered the field to be lost and his army withall? If he had been discomfited, put to flight, and driven clean out of the field, how far forth further would the Dictator his ire and violence have proceeded, than to scourge L and kill? And see how fit and feemly a thing it is that the City for the victory of Q. Fabius, should be in joy, in procession to the gods, and thankings, with congratulation and feasting one another; and he himself by whose means the Tempies stand open, the Altars smackle incense and sacrifice, and are heaped up again with vows, oblations, and offerings, to be stripped naked, to be whipped and torn in the sight of the people of Rome, looking up to the Capitol and the Caffle, lifting up his eyes to the gods upon whom in two such noble battels he called and in-vocated, not in vain nor without good and happy success? With what heart will the army take this, which under his leading and conduct and under his fortune,achieved victory? What ladamentation will there be in the Roman camp, and what rejoicing on the other side amongst the enemies? Thus fired this good old father thus pleaded he by way of expostulation and complaint, M calling upon God and man for help, and withal embraced his son in his arms, and shed many a tear. "On the one side, there made with young Fabius, and took his part, the majesty and countenance of the Senat, the favour and love of the people, the alacrity of the Tribuns, and the re-membrane of the army alfo. On the other side were allsed against him by Papirius: the invincible government and Empire of the people of Rome, the discipline of warfare. the Dictators commandment (observed and received at all times, no lefs then the Oracle & will of the gods) the fevere edicts of Metellus, whose fatherly love and affection to his dear son was fet behind the service and common good of the State. Alfo it was allsden, that the fame exemplary justice, L Britius the firft founder of the Roman liberty, executed in his two sons, and now mild and kind fathers, indulgent and fond old men in the cafe of contempt of other mens commandment, give N liberty to youths and pardon as a small matter, the overthrow of military discipline. Howbeit, he for his part would persist in his purpose still, nor remit one jot of condign punishment to him, who contrary to his commandment and notwithstanding the trouble and confusion of religion, and the doubtful Auspices, had given battel, saying, That as it was not in his power to abridge any jot the majesty of that State and Empire, for being everlaifting to L. Papirius would diminish mough of the authority thereof willing, That neither the Tribuns punish;execute and inviolable in it should by their opposition & interposing of their negative voice, violate the Empire of Rome: nor that the people of Rome, should in him above all others abohl and extinguishing both Dictator and Dictatorship. Which if it did, the poterity hereafter should lay the weight and blame (although in vain) not in L. Papirius, but in the Tribuns, and in the perverse judgment O the people: when as the military discipline being once polluted and stained, neither souldier would obey the Centurions commandment, nor the Centurion the Colonels, nor Colonel the Lieutenant nor Lieutenant the Consuls, nor yet General of horse, the Dictator: whi's no man bath regard and reverence either of men or of gods; no Edicts of Dictator, no flight of Birds observed; but that without pafore, the souldiers may wander and rove, either in their own ground or the enemies land, and unmindful of their sacred military oath, may caffher and di-charge themselves from souldiery, through a licentious liberty of their own, whenever they lift; leaving But earnestly, and without a doubt, the Dictator was charged by the words end: lay down you must, and go current for solemn and sacred warfare. Without these crimes and absurd inconveniences of the Tribuns, charged you must be to the words and your own lives for the audacious disobedience of Q. Fabius, for whom ye are now an

The Tribuns, were alarmed here, and for themselves now rather careful and perplexed, than for him who had recourse unto them for refuge and interv.

But the general consent of the people of Rome, turning to prayer and intreaty, sealed them of this heavy load and burden: and with one voice humbly besought the Dictator, to remit the punishment of the General of horse, for their sake. The Tribuns also, feeling that was the way, and all enquiring and growing to Petition, followed after, and did the like: earnestly beseeching the Dictator to forgive this human frailty, and youthful folly of Q. Fabius, saying, that he had inflicted chastisement enough. Then the young man himself, then his father M. Fabius, forgetting all spite, and laying aside debate, fell down at the Dictator's feet, and besought him to appease his wrathful displeasure. Hereupon the Dictator utter silence made, "yea marry (quoth he) O Quirites, this like well, and thus it should be; now hath military discipline got the victory, now hath the majesty of your Emiiure prevailed indeed, which lay both a bleed and were in hazzard to have been abolished and overthrown for ever, after this day, Q. Fabius is not acquit of his offence, in that he fought against his sovereigns commandment: but being thereof convicted and cast, is forgiven any, is given rather to the people of Rome and the Tribuns power, whole assistance and help is granted for their instant prayers, and not of duty. Well, Rise up, Q. Fabius and live, a most happy man forth this agreement of the City in thy defence, than for that victory, upon which erewhile thou batest thy selfe to bravely. Live (I say) thou that hast been so bold to commit that fact, which thine own father here, if he had been in L. Popirius his place, would never have pardoned. And as for me, into my grace and favour thou mayst come again, at thine own will and pleasure: But the people of Rome, to whom thou art beholden and obliged for thy life, thou shalt perform no greater duty and service than that the example of this day work may be a teaching and warning to thee for ever, to obey, as well in war as in peace, all lawful commands of superior Majesties. After that he had pronounced the pardon of the General of horse and discharged him of the Cour, and was departed himself out of the common place of audience, the Senate joyfull and highly contented, and the people much more, came all about them. And on the one side bidding joy to the General of the horse aforesaid, and on the other side giving thanks to the Dictator, followed after, and accompanied them both: and it was generally thought, that military government was no less confirmed and established by this peril and danger only of young Q. Fabius, then by the late pious execution of young Manilius.

By chance that year so fell out, that as often as the Dictator absented himself from the Army, E to often the enemies rose and railed troubles in Samnium, Howbeit, the fresh example of Q. Fabius was ever in the eye of M. Valerius, Lieutenant General and Governor of the camp, who feared as well the dread wrath of the Dictator, as any violent attempts of his enemies whatsoever. Infomuch, as when purveyours for corn being entrapped by an ambuscue were left, in a place of disadvantage commonly it was thought and believed that they might have been by the Lieutenant relented and saved, but for fear of these rigorous and terrible edicts. For anger hereof, the Dictator sent the hearts of the focondists, who were already malcontent, for that he was so inexorable in the cause of Q. Fabius, and had denied them that, at their intant intreaty, which afterwards he yielded unto and pardoned, at the suit and request of the people of Rome. The Dictator after that he had left for the government of the city L. Papirius Craflus the General of horse, discharged Q. Fabius, and forbidden him to administer any thing by virtue of that office, returned into the camp. Whole coming was neither very welcome and joyful to his own comm ' the focondists, nor yet struck any terror in his enemies the Samnites. For, the nestmorrow, were it, that they knew not that the Dictator was come, or little cared and weighed whether he were present or absent, they approached the camp in order of battel. Howbeit, that one man, L. Papirius, the Dictator was of such valor and importance, that if the love of the focondists hadseconded the policy and fadge conduct of their Commander, the war with Samnites had by that day been quite dispersed and ended, put all adventure, so skillfully he let the battel in array, so warily he chose his ground of advantage, so strengthened he the same with supplies out of the terregard, in all warlike skil and military policy. But the focondists failed for their parts and went coldly to Q their mine's even of purpose that the valiant and commendable parts of the Captain might be disdained and depraved, and the victory was much hindered and impeded. Howbeit, many of the Samnites were slain: and in exchange as many of the Romans butt. But he like a wise and expert Captain, so percieved, what was the cause that stayed the victory. He law well enough, that he was to temper his own nature and to allow that severity of his within midnes and ortefe. And therefore, taking with him the Lieutenants himself in person went about to lift the wounded soldiers, putting his head into their tents searching asking each one how they did; harved the Lieutenants, Colonels, Provost-Marshal's, and other officers of the camp, to tend and look unto.
unto the sick fouldiers, recommending their care unto them particularly by name. This being a thing in it fell popular, he handled and ordered with such dexterity; that by curing their bodies, their minds also and hearts were much sooner gained and reconciled to their General. And nothing made more for the speedy recovery of their health, than their thankful acceptance of that care and diligence of his. When he had thus refreshed and repaired his army, he encountered once again the enemy with asured hope of himself and his fouldiers, to obtain a final victory; and so dispatched and put them to flight, that the Samnites after that day, durst never fight again with the Dictator. Then the victorious army marched, as any hope of booty and pillage guided and directed them; and as they overran their enemies country, they found no force nor resistance, either in open field, or covert ambusc. This also encouraged them the more, and cheered their hearts, for that the Dictator had by proclamation given away the whole spoil among the fouldiers; so that their private gain when them on against their enemies, no less then the common anger and publick quarrel. The Samnites ramed and fubdued by these lofes and overthrowes, sued to the Dictator for peace; with whom they capitulated, and made offer to allow unto every fouldier one livery, and the full wages of one year. But being commanded to go to the Senate, they made answer, That they would accompany the Dictator, recommending and putting their caufe and whole effeet to his faithful protection, to his venue and goodness only. Thus the Army was withdrawn from the Samnites, the Dictator with triumph entered the City: and when he would have resigned up the Dictatorship, the Senate ordained, That before he gave over, he should create Consuls, So C. Sulpicius Longus the second time, and Q. Emilius Lepidus were elected.

The Samnits not having concluded peace, (for that they varied about the conditions, and were to treat farther thereupon) yet brought with them from the City of Rome, truce for a year. Which they observed not faithfully: so soon were their timmacks up again to make war; after they had intelligence, that Papirius was out of government, Whiles C. Sulpicius, and Q. Emilius (or Aulus as some Chronicles have) were Consuls; besides the revolting of the Samnites, there arose a new war also from the Apullians. Both ways was there a power lent, Sulpicius his lot was to go against the Samnites, and Emilius against the Apullians. Some write, that upon the Apullians themselves no war was made, but contrariwise, that the confederate States of that Nation were defended from the violence and wrong of the Samnits. Howbeit, the low estate of the Samnits at that time, I hardly able to maintain and defend themselves, made it more likely and credible, that the Apullians, were not warred upon by them, but that the Romans made war with both Nations at once. But no memorable act or exploit was there performed: only the Apullian country, and Samnium was waited: and the enemies no where at all to be found, but at Rome there happeped a scare by night, which raised every man so suddenly out of their first sleep, and so affrighted the City, that presently at one instant the Capitol and the Castle, the Walls and Gates were full of armed men. And when as from all places, there was running, and crying alarm, the morrow morning at the break of day, there appeared neither author, nor cause of this fear.

The same year the Tufculans were judicially condemned before the people of Rome by process; and that by a law that Flavius preferred. This M. Flavius, Tribun of the Commons, exhibited M a bill of Endiament to the people, that some punishment might be inflicted upon the Tufculans: For that through their afflance and Counsel, the Velliterns and Privenans had taken arms against the people of Rome. The Tufculans with their wives and children referred to Rome. Which multitude having changed their apparel, and clad in poor array and habit, as prisoners at the bar, went about from Tribe to Tribe, falling down upon their knees: to every man. Whereupon, partly prevailed more to obtain pardon of punishment, then the goodness of their caufe to the purging of their guilt. So all the Tribes except Polibus, disarmed and made void the Endiament aforesaid. But the sentence of the Tribe Polibus was, That as many as were of age and undergrown, to wit, fourteen year old and upward, should be scourged and put to death, Item their wives and children, by martial law, should be sold in open port-sale. And for certain it is reported, that N the Tufculans took to keep deep an anger against the authors of this hard and cruel doom, that they have carried it in mind even to our fathers days. For in despite thereof no Candidate, or Competitor for an office of the Tribe Polibus, was ever wont to get the voices of the Tribe Papirius. The year following, whiles Q. Fabius and L. Fabius were Consuls, A. Cornelius Arrius Dictator, and M. Fabius Amphilochus General of horse; having taken a straitersey fouldiers then ordinary, for fear of a greater war in Sannhum (for it was reported that the whole manhood and flower of the youth were taken up and waged out of the countries adjoining) led forth a goodly and puilliant army against the Samnites. But they pitched their camp so carefully in the enemies ground, as if the enemy had been far off: and the Samnites legions came on a sudden so proudly, as they far forward the trench and rampart, and encamped close to the Corps of the Romans. Howebeit the night approached so fast, that they were hindered for affaying the Camp: but they gave it out plainly, they would do it the morrow after by day light. The Dictator seeing that he must fight neeter than he expected or hoped; for fear left the straightsenes and disadvantage of the ground, might prejudice and hinder the valour of his fouldiers, leaving fire-thick burning in the camp, for to disappoint the fire of the enemies, in the still night with silence leadeth for his legions: but yet could he not for the neerness of their camp escape, but be copied of them. The horsemen forthwith followed upon them in the tail, and
A. and prefixed hard upon the army in their march, yet in such sort, that before it was day, they would not light, nay, the very footmen were not all issue out of the camp before day light. At length when it was broad day, the Horsemens adventured to charge upon the Romans, and partly by playing upon the tail of the hindmost, and partly by skirmishing in places that were hard to be passed over, they hindered their march and kept them behind. In the mean while their Infantry also overtook the Cavally, as now the Samnites with all their forces came upon them. The Dictator seeing he could not go farther without his great loss and dilapidation, commanded his men to fortify even in that very place where he stood: but for as much as the light Horsemens of their enemies were overpiped all about, they could not possibly go to provide flake to make a parapet or rampire, nor begin to call a trench. When he perceived therefore that he neither could go forward, nor retire with safety, he removed all his baggage out of the ranges, and let his men in battle array. The enemies do the like, and were not behind either in courage or in forces. But this mott of all heartened and encouraged them, for that they being ignorant that the occasion of the enemies retreat was the disadvantage and / straightness of the place, presumed that they did it upon fear: and therefore they in terrible manner followed after them, as if the Romans had fled and been affrighted. And even that for a good while held the fight in doubtful balance, albeit the Samnites a long time had not been used to abide among as the first shott of the Roman army when they give the charge. But verily that day, from the third hour unto the eight, it is said that the battle stood to equal an indifferent, that neither the shout and cry were redoubled, nor heard the second time, after it was once let up at the first buckling: nor the enigns were let forward, or withdrawn backward, but remained where they were: nor yet of any part were they seen to retire or go back, but every man in his degree and place, bending forward and prefixing with his shield, without breathing or looking back, still fought a front: the same noise one resolution to die or fight it out, and not to give over before utter weariness or dark night. Now began the strength of men to fail, now the Spear point and edge of the sword, began to turn and lose their force, and now the Captains themselves were to seek for counsel and what to do: By what time all at once the Samnites Horsemens hearing that the carriages of the Romans with one only Comet were gone a good way off from the armed fouldiers, without any other guard and fortification: for greediness of spoil let upon them. Which when a messenger in great hail and fear reported to the Dictator: Let them alone (quoth he) let them encumber themselves with the spoil, and spare not. Then came others one after another, windstirs with running, crying out and saying, that all was gone: and that every where where the fouldiers goods were filled, ranicked and carried clean away. Whereupon he sent for the General of Horsemens. See ye not (quoth he) O M. Fabius, the batter abandoned of our enemies Cavally? They stand still and are encumbered and pereird with our carriages. Now therefore charge upon them, disbanded as they are, (which usually happeneth to any multitude, but in pillage) find them you shall (no doubt) few on Horseback, and as few with weapon in hand: and whiles they are lodging their Horses with spoil, kill them unarmed, and make it bloody booty to them, and let them buy it full deely: as for me, let me alone with the charge of the legions and footmen: have you the honour of the Horsemens service. Then the Cavally ranged into a Squadrion, as exquisitely and skillfully as possibly might be, ran forcibly upon the enemies disarrayed and clogged with cavage, beating them down, and making a miserable massacre of them in every place. For being (as they were) among packs and fardels which they catt from them suddenly, and now lay against their feet to stumble on as they fled, and in the Horses way, that were amazed and afraid, they were not able well, either to fly or to fight, and so were slain. When as the enemies Cavally were thus defeated and welter all come to naught, then M. Fabius wheeling about his wings of Horsemens, for to fetch a compass, set upon the Infantry at their backs: Whereupon arose a new fearful cry, which caueth the hearts of the Samnites to tremble and quake. The Dictator withal, seeing the formost of the enemies fighting in the front, looking back ever and anon, their enigns out of order, and all their battalions wavering and sifting to and fro: called hard upon his footmen, and exhorted them to fight heartily; cried unto the Colonels, the Sergeants of Bands and Corporals severally by name, to re-engage and renew the battle again with him. Thus with a fresh and new shout, they advance the Standards, and stirr forward the enigns and the farther they march on, the more perceived they the enemies to be troubled, and dilatory. And now by this time, the Horsemens also were within the fight of the formost in the vanguard: and Cornelian looking back to the bands and companies of his footmen, making sign with hand and with voice as well as he could, thowed and made demonstration unto them that they saw the colours and targets of their own fellow Horsemens. Which when they once heard, and saw withal: presently as if they had forgot the burre which they endured almost a whole day, and felt no heart of their wounds, they bellifed themselves against the enemy as heartily, as if they had newly come out of their rents, and in their heart and keen but now the signal, and heard the sound of trumpet, to a batter. Now were the Samnites no longer able to incite the terror of the Horsemens behind, and the violence of the footmen before: but were either slain in the midst between, or scattered abroad in flight. Such as layed and were environed about, the footmen flew: those who fled were troubled under the Horse feet and killed: among whom the General himself left his body on the earth. This batter above all other, so quelled and daimned the hearts of the Samnites and crushed their forces, that in all their Diets and Counsellcs they mitertered and gave out, That it was no marvel that they they spent so ill, in all their affairs of arms, the quarrel was so bad and ungodly, and the war begun so contrary to a covenant or truce, and having the very Gods, and that justly, more against them and greater enemies than men: and that such a war must needs cost some great overthrow, and might not be expiat without some notable satisfaction. Here only was the difficulty and difference, whether vengeance and punishment should be taken of the guilty blood of a few, or of the guiltier blood of all. And even then, sometime there were, that doubt nominate the very authors of this war. And one specially, to wit, Brutus Papius, whose name was by the common voice and consent heard above all the rest. A noble and mighty man he was, and without question, the principal breaker of this last truce. The Pretors being enforced therefore, to determine as touching him what was to be done; at length decreed, That Brutus Papius should be delivered to the I Romans, and that together with him, all the Roman pillage and their prisoners should be sent to Rome: and that of all the goods, unto which according to the covenant and composition, the Feclials laid claim, there should, according to right and equity, restitution be made. Then were the Heralds, by virtue of the decree, sent to Rome, together with the deads corpses of Brutus: for he to avoid shame and punishment, wilfully killed himself. It was thought good, that with his body all his goods also, should be delivered. Howbeit none of all these things but only the captives, and whatsoever could justly be owned out of the booty, was received: all the rest were offered, but in vain, for nothing was accepted. The Dictator by virtue of an act of the Senat, triumphed. Some write that this war was fought by the Consuls, and that they triumphed over the Samnits: and that Fabius also went forward into Apulia, and from thence brought away K great and rich prizes. But without all controversy, A. Cornel, was Dictator that year: this only was the doubt, whether he were created for the conduct of this war, or at the Roman games (Cerefenes) (because L. Cato was aptly to be grievously grieved) to give the signal when the chariots and fleeds should be set out of the Barriers to run the race for their prize: and that having done that function of a charge (I wis not worth the remembrance) he should leave his Dictator place. It is not an easy thing to prefer either one matter, or one author before another. I suppose rather for my part, that the record and memorial of these matters hath been depraved and corrupt-ed, by these funeral Orations of praiies, and by these counterfeit and false titles of images; whiles every houte and family draweth to it, the honour and renown of noble exploits, martial feats, and dignities, by any untruth and lie, so it be colourable: And hereupon, surely it is, that both the deeds of particular personis, and the publick records and monuments of Acts, are confounded: neither is there extant any one writer, who lived in those dayes, upon whom, as a true and certain author, we might ground, and rest our selves.

The Ninth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Ninth Book.

Titus Livius, and Sp. Pothismius Consuls, having engaged their army so far, within the Gulfe off Bright of Caudium, into a place of great advantage, that they had no means nor hope to get forth again, fell to composition with the Samnits, and compounded with them: and after they had delivered unto them 600 Roman Horfmen for hostages, they went away with the rest of the army, but so, as they were forced all of them to pass shamefully under the gallowes. The same Consuls (even by the N motion of one of them, Sp. Pothismius, who persuaded the Senat, that by rendring of these to the enemys hands, though wholesome and very becoming and insignificant a covenant was concluded, the City might be delivered and discharged of the promise given in the name thereof) with two Tribunes of the Commons, and as many besides as had subscribed to the foresaid accord and agreement, were sent and sended to the Samnits: but they might not be received. Not long after, Papius surnamed Cornes, disse, and put them likewise under the gallowes: and recovered against those 600 Roman Horfmen aforesaid, that were left for hostages. By which means, the shame and disgrace of the former fossef, Act was cancelled and abolished. Two Tribes were added to the rest, Liticinana and Faliteria. New inhabitants were sent to people Suella and Pontix. Ap. Claudius being Cornes, brought a chace of water to the City, called of his name Claudia: and proved the high way, named after him likewise, Appia. He O admired also into the range of Senators the son of Libertins. But for such as this state and degree of Citizens, seemed as it were polluted with these unworthy persons among them, the Consul of the year following, in the review of the Senators, and chufing new, held themselves to the order that other Cornes next before had observed. This book containeth moreover the proper works against the Apuliens, Tafcans, Umbrians, Maritians, Pelignians, Aequians, and Samnits: with whom was renueed the ancient league and amity. Flavius the scribe or notary, the son of a Libertin or unenfranchis Roman, was made Adile Curnile, by the sallion of the base common people. Which sallion, because it troubled and disquieted
The Ninth Book of T. Livius.

After this year, immediately followed the peace made at Cannae, so memorable for the Roman fools and misfortune, which happened in the Consulship of T. Vatinius Calvinius, and S. Poffinius. During which, the Samnites had for their General Conductor, C. Pontius, the son of Herennius a most prudent and politic father, and was himself a worthy warrior, and a most excellent Captain. This Pontius, after the Embassadors aforesaid (who had been sent to yeild and deliver the goods) were returned home without peace concluded, spake thus in a frequent assembly of the Samnites, and said: "Makers and friends, think never, but good there hath been in this voyage; and our Embassage hath taken some effect, for look what wrath the Gods in Heaven conceived against us, by our breach of covenant and truce, is thereby wholly satisfied, and duly done away. This I know assuredly, that the Gods above (whose pleasure it was, that we should be driven to this necrot point and hard exigent, as to render the goods claimed of us, by virtue of an accord and covenant) were nothing concerned and pleased, that this our satisfaction and recompence for the breach thereof, was so proudly and disdainfully deploied and rejected of the Romans. For what could possibly have been done more, either to pacify the Gods, or to appease men, than that which we offered and performed? Whatever we won by way of hostility and spoil, from our enemies, and which by right of war seemed to be ours, we went back again: the counsellors and persuaders of taking arms, because we could not send alive, we delivered dead as they were: and their very goods also (be able nothing might remain with us, to bring us within the compass of their guiltiness,) we brought to Rome. What ov I more to thee O Romans? what am I bound to perform besides, in regard either of covenant, or of the Gods, the judges of the covenant? Whom shall I chuse and take for an indifferent arbitrate between thine anger and my punishment? No State D body and person in general, no private person in particular do I retaine: and if no equity and reason for the poor and needy, be reserved amongst men against the greater and more mighty, yet fill we I, and have recourse to the Gods; the Revengers of such intolerable pride: and I will pray them to turn their anger upon those, whom neither restitution of their own goods, nor the rending of other mens without to boast, will serve and content: whole hell cruelty, neither the deaths of the guilty persons, nor the delivery of dead bodies, neither the owners themselves yielded, nor all they had in the World rendered with them, can satisfie: briefly, who may not possibly be appeas'd, without we should part with our heart blood unto them for to drink, and give our bowels and entrails to be torn in pieces. The war (O Samnites) is put and right on their behalfe, who have no way and means to avoid it: and ever lawfully take them arms, who E have no other hope, but in force of arms. Since then, in all the affairs of this World, nothing is of more importance than this, That men weigh and consider, whether the Gods be gracious or advers to unto their enterprises: be sure of this, that as we made our former war not to much against men as the Gods; so, we shall fight that which is now in hand, in the name of the Gods, and under their conduct and guidance. Having spoken by way of Prophecy these words, (which as they were right pleasant and plausible in the hearing, to they proved as true and were verified in the successes ensuing) he lead forth an army into the field, and about Cannae he encamp'd himself, as conqueror as he could. From thence he sent home to *Caecilia (where he heard that the Roman Consuls and their forces lay in camp,) ten soldiery disdained in the habift of Hardmen, and commanded them to keep their cattell grazing apart, some in one place and some in another, but never far from the Romans forts and guards: with this instruction, That when they hapned upon any of the Roman foragers and victuallers, they should agree all in one tale, and say, That the Samnite legions were in Apulia, besieging Laceria with all their forces, and were at the point of winning it by a man's. This rumour also was on purpose by others before, let abroad and spread yea, and came to the Romans ears: but these capives made it sound more credible and like to be true, for this especialy, that all their words agree one with another. No man doubted but that the Romans would aid the Lacerins, their good and faithful Allies, and the rather for fear left all Apulia would upon this present trouble and fearful example revolve, and band with the Samnites: and the only thing they stood upon was this, Which way to go unto them. For twain there were leading to Laceria the one head and open along the coast of the Adriatic Sea: but as it was the last, it was the farther about. Another shorter cut there was through the heights or gulley of *Cannoon called *Præstna Cannone. But the natural situation of the place is thus: There are two deep, narrow, and woody passes, of dales, one in the tail of the other, with continual crests and ridges of hills round about them: between them lieth enclosed in the midle, a good large plain or meadow: green of grass and flood of waters, through the midst wherein, there lieth a direct passage. But before ye come to that green, ye must enter into that flat freight aforesaid, and return again either the same way that ye went in, or if ye proceed to go forward, ye must pass through another such pass or freight, but narrower and

*Stradone allep. or il fago di S. Maria, and Pelle di Garlone, more more cumb'ome than the other. Into that plain aforesaid the Romans marched down with their army another way, through and hollow rock, but when they went on forth to the other freight valley, they found it flopped and made up with the fall of trees, one cross over another, and likewise with a huge heap of mighty stones, laid full against them in the way. And they had not soon discovered this guileful practice of their enemies, but they might decry withal, a power of them also on the top of the Hill. Then with all speed they seek to go back again the same way they came: but if they found also dammed up in like sort, and better with armed men. Whereupon they made a stand, without any mans commandment: and as their minds were all amazed and attainted, so their bodies also were possetted as it were with a strange and extraordinary nummedness in their limbs: and whilst they looked one upon another, each man thinking his fellow to be more witty, and have better understanding than himself: for a good while they stood still, and laid not a word. But afterwards, when as they saw the two Consuls pavilions a sitting up, and some making ready things necessary to fortification; although they saw well enough, that in this desperate case, pait all hope of recovery, for all the defences they could devise, they should but lose their time and travel and prove tools in the end: yet nevertheless, because they would not seem to encreace their diffireased fortune, and double it with their own default and negligence, every man what he could, to his power, without the direction of any leader, setted himself to work, and to fortify along the water side their camp, with a trench and rampier. And besides the insolent and proud scottion and derision of their enemies, every man with pitifull confession scorned and checked his own work and travel, as vain, and to no purpose. As the Consuls K then were penive and discomforted, and called none about them to counsel, (for that indeed they supposed they were past all advice and help) the Lieutenants and Colonels came unto them of their selves unient for, and the foildiers turning to the Praeatorium or Consul: Quarter, cried to their Captains for help and succour, which hardly the very immortal Gods could afford and give them, but, rather made their moans and complaints one to another of their misfortune, than for in rage counsel to give or take advice; until the night came upon them: whilst each man according to his natural humour and fancy, muttered differently. "One said, let us break through "the stoppages opposed against us in the way: another, let us pas over the mountains and "woods before us, what way forever we may be able to carry armour: so for we get to the enemy once, when we have acompt for these thirty years vanquished and chased before us: all will L be plain, even and early unto us Romans fighting against their faithless, perjured, and disloy-d Samnits. Tush, faith another, whither should we go, or which way? What? Are we about to "remove mountains out of their places? So long as these tops of Hills are over our heads, how "will you possibly come to the enemy? Armed or unarmed, contours or cowards, is all one, entrapped we are and undone every one. Our enemy will not so much as offer as the sword, "whereon we may dye like men with honor: he will fit still and end this war. Thus pasid words to and fro. and thus pasid the night away: unmindful were they of taking repose, not thought they of taking repose and sleep. The Samnits on the other side, in this tofortunate and happy op-pportunity presented unto them, were as much to feck what to do, and what course to chuse and follow. Whereupon, they all in general were to dispass letters to Herennius Postumus, the fa-M ther of their General, and to know his opinion. Now this man beforehand by reason of his great age, had given over not only Military affairs, but also all civil busineses: howbeit in that old crafi and spent body of his, he bare the fresh vigour of mind and a pregnant wit to give coun-fell. When he understood that the Romans army was shut up fast within the two forrests, at the Caudine Gulches, and that his advice was asked by his sons messenger: he gave presently this counsel, That with all speed they should be let go from thence every one, without any harm at all done unto them. Which opinion of his being rejected [of his son the army] his mind was demanded a second time, by the same curier first again unto him of purpose, and then he gave advice, that they should be all killed, and not one left alive. Upon which answers so far disagreeing, and thus delivered, as it were out of a doubtful Oracle: albeit his son himself N imagined, of all others most, that his fathers wit was in the wane, and aged as well as his fee-bale warked body: yet by a general consent of all he was overcome, to send for him in person for to declare his meaning by word of mouth. Neither thought the old man much thereof, but was brought (by report) to the camp in a chariot: and being called to counsel, he was in the same tale still, so as he nothing changed of his former advice; but allagued only causes and reasons thereof. Namely, that in his former resolution (which he took to be simply the best) "his meaning was, by a singular benefice and good turn, to confirm peace and amity for ever, "with a most mighty and puitant people: in the second his purpose was, by the utter loose of "two armies, whereby the State of Rome would not easily recover their strength again, to defer "the wars for many a year. And as for a third counsel, he had none at all. When his son and O other chief Captains, by questioning inquired of him, what if a middle couuue between both were taken; namely, to diimi them failing, and according to the Law of arms and conquest to impose upon them, hard Laws and Conditions? Mary (quoth he) this is the way indeed, that "neither winneth you friends, nor yet riddeth you of your foes: save them whom ye have pro-oked with flame and disgrace; and fee what ye get thereby. The Romans are ofthis nature, "that they cannot be still and quiet so long as they have the worse; it will never dye in their "hearts, but will be always fresh whatsoever flame this present extremity that brand them with; "and

A "and never will I give them any rest, before they have been by manifold and fundry wayes recon ged of you. So his advice was not accepted, neither the one nor the other, and old Heremius was carried home again from the camp. The Romans likewise in the camp, after many attempts (but all in vain) for to break forth and escape away, being now in great penury and fear. So all things, for no necessity were driven to send Embassadors unto the enemies: who first should crave an equal and indifferent peace: and if they might not obtain it, then to bid defiance and challenge them to a battle. Ponzius made answer, that there was no calling of battle; for that the field was won already: and because they being vanquished, and as good as taken captive, knew not how to come down and confide their poor estate: he gave them to understand, that he would put them under the gallows, defoil their armour, and strip into their shirts; and as for other conditions of peace, they should be such, as were mean to put between men conquered, and conquerors: namely, if they would depart out of the Sannites country, withdraw their colony, and to both Sannit and Roman in equal alliance live under their own laws and ordinances:

upon these Articles and Capitalizations, he was content to come to some point of accord with the Consuls. If any of these covenants did like them then he forbid the Embassadors to repair again to him any more, but at their peril. When relation of this answer was made in the camp, there arose suddenly such a fighting and groaning amongst them all, and to great peniveness and anguish of heart, upon them, that it seemed they could not have taken it more heavily, and to the hears, it was very much brought that they must all have died in the peace. After long silence, when as the Consuls will not how to open their mouth: either for the accord and composition

C to shamefull, or against it so necessary: then L. Lentulus, who as well in regard of his vter, as of his dignities, was chief of all the Lieutenants, said: "I have heard my father (quoth he) O ye Consuls, oftentimes make report, that he was the only man in the Capitol, who perused the Senate, not to rendem and redeem with gold, the City from the hands of the Gauls: at what time as they were not inclined either with trench or rampier by their enemies, (a Notion to lay a truth, of all others mort lide in inch works, and fortifications) but might have broken through them, if not without great danger, yet without evident ruin, and allured definition.

Were the case so now, that as they then, being armed might have run down out of the Capitol upon their enemies under them (in which fort oftentimes the besieged have fallen upon upon them that lay in siege) so we might but fight with our enemies in any place (it sketched not

D good or bad even or uneven: I would not in giving counsel be any jot behind my father in cour-rage and valor. For I contes verily that to die for our country is a brave death: and for my part, ready am I even to offer my body as a sacrific to prevent death yea, and it were to engage my self among the thickest of my enemies thereby to save the people of Rome and the legions:

But alas! here I see my country, here lies all the Roman Regiments and Legions that are, who unles for their own selves they will run upon their death, what have they elie to save by their depth? Why, will they manly, the houses and buildings of the City, the walls, and that mulitude that inhabit the City, Nay rather, if this my fortune here to miliarly, they are all clean betrayed into the enemies hand and not saved. For whom shall defend them? Peradventure, the weak and unarmid multitude: even as well larks as they defended it against the violence of the E Gauls: Or, will they send for an army from Thessali, and becheel the help again of Captain Camillus?

Even the one as well as the other. But here in this place is out whole hope, here is all our power and puline: in saving it we preserve our country; in offering it to die we abandon and betray our country. To yield and render our selves, is a foul and shamefull thing: true, but I think it the love of our Country, that we ought to preserve it as well with our utter flame, if need require, as by our death. Let us undergo then, and abide this shameful indignity whatsoever, and obey that fatal necessitie, which the very Gods themselves cannot overcome. Go to them, Consuls, a Gods name, redeem the City with your armor and weapons, which your fore-fathers ransomed with their gold. Then went the Consuls to Luuentius to parle. And when as he began like a conqueror to debate about the capitulations of Covenants, they denied plainly

F that any league could be made, without the privicy, will and authority of the whole people: not without the Fealias, and other solemn and usual Ceremonies. So that this Caudine accord was not (as commonly it is believed, and as Claudins also wrote.) concluded by form of absolute covenant, but by way of stipulation and promis. For what needed either ratificies in a perfect agreement and league, or hoitages to be given when the matter is plified by this form of prayer, by whole default it hapned that the conditions agreed were not fulfilled, that people Jupiter would so finit as the fames there was by the ferial fature? The Coll. Lieutenants, Treasurers and Colnels, who undertook as sureties, subscribed and signed; and the names yet are extant of them all: where, if the matter had plified by way of an absolute league there shou'd have been subcribed no more but the names of the Fealias only. Moreover, by reason that the corification

G this accord was of necessity de'red, there were required also two hostmen hostages, who should take their heads, in case the covenants of the accord were not observed. And thereupon was the time appointed and let down of delivering the said hostages, and yielding the army without their armor. Now the coming of the Gauls renewed again the froward in the camp, that hardly they could hold their hands from their, through whole rash conduct they were come to that place of disadvantage: and through whole cowardly they were to depart from there more shamefully than they came: complaining that they had not to much as a guide to direct them, nor an epistle to discover the coats: but like beasts were driven blinded into a trap or H pitfall: and one looked upon another: beholding the armor that within a while they were to deliver up, viewing their right hands, which anon should be unarmed, their naked bodies exposed to the mercy and devotion of the enemy. They let before their eyes, the gallowes prepared by the enemy for them to pass under, the cornes and reproachful taunts of the Victor, his proud and disdainful looks, and how they (disarmed) should pass in a long train and go through the armed enemies: then afterwards, the piteous spectacle of the way which they must go, and the shameful dismarch of their disarmed army: briefly, their soul and dishonourable return through the Cities of their allies unto their country and parents, whether they themselves and their ancestors oftetimes had gone in triumph. They were the only men, which without wound, without dint of weapon, without battle fought, were discomfited and vanquished: who might not so much as draw their sword, and never came to joy or encounter with their enemy; having armour, having strength of limb, having hearts given them in vain. As they brayed out with great discontentment and anguish, these words, the fatal hour of their reproach and shame was come: which by proof and sensible experience, was to make all matters more heavy and woul, than they conceived and imagined in their minds aforehand. First and foremost were they commanded all, to go forth without the trench disarmed, and in their tangle garments; then were the holocausts presently delivered, and had to ward: after this, were the Serjeants and Officers willed to depart from the Confuls: whose rich coats of arms, when they were plucked from their shoulders, moved such pity and compassion even in them, who a while before with all cursing and bannings, judged them worthy to be delivered bound hand and foot into their enemies hands, for to be mangled distempered and cut in pieces: that every man forgetting his own estate, wherein he stood, turned away his eyes, as it were from an abominable spectacle, and could not induce to behold that disgracing and disfigguring of so great State and Majesty. The first that were put under the gallowes, were the Coss, wel-nee, half naked: and according to their degree and place, so was every one in order put to the shame: and afterward, the legions one after another. The enemies in their armor stood at the while about them scorning mocking, and making a game of them: many had swords and daggers set against their hearts, in menacing wife, some were hark and flabbed to death: namely, such as with stern countenance and grim looks above the rest, for the indignity of these things, offended the conqueror. Thus were they sent with shame enough under the gallowes, and (that was L more grievous than the thing) even in the sight and view of their enemies. they were not so soon got out of the forest, but although they seemed but then as plucked out of dark hell to see the day, yet the very light it fell was worse than all kind of deaths, when they beheld so ill favoured an army and uneamfully. And therefore, albeit they might have reached to Capua before night, yet being doubtful of the faithfulness and protection of their allies, or else dismayed for very shame, they cast their poor and filty bodies upon the ground, about the high ways not far from Capua. Whereof, when news came to Capua, the just and due pity which they took of their allies, overcame the imbred arrogancy and pride of that people by kind, Immediately they sent unto the Coss, the ensigns and ornaments belonging to their place of authority, the lictors and Serjeants with their rods they sent armor and Horse apparel; and also alo for the fouldiers bountifully: and as they came near to Capua, the whole Senat and people went out to meet them, and performed all duties of kindnes and hospitality both privat and publick, that could be devised, and as meet was and requisite. And yet neither the courteous usage, nor the pleasant countenances and lightsome speeches of their ali-lies, could draw from them any words, no, nor so much as make them to hold up their heads and eyes, and to look again upon their friends, when they yeelded them at these comforts they could,

So as besides their grief and sorrow of hearts, a certain balefulness and flame forced them to thin all communication and conversing with men. The morrow after, when as certain young Gentlemen of the Nobility were returned, who had been sent in convoy from Capua, to accompany them and bring them on their way, as far as their liberties and confines: they were sent for into the Senate house, and being demanded by the ancients and elders, what news: they reported, that they N seemed unto them much more heavy and cast down than before, so silent and in manner dumb, they marched along: that noble mind and courage of the Romans was now mute and mumm their hearts clean done and gone together with their arms, not able toger again, no, nor to give a word to those that faileth them, not one of them for fear able to open his mouth, as if till they were that yoke and gallows upon their necks, under which they went. That the Samnites had indeed not only a brave victory, but also a perpetual over them, and the hand of them for ever: and had now won not Rome, as the Gauls aforesaiue, but also (which was a more hardy and warlike exploit) had conquered the Romans courage, stoutness, and valour. As these news were reported, and audience given thereto, with such affent, that every man lamented now the Roman name, as desperat: and concluded generally it was in the counsel of these their faithful confederates, that they were past recovery: one Oeffia Celsonis, the son of Onias, a man right nobly born, renowned for his valiant acts, and besides, very grave and reverend for his age, spoke by report in this manner and said: That he took the matter far otherwisethan they all did: for that stubbon and resolute silence, (qd. he) the eyes fastened so wildly on the earth, those dealers to admirall foliage and comfort, that flame of theirs to look up and behold the light, were expresse and certain tokens of them that toiled and rolled from the very root and bottom of their heart, a huge herd and mass of anger & despite, Either (qd. he) I know not the nature of the Romans, or else that flinnes & silence will will shortly cost the Samnites, woful cries and doeful groans; and the remembrance of this Caudinum accord, will be more heavy and dolorous a good deal to the Samnites than to the Romans: for, as for them, they will every man find their hearts and courage again, whereover they shall hap to encounter: but the Samnites shall not meet every where with the Caudinum. The ninth Book of T. Livius. 259 and now by this time was this shameful overthrow and disgrace known at Rome, Intelligence they had before, how they were beaten and enclosed about: but afterwards arrived a messenger with news more heavy and forrowful for that ignominious peace, than for any peril and danger otherwise. At the first noise and brut that they were besieged, they began to mutter: but after they heard, they had so shamefully yielded themselves, all that preparation of aid and facror was dishearted and sent away; and prefently without any order from publick authority, they gave themselves every one to all manner of mourning and lamentation. The shops all about the market place were shut up. A general vacation began of itself, and pleading in all courts ceased, before Proclamation made: the purple and scarlet robes were left off, the golden rings laid away, and the whole City in a manner more forrowful and heavy, than the very army. Neither were they angry and offended with the Captains only, with the authors of the peace with the cautions and incres for the faire; but hated also the guiltlesse soldiery, denying fently, that they were worthy to be received into City or house. Which heat of fiamock and wrathfull indignation, the first arrival of the army, utterly alloy'd; which even to angry perions was pitifull and lamentable. For they returnd not as men that escaped fälle, alive, and unclothd for into their country, like captoies in habit and countenance: they entered late into the Town, and hid their heads, every man within his own house: so as the morrow after, and for certain dayes following, none of them would come into the market place, nor put his head out at dores to look into the streets. The Consuls likewise for their part, kept in, as privat men, and would exercise no function pertaining to their charge, but only that which they were forced into by an act of the Senat: namely, to nominate a Dictator for to be President at the Election of Consuls. So, they elected Q. Fabius Ambusius for Dictator, and P. Aelius Panni, General of Horie, Who being wrong creat, and without the approbation of the Auiictors, there were chosen in their room, M. Ansilius Pappus for Dictator, and L. Falerius Plaetus General of the Horicmen, and yet by them was not the interregnum holden for the Election abovefail'd. And forasmuch as the people were even weary again of all that years Magistrats, as unlucky and unfortunate, it grew at length to an interregn. So Interregni there were, Q. Fabius Maximus, and M. V. Marcius Corvinus, who created Consuls, Q. Publius Philo, and L. Pappus Corv for the second time; with the whole content, no doubt, of the City, for that in those dayes there were not two more noble and renowned Captains to be found.

Thee fame day they were creat, they eneterd their Magistraty (for to the I.L. of the Counsell had decreed:) and after certain solemn and ordinary acts of the Senat past, they went in hand to contoht about the treaty of the Caudine peace. And Publius, whole content it was then to have the soveraigny of rule, "Speak (quoth he) Sp. Poibhumus, to the matter propounded, and let us hear your opinion, and what you can say. Who alter he was ril'en and stood up, with the very same countenance and cheer that he went under the gallows: I am not (quoth he) O ye Consuls, ignorant, that I am first called forth, not for honour, but to my disgrace; and commanded to speak, nor as a Senate and Councillor, but as a man culpable and accursed, both for an unfortunate war administered, and an shamefull peace concluded. However, seeing that ye have not propounded and toucht ought, concerning our trepious or our punishment, (setting apart kind of excite and defence, which would be no very hard matter to maintain, before men that are not ignorant of humane fortune, and of necessities, wheroeto men be driven) I will in brief deliver my mind concerning that, which you have moved and propounded. Which lenience of mine may sufficiently witness and teftify, whether I meant to spare mine own life, or save your regiohs, when as I became bound to that dishonest or necetyfull stipulation and promise, call it whether ye will. And yet, seeming it was made without the peoples privity and grant, the State of Rome is not obliged theero, and thereby nothing due to the Samnits, but only our bare bodies. Let us therefore be rendered by the hands of the Faciales and Herals, in our shirts, and fast bound: let us deliver and rid the people of all scruple and trouble of conscience, if we have enraged them with any; that there be no let in Law of God or man, but that both justly and lawfully ye may begin the war anew. In the mean while my mind and advice is, that the Consuls levy, enrol, anne, and lead forth an army: but not to enter within the enemies marches, before all things only belonging to the delivery of us into their hands, be fully accomplished. Now, I pray and beleeeh ye, O immortal Gods, that seeing it was not your good will and pleasure, that Sp. Poibhumus and T. Ventun Consuls, should with fortunate conduct fight against the Samnitics, yet ye would be satisfied herewith. That ye beheld us put under the gallowes; that ye saw us obliged in an infamous and shamefull bond of covenance; that ye now view us naked and delivered bound into the enemies hands: ready to receive upon our heads even with the loss of our lives, all their anger, malice, and designd; that it would please you that the new Consuls and Legions of the Romans, may in that later war with the Samnites, as everywhere the wars before us Consuls have been conducted, managed and performed. When he had spoked these words, all men both so wondred at this man and pitied him too, that one while they would not believe he was the name Sp. Poibhumus, who had moved and persuaded the fouf foul and dishonest a treaty of peace: otherwise they lamanted that to brave and noble a person, should suffer any especial torment above other, at the enemies hands, for anger and despite of reverting and breach of that accord. When as now they all alter singular prates of the man, condescended to his opinion: the Tribuns of the Com. L. Livius and Q. M. lius, attempted for a while to oppose themselves against this proceeding: saying, "That neither the people could be acquit and soiled in conscience, by their delivery, unless every thing were again restored to the Samnites in the same estate wherein they stood at Cardusio nor they themselves (in that they subscribed and became bound for the accord of peace, to save the hoft of the people of Rome) had deferred any punishment: nor yet, latt of all, ought they being laced Magistrats and inviolable, to be yeilded to the enemies, and exposed to any outrage and violence. Then (quoth Posthumius) in the mean while deliver us up that are but lay and profane men, with whom I have conscience and without offence ye may. And as for thefe, I facro-fainct that now they be, ye shall hereafter render them likewise, even as soon as they are out of their charge. But ye will be ruin'd by me, let them before they be thus yeelled, here in this common Hal be whipped and foure, for the utity and interest of their punishment, which they would seem to defer and put off to long. For whereas they allgede and say, That by the delivery and yeelding of us, the peoples consciences cannot be cleared and soiled; who is under the Tectules and Heralds law, that knoweth not that these men make this, for this end rather, that they themselves might not be bended, than for that the truth requirath fo. Neither do I deny my Lords, that there promises and stipulations are inviolable, and to be kept as well as covenants and obligations with thole men, among whom both Religion to Godward, and faithfulness to men is in regard and K estimation; but I deny again, that without the peoples affent and grant, any thing can be establisht good and effectual, to bind the people thenceunto. What if the Samnites, in the same pride and inoffencely, where they had ordered and forced upon us this stipulation, yea, and wrong it from us, would also have urged us to utter and speak, the solemnum of words, which they use to do that surrender up Cityes: would ye (my Maiters that are Tribuns) inter and lay, that by venture thereof the people of Rome is surrenderd into their hands? and that this City, with the Temples, Chappells, Limits and Waters, by strength thereof, are the Samnits possession? Well, I let pass to speak of dedication, because the matter in question is touching only a stipulation, What, I pray you, if we had promised and undertook, that the people of Rome should forfake and abandon this City? or let fire on it? or not have Magistrats, Senats, or laws any longer? or Lord to be governed again by Kings? God forbid and deny that, fay you. Well, it is not the indignity of things, that cail eth the bond of Stipulation. If there be any one cafe, wherein the people may be obliged then in truth may they be in all was: neither skillett it any when, (whereas haply some will make a stay, and think it is material) whether Conul, Dictator, or Pretor, enter into bond and become surety. And even this it was, that the Samnits themselves judged fo to be, and stood upon: thinking it not sufficient, that the Conuls became bound, but they put the Lieutenants the Trifforers, and the Colonies there, to the same. And now, let no man demand of me, why I entred into stipulation, being a thing not in incident to the Conuls charge and right, neither was I to undertake into them peace, which was not in my power to effect: nor in your name to promise it, from whom I had no commiss and warrant. Certainly my Lords M and Senators, there was nothing at Cardusio done at all by mans policy and counsel. The immortal Gods bereft both your Generals and the enemies too, of all their fenie and understanding: for neither we, in the conduct and ordering of our service, stood warily enough upon our good guard: and they again, as they get the victory full bade, so they lost it as lewdly: whilst they hardly trusted the strength of those places, by means of which they had gained the vantage and better hand of us: and while they made such effect, upon what agreement they cared not, to disarm men that are born martial, and naturally made for wars. For, if they had been in their right wits, what an hard matter was it for them in the time that they sent for old aged men from their home, to come to Counsell, for to have dispatched their Embassadors to Rome? and so to have dealt and treated with the Senate and people about a perfect peace and final league indeed? It had been but three days journey for men not encumbered, but lightly appointed. All that mean while there might have been truce until the Embeassador from Rome, had brought them either certain victory or asured peace. For that had been a covenant and stipulation good in law, which the we should have agreed unto by warrant of the peoples will and approbation. But ye would never have granted and allowed it: no more should we have entered into any such stipulation. Neither was it Gods will and providence: that there should be any other issue and end of things than this: that both they should vainly be deluded, and feed themselves as it were, with the fancy of a more joyful dream than their minds could well conceive and apprehend: and also that the same fortune, which had entangled, shatred and brought into danger our army, should relieve the fame, and rid it again out of peril that as their victory was frivolous and vain, if a vainer and more frivolous peace, should make it truer and worth nothing: and that such a stipulation and promise should be interpoled and come between, which might oblige and bind no person, but the very makers themselves. For what dealing hath there been with you my Lords of the Senate? or with the people of Rome? Who can challenge you? Who can call you into question? Who can come forth and complain that he is by you deceived? Enemy, or Citizen? To enemy ye have past no promise: Citizen to undertake for you and in your name, ye command commanded none. Therefore ye have nothing to do to meddle with us, to whom ye gave nought in charge: and with the Samnites as little, with whom ye had no treaty at all. To the Samnites, we are sufficient pledges enough, and answerable to perform that which is our own: for that, I say, which we are able to make good and yield; even our bodies and lives: upon these let them exercise their rage, upon these let them whose swords and their upright malice. And as for the Tribunes of Commons, consult ye together, whether they may be rendered presently, or ought to be referred and put off to another day: let us in the mean time (O Victorius, and ye that are the reft,) offer these wretched heads and lives of ours, like captives to discharge our bond, and by our punishment and execution, deliver and let free the Roman army.

Both the cause it felt, and the Advocate also, moved the Lords of the Senate: and wrought so much not only with the reft, but also with the Tribunes themselves of Commons: that they promised to be at the Consuls ordering and appointment. Whereupon immediately they gave up their offices, and were delivered into the Fecials hands with the other, to be led all, to _Caudium_. There was not to loo an act of the Senate passed herof, but it seemed that the very light and rays of the Sun shone upon the City again. _Pophanium_ was in every man his mouth, him they prayed and exorted to the heavens: comparing him with the voluntary offering of _P. Decius_, the Fecials for the safety of the army, and other worthy and noble acts of others: Saying, that by his overtaking, by his means and travel, the City was delivered from a servile, dishonourable and underhanded peace. He (lay they) hath offered himself to all the torments, anger, and vengeance of the enemies, and made full satisfaction thereby for the people of _Rome_. Nothing now but war, war:

Alarm, now cried every man: and, oh, that ever they might see the day, to encounter once again with the Samnites, in their armour and with weapon in hand. So, whilst the City was thus insulted and boistered with hateful ire and indignation, there was an army levied, well near all of Volunteers. New legions were mustred and enrolled again out of the fame footsolders, and a sufficient army let forth to _Caudium_. The Fecials marched before, and when they were come to the gate of the City, commanded the Senators, such as had subscribed and signed the accord aforesaid, to be debaupued and stript out of their cloths, and their hands to be pinioned behind him. And when the Lictor or Serjeant, for very reverence of Majesty in _Pophanium_ his person, bound him at large and at ease, Why dost not thou (quoth he) draw and pull the cord firethrest, that the rendering and delivery of us may be according to law and as it ought to be, and not fault to be found with? Afterwards, when they were come into the assembly of the Samnites, and before the Tribunal judgment (ea: _Pontius_, _A. Cornelius Arvina_ one of the Fecials or Heralds thus spake: For much as these persons, without commandment and commission from the Senators and people of _Rome_, have undertaken by stipulation, That there shall a league and peace be made with you: and in doing have offended and trespassed against the State, therefore, to the end, that the people of _Rome_ might be freed and spoiled from a detestable and heinous offence. Here I deliver and ye to unto you, the said men. No sooner had he uttered these words, but _Pophanium_ with his knee more the Fecial his high, with all the might he could: and with a loud voice said, That he being now a Samnite citizen, and the other an Embassador or an Herald of the people of _Rome_; had against the Law of Nations injured him and offered him the abate: whereby the Romans might more justly make war. Then quoth _Pontius_. This delivery either will I accept of and admit, either shall the Samnites hold it good and lawful, But why doth not thou _Sp. Pophanium_, if thou believe there be any Gods, either undo and cancel all, or stand to thy bargain and covenant? For by right either are they all due unto the Samnites, whom they once had in their power; or else peace, in lieu of them. But why speak I thus, and challenge you, who dost yeild thyself again prisoner to the conqueror as faithfully and loyally as thou canst? The people of _Rome_ I challenge, who, if they repent of the promisc and bargain made at the firesights of _Caudium_, let them bring again the Legions into that gutler, wherein they were environed, enclosed, and compassed. Let no man deceive and delude other. Let all be undone again, and every thing as it was: let them take again their armour: by which covenant they yeelded up: let them return into their own camp, and have whatsoever they had the day before the Parle. Then let them place themselves with war, with valiant and magnumenous deeds: refere this then, and spare not all covenant: reject then all treachery of peace. Let us have the fame fortune, the fame opportunity and vantage of the places, which we had before the mention of peace: and to make war, and true the issue. So shall neither the people of _Rome_, blame the Consuls stipulation, nor we find any lack and default in the faithfulness of the people of _Rome_. And will ye never have done, but always find fracts and excuses, and not hand to your covenants, when ye are overcome, and have the worke of your enemies? Ye gave sometimes hostages to King _Porfonius_ and when ye had done, afterwards stole them away. For a sum of gold you bought again your _City of th_ Gauls: and as they were receiving the same, gold, imdered they were by you and bawn in pieces. Peace ye have covenanted with us upon condition that we should restore again your_ legions unto you: that peace ye cancel and make void: and even more ye let some colour of right upon your_ council: and fraudulent dealing: Well, alloweth not the people of _Rome_ of the laying of their Legions, by a dishonorable and shamefull peace? Say it is so. Let peace go whether it will: but give you again to the Victor your Legions: captivity. Is this your faithful dealing? are these your covenants, ceremonies of Fecials & Heralds?
E "raids? that then, according to the agreement and accord, should have that desire of thine. H "even so many citizens lives saved? and I not have the peace (which by letting mine hold go un- "to thee an enemy) I bargained for? What Julies is this, that thou O Tribune, and yet that are "heralds, pretend to Nations abroad? Nay se, neither will accept of these persons whom "ye make a flew to deliver neither can I believe, that they are yeilded in verty and good earnet. N " Nay, I pafs not at all, whether they return again into that City, which is obliged by a convenant "made, attended upon with the wrath and displeasure of all the Gods, whose heaine power "and deit is thus deduced. Now go and make war, seeing that, Sp. Posthumius crewile while, and "and pulled an Emmissary herald with his knee; and so the Gods will believe no doubt, that "Posthumius is a Samnite citizen, and no Roman; and that by a Samnite, an Roman Emmissary hath I "been abided: and thereupon you may take a just occasion and good quarrel to make war upon "upon us. Are you not lathamed, and bafh you not toe broach and ter abroad, in the view and "face of the world, fuch mockeries of Religion? What? old and ancient grave personages, and "such as have been Consuls, to feck fuch fufcite devices (not fit for very children and babeto "play with) and all to shift off and falsify their promife made by convenant. Go Liefs, loose the "Romans of their bands: and no man to hardy as to flay them, but that they may depart when "they will at their own pleasure. So they, that have perhapes discharged the publick fidelity, "or at leafe quit themselves undoubtedly of their own, returned from Caudium, unhurt, to "the Roman camp.

The Samnits seeing that in liuen of a proud and unreasonable peace, there was a moft cruel war K new sprung up again, not only forcaft and apprehended in their minds, but well neer saw evid- "ently with their eyes, all that ever ensued after. Then, all too late and in vain, God wet, they "praised the two-fold counel of old Pontius: and how they taking the middle way between, were "decreed & had exchanged the certain pellection of victory, for an uncertain and doubtful peace; "and having lori the opportunity both of gratifying the Romans, or doing them harm any more, "were now to fight & wage war with them, whom they might either have disabled for being hurt- "ful enemies, or made their faith and affured friends forever. And do without any weakening of "their power and forces of either side by battle, their hearts after this Caudine peace were fo "changed, that Posthumius by his voluntary yeelding was more honored among the Romans, than "Pontius his bloodyes victory among the Samnits: and the Romans made this rekening, that L "the possibility of making war was to them as much as undoubted victory : and the Samnits believed verily, that the Romans had at once made war again and got the upper- "hand.

Whiles these things thus paffed, the Satrincips revolted to the Samnits: and the Colony at Fre- "geles, by the fidden and unlooked for arrival of the Samnits (with whom it is certain the Satri- "cians were blinded) in the night was surprifed and taken. But the mutual fear one of the other, "kept them in on both fides that they firred not out until the morning. Then began the fight, "which for a certain time was equal and indifferent: yet, for that the Fregeleses within fough for "their Church and chimney (as they lay) and by reaon that the multitude, unmeet for arms, "flood them in good head in annoyings their enemies from off their homes; they held out and M "found them play a long time. But afterwards, a wilful and deceitful policy turn'd all backwards "and was their undoing: for they furred the voize of the cryer to be heard through the Town, "who proclaimed, That who ever laid down weapon, should depart alive and safe with bag and "baggaze. The hope whereof, caufed them to flack somewhat of their fight, and therewith they "beg to call away their armor in every place. But the refoltant fort armed fell, brake away through "a poftern gate, whole venuitrounes proved to them more safe, than the inconfradear of the other "which made them credulous and too light of belief. For the Samnits compaflhed them about "with fire, and for all they called upon the Gods for their help , and to their enemies for perfor- "mance of their promife, yet they burned them most piteously.

The Conns parted between themselves, their Provinces, Pappius took his way to Leceria in N "Apulia, where the Roman Horicemen given for hostages at Caudium were kept in ward: but Publi- "us stayed in Samnium to make head against the Caudine legions. Which thing much troubled and "distraied the minds of the Samnits: for neither their hearts would serve them to go to Leceria, "let the enemy should come on their backs; not yet to play behind, for fear left in the while, Lec- "eria should be left. They thought it bett therefore, to put all in hazard of a battle, and to try it out "with Pupius. Whereupon, they bring forth their power into the field: with whom when Publi- "us was minded to joy in fight, he thought it not amifs, faith to make some speech unto his men, "and to commanded them to assemble unto an audience. But, as they came running to the Prato- "rium, with exceeding great cheutelines, so by reason of their noise that called hard for battel, no "exhoration of the General could be heard: each man his own heart mingled of the former dis- "grace, served well enough to encourage and animat them. So they march out to battel, putting "forward the standard-bearers and port-riengs. And because they would lose no time, they firll "charge with laning their javelins and shooting darts, and after that, in drawing their swords, "they threw away their javelins, as if they had had a signal given them to do, and with naked "drawn sword, they ran upon the enemies. No cunning was there to be shewed of warlike Cap- "tain, no skill to be shewed either in letting in array the fiyes and ranks, or placing of the renewal "for supplies: the loundiers furious anger, with raging violence, marshall'd and managed all,
A So, the enemies were not only discomfited and put to the rout, but also because they durst not hinder their flight by retiring to their own camp, they made all the haft they could; disbanded as they were, toward Apulia. Howbeit they were rallied together in one company, and so came to Luceria. The Romans, in the same boiling heat of blood that they pierced through the mists of the enemies battel: entred also into their camp: where was more bloodshed and execution than in the battel, and the greater part of the pillage was in their cholé marred and clean left.

The other army commanded by Papirius the Coff, march’d along the Sea coast to Arpi: and all the Country they pass’d thorow, shewed them friendship and courtee, more for the outrages and lofes inflamed by the Samnits, and the hatred they bare them, than for any love to the people of Rome, or good received at their hands. And now the Samnits at that time dwelling upon the Hills in Villages, being mountaineers and wild people, and as it is commonly seen, of like disposition to the places which they do inhabit, walled the plain Champian and Sea coasts, defpising indeed their more civil life and conversation. Which Country, if it had been true to the Samnits, either the Roman army had not been able to come to Arpi, or else the penury and scarcity of all things between Rome and Arpi, would have converted them, being cut off from all provision of victuals. For even then, being gone from them, and laying encamped before Luceria as well they without the leaguer & those that were within the City besieged, were nipped and bitten with hunger, the Romans were served all from Arpi, but to slenderly and scantily, that whiles the footmen were occupied in their guards warding, watching, and working unceasingly: the horsemen, were laid to bring corn from Arpi, in little leather bags: and otherwhils, if they met the enemy, were forced to cast the corn from off their Horiebacks, to fight more nimly. They that were within besieged before the other Conuf came with his army, had both from the mountains of the Samnits, victuals brought unto them, and Muccors also of men let in to them, but the coming of Papirius made all provisions more strait: for, leaving the charge of the siege to his brother Conuf, he rode lightly appointed without carriage, all over the Country, and to beat all the quarters, that they were too hot for the enemies to forage and purvey victuals. Then the Samnits, seeing that they within the City besieged, were vast all hope to abide the famine any longer, encamped about Luceria, and were forced to gather all their forces together from all parts, and to give Papirius battel. At which very instant, when they were on both sides preparing to fight, the Tarentins Embassadors came between, discharging and forbidding, both Samnits and Romans to fight: professing withal, that whatsoever they were that refused to give over war, against them they would fight in defence and favor of the others, Papirius having heard that embassage, making semblance, as if he had greatly regarded their speeches, answered that he would confer with his brother Conuf: and having sent for him, and bestowed all the mean time in preparation to fight, when he had talked with him as touching the execution of matters already resolved, he presently gave the signal, and set out the bloody banner of battel. Now as the Conuls were busy in facrificing and performing duties belonging to God and man (as their manner is when they purpose to go to a battel) the Tarentin Embassadors aforefaid, encountered them and expected an answer, To whom Papirius, The Chick-maister (q.d. he) O ye Tarentins, fendeth me word, that the birds feed right, and all is well: and besides that, the Gods in our facrifice feem paffing well pleased. And in the name of the Gods, and under their conduct (as ye see) we are going to battel. Then commanded he to let forward the standards, and led forth his power, mocking the footloef nation for their great vanity, who, not able to manage their own affairs by reason of home seditions and civil discords, thought it meet to be moderators between others, and to prescribe them war or peace. The Samnits on the other side, having flaked all their care and desir of war, for that they desired peace in good earnest, or else thought it expedient for them to make a semblance thereof, for to win unto them the Tarentins: seeing the Romans all of a sudden arranged in battel array and ready to fight, cried forth alond, that they relied still in the authority of the Tarentins, and were at their direction: neither would they come forth into the field, nor put themselves in harms out of their force: choosing rather being thus disappointed, to abide the chance of fortune whatsoever, than to seem to have despised the Tarentins, who had interposed themselves as Mediators for peace. Marry (quoth the Coff,) we take that for a good sign and preface of lucky successe: and we would with no more at Gods hands, but to put into their enemies heads that resolution, not to defend their trench and rampire. So the Coff when they had parted between them their forces, approached the very camp of their enemies, and let upon them with an hot assault on every side. Thus while some filled and damned up the trenches, others plucked up the flates of the rampier, and threw the bank and all down the ditches under their feet: whiles not only their own inbred valour by nature, but also anger and cholre provoked and prick’d to the quick, their hearts already fretted and cankered at the very root, for the last disgrace receivèd, they

Genned the camp. Every man for his part gave out and laid, Here are not the straight gullers of Caedinius, here are not the impassible nor inaccessible passses, and forrests, where as proud fraud had gone beyond their silly errors and want of foresight: but Roman virtue and prowess, which no rampier never so strong, no trench how deep forever, is able to put by and withstand. So they killed all afore them indifferently, as well them that made resistance and stood to it, as those that retired and gave way: armed and disarmed, bond and free born, old and young, as well under age as undergrown, man and beast, one with another: neither had there escapèd any living creature drawing breath; but that the Conuls founded the retreat, and with ministy words words commanded the foildiers, to greediness of murder and bloudthly, to go forth of the camp. Whereupon when they were highly discontented and in great indignation, for that they were flaid and interrupted in this sweetness of eating their anger, and initiating their revenge to the full; it was time to deliver this speech unto them, wherein the foildiers were given to understand, how the Consuls neither were behind any of them in malice and hatred to their enemies, nor would be hereafter, but as they were their chief conductors to the war, so they would be their leaders and throw them the way to unflatable appetite of revenge and executions: had not the care and regard of those 600 Horfemen, which were kept as hostages in Luceria, cooled their thirft and flaim their fonacks: let hapy the enemies in defpair to find pardon and mercy, should run upon them in a blind fit of fury and rage, and put them all to the word; choking rather to torment and kill them first, before they died themselves. The foildiers greatly commendedit this conduct, and rejoiced that thus their choicer was allaid, and their fury bridled, confenting: That they were indeed to abdicate whatsoever, rather than the life of so many of the forwardest and principal young Gentlemen of Rome, should be betray'd, or in danger. This audience being dismissed, they drew together to a Counsel, whether with all their forces they should affay and prefs hard upon Luceria, or with one of the armies and chief Leaders, give the attempt to found the Apulia, a close and secret kind of people thereabout, who ever to that day had blood in doubtful terms with them:

Publius the Consul, who had taken this journey to over-run all Apulia, in that one voyage and expedition, either by force subdued and brought under his obedience certain States, or upon conditions entered league and society with them. Pappius also, who flaid at the siege of Luceria, within a short time sped according to his expectation. For having forefaid and beheld all the ways, by which victual was conveyed thither out of Saminium, the Samnites who lay in garrison at Luceria, pinched and tamed with famine, sent Embassadors to the Roman Consul, making offer to relieve and deliver up into his hands thofe Horfemen, (the only cause of the present war) in cafe he would raise and levy the siege. To whom Pappius made this answar, that they should have gone first to Pontius, the fon of Herennius, by whose counsel they had put the Romans under the yoke and the gallowes, to learn and know of him what, in his opinion they were to abide, who were vanquished and overcome. Howbeit, for airmuch as they had rather, and choice rather to be cenfured indifferently, and to receive equal conditions of their enemies, than of their own felves, he will'd the Embassadors to give them to understand, in Luceria, that they should leave their arms, their bag and baggage, their befts of carriage, and impatient multitude not fit for the war, within the walls. And as for the fighting foildiers, he would put them to pafs under the gallowes in their tangle thirt, tor to revenge the flame firft offerrd them, and not to inflict any new ingominy upon them. Nothing was denied and refus'd: seven thoufand men of war were put under the gallowes, a rich and huge pillage raifed within Luceria, all their own enimies and armor regained, which they had lost at Caunium: and that which furmount'd all other joys, they recover'd again thofe Gentlemen of arms, whom lying for pledges and security of the peace afofraid, the Samnits had fent to Luceria to be kept in fale custody. There is not hightly to be found a vi- dory more noble, and of greater conquence to the people of Rome than this, in regard of the sudden change of fortune, in cafe (as some records bear witnefs) Pontius also himfelf the fon of Herennius, and General of the Samnites, to make satisfaction and quittance for the Conulis disgrace and flame, was putt under the yoke, as well as all the rest. But let us marvel that it is not clear, but left uncertain, that the enemies General was rendred, and went under the gallowes: this rather I wonder at thofe doubts it is, whether Lucius Cornelius Dictator, with L. Pappius Curfus, General of the Horfemen, managed thofe acts firft at Caunium, and then afterwards at Luceria: and being the only revenger of that disgrace of the Romans, triumph'd most worthily (I dare be bold to faie) of any man before that time, next to Flavius Comitius: or whether the chief honour hereof pertain'd by right to Pappius as Consul. Upon this error followeth another in the lack of it, whether Pappius, furnamed Curfus, for his good service at Luceria, in the next Election, continued in Magistracy, and were made the third time Consul with Q. Aemilius Cesarinus, the fecnond time; or whether it were L. Pappius Magillanus, and the error grew upon the furname. But it is agreed upon by all writers, that from this time forward all the reigne of the wars, were performed and finifh'd by Comiuis, Aemilius in one prosperous battle made a final conqueft of the Ferentians, and upon composition had the City delivered up unto him, whether they had retir'd their forces for succor after their defeat in the field, and hostages were impofed upon them. With like good success fought the other Consul with the Sarricians, who being Roman citizens, had revolted to the Samnites, after the los at Caunium, and had received into their City a garrifon of theirs. For when as the Roman army approached under the walls of Sarriciam, and that the ci- zizens within (after Embassadors fent to treat by way of humble petition for peace) had received this hard and heavy answer from the Consul, That unlefs they would kill the garrifon of the Sam- nites, or deliver them into his hands, they fhou'd come no more again to him: the Coloners and inhabitants were more frighted and terrified with that speech, than at all the forcible attempts of their army. Whereupon the Embassadors followed their suit hard, and continued till, demanding very often of the Consul how he could believe, that they being but few, feeble, and indisarmed, fhould be able to force a garrifon so strong and well appointed, against their wills? being willing to ask counsel of them, by whose means they had received the said garrifon into the Town, they de- parted
A part their wives: and having hardly obtained leave & licence at his hands to confer with their Senate and to bring answer, they return home again. Their Senate was divided into two sects, which distracted and led them in impatience that they could not soon resolve. The one consisting of the chief personages and head men who had solicited them to revolt from the people of Rome: the other of the most learned and loyal Citizens, howbeit both sides strove in the end and endeavored to labor the Conuls for reparation of peace. The one part thought it sufficient (be it that the Samnite garrison having not provision enough aboard to hold out the siege, was to depart the night following) to give notice to the Conul, what hour of the night through what gate the enemies would go forth and which way they would take: the other, namely, against whom will

B were revolting to the Samnites the very same night, opened another gate beside to the Conuls, and privily let their enemies armed into the City. So by a twofold complot of treason, they were surprised unawares and all their throats cut not only the garrison of the Samnites(by reason that the woods all about the high way were laid for them and belit) but also at one instant there was a shout and allarm raised by the enemys within the City, which was full of them: and thus in the space of one hour both the Samnites were slain, the Satricans taken, and all they had in the world left into the hands of the Conuls: who after diligent inquisition by torture, Who were the principal authors of this revolt? whomsoever he found guilty, those he scourged and beheaded: and letting there a strong garrison he took from the Satricans all their armament. From thence Pappius Curtor departed to Rome for to triumph (as they write, that Jay, by his leading Lector was recovered, and the Samnites put under the yoke.) And without censure, a man he was worthy of all commendations of a warrior, surprising not only in fortitude and courage of spirit, but also in force and natural strength of body and name, for his good footman ship: whereinupon he got his surname Curtor. For in running (they say) he had not his peer but went away with pride and prize before all other in those daisies: and were it by reason of his bodily vigour and strong constitution, or his much exercise a stout and mighty eater he was, he drank as liberally to his meat and could carry it as well. Never had foot or horse under any Captain more rough and harder service, for that himself was of so tough metal and steel to the very back (as they say) that he could abide any pains and travel whatsoever. His horsemen upon a time were so bold, as to request him in lieu of their good service in some exploit, to ease them a little of their ordinary toil and labour: yes marry will I (quoth he) and that ye shall not complain that ye have no ease at all, I will ease you of this pains, That when ye alight from your horses, ye shall not need any more to stroke their shoulders, back and buttoks, He was a man besides for severity, bright, and of right great command, as well over his allies and confederates as his own Citizens. The Praxtor of Prunfpe, for very fear chanced once to be somewhat behind, and lack in bringing forward the retreating into the vangard and front of the battel: as he walked before his pavilion he commanded him to be called unto him: when he was come, he willed the sergeant to bring forth his axe immediately: at which word when the Prunetin flood amazed and well near died, Dispatch Lictor (quoth he) lock me up and grub this root that hindreth them that walk this way: and when he saw him astonied and his heart in his heele for fear of death helet a good round fine upon his head, and let him go. Doubtless in all that age (than which there was never any more fertile and fruitful for vertue and valour) there was no man one, upon whom the state of Rome relied and relied more: Infomuch as men had defined, and in their minds appointed him to have matched and made head with Alexander the great, if after the conquest of Asia, he should have been his power hitcher, and warred in Europe.

Albeit it may well appear that I have nothing left fought, ever since I began this work, than to digress and decline more than was needful, from the order and course of mine history, and by extravagant garnishing and mingling my writings with variety of matters, both to seek for the readers pleasant stores and diverticles to repose themselves, and for my self some ease and refreshment of my spirits: yet the mention of so mighty a King and renowned Captain, maketh me to think upon, and to utter abroad the secret conceits and discourses, which often I have cast and ma toed in my mind: and which induce me now to search and examine willingly, what event would have hapned and befall to the Romans, in case they had waged war with Alexander. First and forthom, the things that seem to bear (way and prevail in war, to befe (to wit) number of soldiers, valour, and courage withall. wit, sufficiency and dexterity of their chief leaders, and lastly, fortune, which as in all other humane and worldly affairs beareth a great stroke, so in war most of all. Which points, if a man consider either severally by themselves, or jointly altogether, do prove that the Roman Empire and government had flowed as well against him as other princes and nations invincible. And first to begin with comparing of the Captains themselves: I do not deny, but that Alexander was a noble and singular warrior: and this maketh more for his fame and reputation, that he was a sole commander of himself, that he was a young man and died in the growth of his prosperous affairs before he had felt and tasted of adverse fortune. For to let pass other other the-glorious Princes and brave captains, (the great mirror and examples of humane changes and varieties of this world) what was it that expired Cyrus, whom the Greeks commend and magnify above all other, as also of late time. Pomp as the great, to disfavor & the turning wheel of fortune, but only this: that they lived long? Let me but rehearse and reckon up the Roman captains: and though not all, nor in every age, wherein they flourished: but even them only, with whom being either Conuls or Dictator, Alexander should have warred, if had he come: namely, M.Velhianus

Corvinius, C. Martius Euiilliis, C. Sulpiiius, T. Manlius Torquatus, Q. Publius Philo, L. Papinius Cursor, for Q. Fabius Maximus: the two Decii, L. Volumnius, M. Curius: Besides other brave men and valiant personages that followed after in case he had fought the Carthaginian were first (for if he had lived he meant to have warred there) and then passed over into Italy, when he had been well kept in years. In every one of these there were the same good parts, the like towards of nature, as much forwardness of courage and spirit, as in Alexander, yeo, and as good Military discipline, which even from the foundation of the City, passing from hand to hand, grew at length to the form and perfection of an Art, framed & compiled of continual rules and precepts, and confirmed by experiments. For, after one course the Kings conducted their wars: even fo, next unto them the banishers of the Kings, to wit the Junii and Valerii, confecutively the Fabii, the Quintins, and Cornelius: to did Ennius Camillus, whom those two Romains in their youth (Manlius Torquatus and Valerius Corvinus) with whom Alexander should have encountered, was an aged man in the latter end of his days, And whereas Alexander ventured his own proper person in battle, and performed all Military duties with other soldiers, (which was not the least part of his praiseworthy glory) would Manlius Torquatus have given him one inch of ground, think ye, if he had met with him in skirmish equally matched? or Valerius Corvinus either, both of them brave & stout soldiers before they were leaders and captains? Or would the Decii have given him place, who with devoted bodies to death, came among the thickest of their enemies into present danger? Would Papinius Cursor have given him way, a man of that incomparable strength of body, & invincible courage of heart? And (not to name every one particularly) would that Senat & Council have been over K wroth with the straights & policies of that one young man, which, whatsoever he was that said, it confided and was composed altogether of Kings, was the only man that conceived & comprehended the true image and Idea of the Roman Senat, Mary, here was all the doubting (forfooth) left that he knew how to chuse out a convenient plot of ground, to pitch a Camp in, more wisely & cunningly than any one of those before named, to make provision for viands, to foresee & beware of ambuscades, to pick out & take a meet time for to fight a battle, to set his battaillons in array, and to strengthen the same with sufficient succours & supplies from the rearguard, Surely, he would have said himself, that he had not now to deal with Darius, which Monarch carrying with time a train of dainty women, and tender Eunuchs, weakened and made effeminate with wearing purple and gold, with all his rich furniture, for new and ostentation of his wealthy and superfluous fortune, Alexander without any such brooding, with doing nought else but knowing well how to convene such roies and vanities conquered as a prey and booty rather than an enemy and warrior, He would have thought very well, that the situation and nature of Italy far differed from that of India, through which he marched at his ease with his drunken Army, leafting and banqueting all the way: but specially, when he should have beheld the woody forests and unsappable straights of Apulia, the high hills and mountains of Lucania, and the fresh marks and tokens of the lofts that hapned in his own name and house, namely, where not long before his Uncle Alexander late King of Epirus, miserably perished. Our talk all this while is of Alexander, not drowned yet with the overflow of prosperity; wherein no man had ever let's rule of himself than he, Whom if we consider, as he was arrayed in the habit and attire of his new fortune, and (if I may so lay) of a new M nature, whereinto after his conquests and victories he was transfigned: surely he would have come into Italy more like a Darius than an Alexander, and brought a baffard army with him, nothing at all resembling but quite forgetting their native country of Macedonie, degenerated already, and growing out of kind, into the manners and fashions of the Persians. It grieved me, and I am ashamed, in so great a Monarch as he was, to report the proud and mighty and variety every while of his appearance, his excessive vain-glory and desire of being courted and crouched unto (as he was) in flattering manner by men laying upon the earth grovelling and prostrate at his feet. Such object bafeness should have been hardly endured by Macedonians conquered and subdued; much less than being conquerours as they were, Abashed I am to recount the foul and horrible torments & executions, the murders of his well deserving friends, even in the midst of his cups and N dainty viands: last of all his vanity, his over-weening, and forging to himself a divine race and pedigree from the gods. But what if his drunkenness and unmannerly love of wine, were every day more than other? what if his fell anger and exceeding heat of choler increased daily? (for I report nothing but that which all writers agree upon) reckon we not these infirmities for great blemishes and wondrous hindrances, to the virtues and perfections of a warrior & general commander? But here is all the danger and fear (which some are wont to give out & alledge, even the vainest persons of all other Greeks, who favour & magnifie the glory of the very Parthians in comparison of the Roman name,) that the people of Rome had never been able to abide the very majesty and name of Alexander the great. (And I think verily, that even themselves that talk so much of him never heard the truth, so much as by the brute and fame) and that against whom in Athens, O a City mightily decayed by war with the Macedonians, and even then, when as they might fee before their face the ruins of Thebes in manner smoking full in their eyes, the Orators durst freely make publicke invevities (which appeareth by the very records of their Orations now extant) against him: I lay, not one of so many States and noble personages of Rome durst have opened his mouth and given one word again frankly and boldly, How much theore the grandeur and greatness of this man may be conceived and imagined in the mind, all that shall be but one only magnifing, growing, and come to his height with the felicity of little more than ten years, Whhic
A Which happiness of his, they that extol in this respect, that the people of Rome, although in no war they were fubdued, yet in many battles had the foile and left the day; whereas Alexander never fought field but he won the victory; little understand they, that compare the exploits of one perfon, and him a young man, with the the deeds and acts of a State, which had now warred eight hundred years. And can we marvell, if when on the one part there may be reckoned more ages than years on the other, that in so long a time, fortune should vary more, than in the space of thirteen years? But why compare you not man with man, Captain with Captain, and lay their fortunes together? How many Roman Captains and Generals, in this case am I able to name, who never lost field? Ye may turn every leaf and page of the yearly annals of Magistrates, of day-books and journals of those Consuls and Dictators, whose valour and felicity the people of Rome had never ceased to repent of and be disconforted for, so much as one day. And that which maketh them more wonderful, and to be admired above Alexander or any other King in the world, some of them bare the Dictatorship but ten or twenty days; and none the Confulship longer than a year. Their levies and mutters now and then were letted and impeached by the Tribunes of the Commons. The due and belc time for war otherwhiles overthipped them, and yet they went forth, before their term expired, they were often called home for to be precentors of the Magistrates Election. In the very midst and busiest time of their affairs, the year very often turned about. The inconsiderate rashness one while, and the prudent crookedness another while of a Collegue and companion in government was hindrance and harm both. They succeeded landy times after the los and overthrow of their predecessors, and received the army either of raw untrained fooldiers or iarch as were ill discipline trained up: whereas Kings and Monarchs contraiwise not only freed and exempt from all quick obstacles and inconveniences, but also Lords and Maffers, and of absolute command over their enterprises; over times and feations fix for execution, give direction to others, draw all after them to their advice and counsel, and are themselves directed and over-ridden by none. Say now, that Alexander were invincible, and dealt with their Captains as invincible himself, he should likewise have hazarded as great pawns and favours of fortune as any of them; nay rather, he should have adventured and incurred more jeopardy in that the Macedonians had but Alexander alone, a man not only subject but also expiring himself to many perilous chances: but many Romans there had been equal to Alexander, either for glory or greatness of their worthy deeds: who every one should have lived and died according to the Fatal course of his own several destiny, without the hazard of the whole and main chance. It remained now that forces be compared with forces, and armies to armies, either in number, or in quality of fooldiers, or multitude of Allies from whom they had their aids. There were esteemed by computation in the Taxing years and Surveys taken by the Centors of that age, two hundred and fifty thousand poll Citizens of Rome. And therefore in all the reveol and rebellions of their allies the Latins they were able to levy and enroll ten legions compleat of Roman Citizens well near and none else. And for many years oftentimes there were four and five armies employed at once, which maintained wars in Tuscan, in Etruria, in Umbria, take also the Gauls with you, with their enemies likewise Lucania in Samnium. Besides all the, Alexander should have found all Latium with the Sabins, Volsci, and Equians; all Campania, part of Umbria and Etruria, with the P e n e n t e s the Marfians, Pelignians, Veftrians, and Apulians, and all the coaft adjoining therto of the Greeks, along the nether Tyrrhenian Sea, from the Thurtians to Naples and Campania and thence, the Sammils, as far as to Antium and Hafia. All these should he have met with, either mighty and puifant allies and friends to the Romans, or if they were enemies, vanquished and fubdued by their arms. He should have paffed the seas himself, having of old Macedonian bands, not above thirty thousand, and four thoufand horse, and thoufand more, of them Thelfarians; for this was all his power. And in cale he had joyned therto the Perfians, Indians, and other fuch nations, he should have drawn along after him, more let and euncumbance, that help and succour by them, this take over and besides. The Romans had ftrong supplies alwayes ready and near at hand, at home in the City: whereas Alexander his army (as afterwards it happened to Ambulac warring in a strange country) would have waxed old and decayed. They had for their armour and weapons, a shield or buckler and a pears in manner of a pik. The Romans had a target of larger capacity to cover the whole body, and a javelin, being a weapon much better and more forcible than the pike, either to strike and push withal near hand, or to have been a far off. The fouldiers, I confefs, both of the one fide and the other, hooed their ground furily, kept their place and array still within their severall ranks, the Macedonian huge Philans moved not, was feldiift and alwayes after one fort: but the Romans battalion more dillent, and confiding of many parts eafe both to divide and diplay, or to joyn and reunite upon any occation. To speak now of painfull work and travel, what fouldeir is comparable to the Roman? Who better able to endure all forts of labour? Alexander by the los but of one barrall had been clean done, and his war at an end forever. But the Romans, whose hearts, neither the flamefull disgrace at Canni, nor the would defeat at Carra, could amaze and do: what power would have discouraged? What barrall in the world would have broken their backs? Certainly, Alexander although he had prosperity and good succés in his first beginnings and enterprises, would oftentimes hwe been miffed his Perifans and Indians, and defire with all his heart to have had dealing with them again, and other cowardly and daffard Nations of Asia: nay, he would have faved, that he had warred before but with women, as Alexander, King of Epirus (by report) gave out, when when he was wounded to death, concurring the easy occurrences of war which this young Prince his nephew met withal in Africa, with the difficulties of his own that he found herein Italy. And verily, when I call to mind and remember the conflicts and fights at sea, in the first Punic war, for the space of twenty four years, with the Carthaginians, I suppose the whole age of Alexander would hardly have brought about and finished that one war, and against one of those two States. And peradventure, when both Carthaginians and Romans had been combined, either according to the ancient leagues, or for equal fear of a common enemy, and those two Cities most puissant both for men and munition, had taken arms at once against him, he would have been overwhelmed with the Punic and Roman war together. Moreover, the Romans have made good proof of the Macedonians as enemies, if not when they had Alexander to be their Captain, nor when the Empire of Macedonie was at the belt, and food upright unoffiled: yet tried them they have, and made head against them under the conduct of Antiochus, Philip, and Perseus: and it never cost them the loss and overthrow of their own part, nor so much as any appearance of danger atall. I would not be thought to speak a proud word, but be it without arrogance, and letting all our civil wars aside: never were we dethreaded, either by force of foot, or in open field and battle ranged, never on even and plain ground, never in unequal places of disadvantage, were we ever endangerd. The foolid in heavy and complex harness, I conciude may fear the Cavalry in the plains: may fear a host of arrows, number some forrests and woods, straight galleries, and unpassable wilds, without wailes forward or backward: but let there be a thousand armies greater and stronger than the Macedonians or Alexanders, so long as we hold together, and continue still in this love of peace and care of civil concord, wherein we live at this present, we are able, and ever shall be, to discomfort and put them all to flight.

After this, were M. Fulvius Flaccus, and L. Plautius Venax Consuls. The same year there came from fundry Nations of the Samnites Embassadors, to treat for the renewing of the league, and moved the Senate, most humbly kneeling prostrate upon the ground: but being put off and referred to the people, their prayers availed not to that effect: for as touching a league, they had a flat no. And after they had for certain daies together impetuous and one upon another, with cap and conge: at length after much fault, they obtained truce for two years, and out of Apulia the Theanenns and Camuns wearied with rods and spoils made in their Territories, after they had put in hostages to Lucius Plautius the Consul, yielded themselves to his protection. The same year first began Provoits to be created at Capua, to govern under certain laws given unto them by L. Ennius the Pretror: after that themselves had made suit for the one and the other, as a remedy for their flait, greatly decayed through civil discord. And at Rome were two more Tribes added to the reft, Afranius and Valerius. When Apulia began once to thrinck and go backward, the Theatins, being all Apulians, prepared themselves unto the new Conuls C. Junius Bubulcus, and Q. Ennius Bocchus: and fuel to enter into a league with the Romans. And since they were the men that led the way first, and by their example and perwauction induced all Apulia to be in peace with the Romans, and had confidently undertaken, as duties and Pledges to bring it to pass they obtained their request. Yet was not the league indifferent and formal, with equal conditions, but so, as it should be in subsequenc to the people of Rome. After that Apulia was conquered (for Junius had won all Turentum, a strong town and a rich,) they marched forward against the Lucans. Then upon the sudden coming of Ennius the other Consul, Nerullus was by force taken, and after that it was noise abroad amongst the allies of the people of Rome, that the late and weal publicke of Capua were establishd by Roman discipline and government: the Antias also, who made mean and complained, that they lived without positive laws and Magistrates, obtained of the Senate certain Advocats and Commisioners, to ordain Statutes likewise for that Colony, So that not only the Roman arms, but also their law and jurisdiction extended far and near, and was of great request. C. Junius Bubulcus, and Q. Ennius Bocchus Consuls, in the end of the year, delivered their Legions not to the Cossi, by them created, S. Nautius, and M. Poplius, but configned them to L. Ennius the Dictator, Who with his General of N. horse, L. Fulvius, began to lay siege to Satrianda, whereby he gave the Samnites occasion to rebel. Which brought upon the Romans a double fear two waies. For of the one side the Samns having assemblled a mighty army, to deliver their allies from the siege, pitchted their Camp not far from the Romans legaue: on the other side, the Satriacas set open their gates suddenly, and with a great tumult brake into the wards and corps de garde of their enemies. And to both partes, relying rather upon hope of succour and help elsewhere, than trusting upon their own strength, within a while began to charge the Romans in full battell, with banner dissolved, and dethreaded them. And although the Dictator was assembled both waies, yet was he little and faine on either side, because he had got a plot of ground, not eafe to be compassed, and made head both against the one and the other, advancing his eninges accordingly. Howbeit, he charged more hotly upon them that fellied forth, and without much ado beat them again within the walls. Then turned he the whole battell upon the Samnits. Where there was hard hold, and more to do. The victory, though long fift, was neither doubtfull nor variable. The Samnits being chafted and driven into their Camp, having in the night put out all their fires, dilthred and departed privily away: and being past all hope of defending Satrianda, they besiegued Philnea, a town confederate to the Romans, to require their enemy with the like displeasure. The revolution of the year being gone about, the war continued under the conduct of Q. Fabius.
The ninth Book of T. Livius.

A. Q. Fabius Dictator: and the new Comitils, like as the former remained till at Rome. And Fabius came before Surrincla to receive the Army of Ennibus, bringing with him a new supply to make up the broken bands: for the Samnites made no stay at Pliffla, but having levied and tent for fresh foudliers from home, pre luming upon their great numbers, encamped in the very place where they lay alone; where by braving the Romans, and challenging them with many skirmishes, they would have forced them to raise the siege. But the Dictator so much more earnestly bent his forces against the walls of the enemies, thinking it the best piece of service to affall the Town, as being of such importance to the rest of the war, which depended thereon: and was more ready to therefore of the Samnites, and only opposed against them certain guards both day and night, along the trench and rampire, to keep them from making any affall upon the Camp. But the Samnites on the other side, so much the more fiercely skirmished on horseback about the fortifications, and never gave them rest. In most, as when the enemy now was at the point to enter the gates of the Camp, the General of the Horse, Q. Ennibus Caesar, without advice and direction of the Dictator, riding forth in great noise with all his Corners of Horse, repelled the enemy. But even in that light manner of skirmish, and no set battle of any long continuance. Fortune to pilad her part, and shewed what she could do, that on either side there be a memorable, with the glorious death of both the Captains. For the General of the Samnites first taking it to heart, to see Ennibus so fiercely ride and give the charge, and himself to be disarrayed and driven out of his place, with much intercating and exhorting his horsemen, renewed the fight. Against whom, as he advanced himself, bravely to be seen among his men and sought most valiantly, the Roman General of the horse, with great in reit, galloped his horse, that with one push he unhorsed him and left him for dead; and yet for all this was not the whole troop besides (as commonly it is seen) at the fall of their Captain so much amazed, as provoked rather to fight. For that they were about him charged Ennibus hard as he fairly rode without head, and engaged himself too far within the thicket of the squadrons of his enemies, and lanced their javelins at him: but they gave the special honour to the brother of the Samnites Captain to be revenge for his death.

He, full of anger and sorrow, plucked Ennibus from his horse, and flew him in the place, even in the midst of his victory: and for that he fell among the troops of his enemies, he had like to have left his dead corps among the Samnites. But presently the Romans alightted on foot, and the Samnites were forced to do the same: and thus being arranged suddenly in great battie into battalions, there began a cruel fight, on foot upon the bodies of the Captains. Wherein the Romans went clear away with the better, and having recovered the corps of Ennibus, in great joy, in amazing and sorrow, they returned winners into their Camp. The Samnites thus having lost their Captain, and tried their strength what they could do in fight on horse-back, left Surrincla, which they supposcd could not possibly be defended, and so returned again to the siege of Pliffla. After few daies, Surrincla was surrendered by composition to the Romans, and the Samnites by assault were Pliffla. Then changed they the seat town of the war. For out of Samnium and Apulia, the Legions were removed to Sors. This Sors was revolted to the Samnites, and had slain all the inhabitants therein that were Romans.

Against which place, when the Romans were come first by great journeys to revenge the loss of their Countrymen, and to recover the Colony, their epian and fous whom they had sent out dispersed along the high waies, brought word, that the Legions of the Samnites followed yed, and one after another gave advertisement, that they were no far off. Hereupon they went forth to meet with the enemy, and near to a place called Largue there was fought a double and dangerous battle: for no laughter it was, nor flight of either part, but the very night that parted them, and they knew not whether they had the better or the worse. In some Chronicles I find, that the Romans lost the day, and that there died in this battle Q. Ennibus General of the horse, C. Fabius chosen in the room of Ennibus, came with a new and fresh army from Rome, and having dispatched messengers before to the Dictator to know his advice, where he should stay and rest, and what time and which on side he should let upon the enemy: after he was well informed and instructed in all points what to do, he put himself close in ambush,

The Dictator himself, who had for certain dies after the last skirmish, kept his fouldiers within the same; more like one besieged, than besieging; all on a sudden, put forth the signal and token of battle: and thinking nothing more effectual to animate and kindle the courage of hardy men, than to know of no other help or hope, nor to trust upon any man but in themselves, he concealed from his fouldiers the coming of the General of Horse and his fresh forces; and as if there had been no other way but one, even to break forth and tally with violence: "We being (quo he my fouldiers, went here and taken tardy in the firelights there have no other ilke but that which by victory we shall make open. Our hold wherein we lie is fortified sife enough but the same for the city of all things not alone, icktome, and hurtful to us: for all parties hereabout are resisted from where we should have convoy of victuals and were it that the people were debted to us yet the advances & paffages are hard, and the place of our abode incommo-dious. Therefore will not I deceive and abuse you any longer, by leaving here your tents into which ye may after ye have misled the entire victory but take your felkes for sorry, as ye did the other day: for our fortifications and holds, ought to be defended by force of arms: and not our arms by fenced forts. Let them have their Camp well fortified, to issue forth and to retire thither again at their pleasure, who have a purpose to make along war of it. But let s cut off all regard of other matters, but only of a present and final victory. Advance then your enmies directly against the enemy: and so soon as our Army is once without the trench and rampiers let them set the tents a fire, that have the charge so to do, you shall make up your forces against the enemy, and they shall be vanquished. At this speech of the Dictator, which shewed no other resemblance but of extreme necessity, the soldiers took heart, and were hot set to match straight to the enemy. And the very light of their tents burning behind them (albeit those only which flood next were set on fire, for the Dictator had given commandment) was no small provocation and prick unto them. And therefore they gave a charge like mad men, and at the first pull and burst they broke the array of the enemies; and withall, in good time, the General of the horse, when he saw a fair off the tents on fire (for that was the signal agreed between them) came hastily upon the back of the enemies and baffled them. So the Saxons being environed round about, made every man what shift he could to get forth and escape, and to fly. But the main multitude that were shambled together all on a round heap, for fear, being an hinderance one to another in the press, was slain in the midst and cut in pieces, the enemies camp won, and ransacked: with the pillage whereof the soldiers were laden, and the Dictator brought them back unto their own Camp; who were not so joyful for the victory, as for that they found (besides a little part thereof disfigured by fire) all the rest safe and found beyond their expectation.

From thence they returned to Sora, where the new Consuls M, Petilius and Gnaeus Sulpicius took the Army at the hands of Fabius the Dictator: who discharged many of the old soldiers, and brought certain new cohorts for supply in their stead. But when by reason of the difficult and inaccessible height of the Town, they knew not well which way, and by what means to make assault, and seeing that the winning of it would either ask long time, or be exposed to manifold and present dangers: a certain runaway - Traitor of Sora who had closely flown out of the Town, got to the Roman Sentinels, and required forthwith to be brought to the Consuls: who being preferred before them, promised to betray the Town: and being questioned withall, how and by what means he would perform that which he undertook, seemed unto them to allude some reason to good purpose, and prevailed far with them, that he caused the Roman Camp, which lay in a manner close under the walls, to be removed six miles off the Town, laying, that thereby the wards by day, and the watch by night would be neglighest, and left careful and diligent to keep the City. Himself the night following, after he had willed certain cohorts of soldiers to lye in ambush within the woods near the Town, took with him ten elect and chosen soldiers; and through steep places, and such as were not well passable, conducted them into the Castle, having brought thither more flots and darts to throw than to serve for a number of men: besides, there was good store of stones at hand, which lay there, either fattering by chance (as commonly in such craggy and rocky ground) or else helped together by the townsmen of purpose, for the better defence of the place. Whereafter he had bellowed the Romans, and shewed them a narrow and steep path-way out of the Town into the Castle. From getting up here (quoth he) there needs no more but three men only well armed to keep back the greatest multitude that is ye are in number ten, and more than that, Romans; and of Romans the most hardy and valiant: the place will hold you. I know, the darkness of the night will be for your purpose, the night, I say, which by reason of uncertainties, maketh all things seem much more than they are to men affrighted and amazed already. I will for my part act all in a hurly burly, look you in the meantime that you duly keep the fortresses. This said, he runs down with as great a noise and shouting as he could, crying, Alarms, help, help, Citizens, the Castle is taken by the enemy come you away to defends. These words he renewed ever as he rapped at the gates of the principal Citizens and Noblemen: these words he redoubled aloud to all that he met, and to as many as ran forth affrighted into the streets. This fearful alarm received from one man, was set abroad by many more all over the City. The Magistrates quaking for fear, sent certain to the Castle in spia: to discover the truth: and advertised by them that the Castle was surprized indeed by armed men, and full of armor (for they made the number, and every thing else more than it was) were clean put out of all hope to recover their Fortresses. So very where they stood to running away the gates were broken open by them that were not well awake, and those most part unarmed. At one of the gates, the companies of the Romans aforesaid, who lay in ambush, and were raised with sudden and clamour, brake in, and killed all that in this night ran headlong in their way. Thus was Sora won against the Consuls timidly come in the morning before the break of day; and look whose fortune it was to escape out of the massacre made in the night; and to flee away those they took to mercy upon illusion: whereof two hundred twenty five, even the who by the general voice of all were pointed at, and reputed above the rest the principal actors in that horrid massacre above said of the Roman Colonists. inhabitants, and the authors of the revolt they had away with them to Rome, bound hand and foot. The other multitude they left at Sora safe and unharmed, and planted there a garrison. All they that were brought to Rome were in the market-place couped with rods, and beheaded with the exceeding joy and contentment of all the Commons, whom it concerned most, that the multitude which should be sent into sundry Colonies might in every place live in safety and security of their lives.

The Consuls being departed from Sora, marched forward to make war upon the Lands and Territories.
A Territory of the Auriones; for the coming of the Samnites after the battle of Lake'Thira, they were all out, full of inteructions and commotions: and many conspiracies there were in all places about Campania: neither was Capua so well without blame and tumults. Nay, this matter palled as far as Rome, where information was made against them to the Nobles, and warning given to enquire into them. But the whole nation of the Auriones by reason that the Cities were betrayed, etc. as Sena, was reduced under obedience to the people of Rome. Annius, M. Latina, and the Florae were the Cities, out of which twelve of the chief young Gentlemen having conspired and sworn together to betray their own Cities, presented themselves into the Comitia, giving them to understand, that their countrymen wished long ago for the coming of the Samnites, and so forth.

B "As soon as they heard of the battle at Lake'Thira, made account that the Romans were utterly vanquished and helped the Samnites both with men and munition. But now, they say, that the Samnites were chaled from thence, they lived unculture without all mean terms of peace, and thence not their gates in deed upon the Romans, for fear of bringing war upon themselves, yet ob,, obliquely bent to flurn them, if their Army approached toward them. In this wavering and double, floating of their minds, they might at unawares be suddenly surprized. By this perdition of theirs they enslaved nearer, and at one and the self-same time were the doors sent about the three towns before named, some in armor closely to lie in ambush in convenient places near the walls: others in side gowns with swords under them, who little before day, so soon as the gates were let open, should enter into those Cities. By whom the matter was to handled, that at one instant they began to kill the warders at the gates, and gave a signal to those armed landlords who lay in ambush, to come once at once and come to Lucceae. Thus were the gates seized and possessed, and three towns in one hour by the fame fatigues only surprized. But because this exploit was performed in the absence of the Captains, there was no stay in execution and slaughter, but beyond all measure, and without all mercy, no less nor age was spared: and so the whole nation of the Anzones before they were detected for certain revolt, was destroyed and extinguished, as if they had warred mortally and been at deadly lead.

C The same year Lucceae came into the hands of the Samnites, by reason that the City had betrayed and delivered the Roman garrison within it; but the traitors went not long unpunished for it. The Roman Army charged to be not far from thence, and at the first affliit, the City standing as it did on a plain, was won. The Lucceans and Samnites both were put to the sword every one: and for that reason proceeded their furious rage, that when the Senat met in council at Rome, about sending men to inhabit Lucceae, many were of mind, that the City it self should be razed to the ground and destroyed: for besides the cursed and execrable hatred they bare against them being twice conquered and revolted: the distance also of the place to remove, grieved them to dislike greatly, and abhor the conning, as it were, of their Citizens, so far from home, to live amongst such a kind of people, cruel and dangerous. Howbeit, their opinion took place and prevailed; who gave advice, that Colonizers and inhabitants should either be sent, and to the number of two thousand were there planted.

D The same year in which the Romans found all loyal unto them, and nothing but filth and good E on all sides at Capua also certain secret conspiracies of the Nobles and bold of the City were detected and revealed. Touching which, the Senat's advice was asked, and the matter not detected by them, but Commissions were appointed and thought good, that a Dictator should be nominated for to sit upon the many conspiracies and inquisitions. And C. Menenius was created, who named M. Fufius Galba, the Chief of the Horie. Great was the terror of that Magistrate, and thereupon either for fear, or guiltlines of conscience, the two Carbini Osienis and Nucius, who were the chief of that commission before information was given against them by name to the Dictator died: and questioners by their own hands shortened their days, and so avoided the trial of justice and punishment accordingly. After this, the Inquisition wanted subject matter once about the Capuar, the Inqui;: to, by interpretation of words in the Commissio, proceeded to Rome, saying, that the Senat had good warrant to make enquiry and strict search, not only by name and precisely, who at Capua only; but generally, who in any place whatsoever had used concivities, and conspired against the Common-wealth: and all secret meetings; say they, and packings together for to get Dignities and Offices, were directly against the State and Common-wealth: so that the Commissio extended larger both for persons and real action. Yes, and the Dictator himself nothing gained, but that the virtue of his Comission was disturbed without limitation, Hereupon they were certain Gentlemen of the Nobility brought into question: and notwithstanding they called upon the Tribunes fort to certify them with interpreting their negative, yet there was not one of them would come out and relieve them, the pretended was taken against them, and they indicted. Then the Nobility, I mean not them alone who were in trouble, but generally the whole

G Seney of the City at once pleaded, that they were not the natural and true Noblemen indeed, who were to be condd, and afraid with this crime: who if it were not for simpler and indicr countries, had eaten and open incites unto all honourable places and promotions: but certain new upstarts and Gentlemen of the first head: saying, that it was the very core of the Dictator himself, and his General of Horse, who were rather parties guile, and offenders themselves, thin infinit Inquirors, and competent Judges: and that they were well know and understood: when they were once out of their place and office. This made Tullius to believe himself, who mindful rather of his good name and reputation, than respective of his high place and absolute absolute government, went up into the common place of audience before all the people, and spake H to this effect: "My Masters and friends all, Citizens of Rome, well assured I am, that privy are the whole carriage and course of my former life; and besides that, even this very honour and dignity which you have bestowed upon me, is able to refine and approve mine innocency, For, to it upon these inquisitions, there was not to be chosen now for Dictator (as oftentimes heretofore, according to the dangerous occasions and necessity of the time) a man reputed the best and most nobled warrior of all other; but such a one, as throughout his whole life, hath most of all multiled and condemned ambitious concerticles. Howbeit, forasmuch as certain persons of noble birth, (for what cause, it is more meet for you to decry and judge, than for me being, a Magnate, to speak without, as they say, and upon no lesser ground) first have endavedon with all their might and main to overthrow the procès of the inquisition it fell's and afterwards, feing they were not able themselves to bring that about (notwithstanding they were Patriots) have fled to the holes of their very adversaries, even the protection of the Tribunes and their negative, rather than to justifie themselves and stand to the trial of their cause; and at last having there also a reputation thinking all means fater than to approve their innocency, have fah on us, and bathed not (private men, as they are,) to accuse and touch the person of him that is Dictator; to the end therefore, that both God and man, and all the world may know, that they have affacified to compalts that which they are not able to bring to pass, namely, to avoid the rend-ning an account of their life and demeanours; so, I am ready (to set forward their accusations) to offer my self unto mine adversaries; and giving them means to call me to mine answer, here I reign up my Dictatorship. And I beseech you, O Conuls, if to be this charge be laid on you by the Senate, to proceed in examination against me first, and this Gentleman the General of Horse M. Fellenius: that it may appear, how we, through our own innocency alone, and not by the countenance and privilege of our dignity and high calling, are protected and safe from their slanders and intended crimes. Herewith he gave over his place of Dictator; and after him incontinently, M. Fellenius yielded up his room likewise of General over the Horse. These persons were the first, who being charged and put to their trial judicially before the Conuls, for to them by order from the Senate was the commiunion directed notwithstarding all the depositions and remonstrances of the Patriots, were in every point found unguilty, and acquitt. P. Philo also, albeit he had so many times attained to the supreme dignities of State, after he had achieved to many worthy deeds, as well in peace as war, yet a man malice, scavenged rather of the Nobility, was put to plead for himself, and finally absolved. But the inquiry into such men of name and quality, lifted no longer in force, (as it is usually seen,) than whiles it warreth; and in the first heat thereof, from them it began to fall to persons of less reckoning and bafer accounts, until such time, as by the same concerticles and factions against which it was devised, it fell to the ground, and was tro-den underfoot.

The fruit of these things, and more than that, the hope of the Campsins revolt, wherecero-certain had compaigned and sworn, (as ye have heard,) recalled the Samnites back again to Caedunium, who were turned and bent wholly into Apulia; that from thence, being to rest near hand unto Cephas, they might (if haply any insurrection and trouble preferred the overture and opportunity) seize upon it, and take it perforce from the Romans. Thither came the Conuls with a strong and mighty army: and at the first they flasted and lingered about the paffles and landes, having on the one side and the other an ill way of passage unto the enemies. Afterwards the Samnts fetching a swift compalts about, came down with their army through the open places into the plains, I mean the champaign country and fields about Cephas. And that was the first time that the enemies had a fight one of the others Camp. Whereupon by light skirmishers, on horseback or rather than on foot, they tried matters on either side: neither were the Romans one jot disconcertted with the issue and event thereof, nor repented of the delay whereby they drew the war-length. Contrariwise, the Samnit Captains perceived their forces toward by small lodes, and their courage to cool and decay evidently by that lingering war. Whereupon, they came aboard into the field and divided their Cavally into wings: with a special charge, to have a more careful eye backward toward their camp (for fear of any imprestion and assault that way,) than to the main battel, which would be guarded safe enough by the Infantry. The C definitionall themselves in this manner: Sulpisius led the right point of the battral, and Petilian the left: the right side (whereas the Samnts also were arranged in thinner ranks and files, to purpose to compalts and enquir the enemies, or to not to compalts and enclosed themselves,) the left did more abroad and open.
They on the left hand besides that they stood thicker and more close, were by occasion of a hidden policy of Petilian the C, further strengthened. For those cohorts and bands which were referved apart in the rearward for help at any need, and kept fresh against all occurrents and haards of long fight, he advanced presently to the forefront in the vanguard, and with all his forces at once charged the enemy at the first encounter & forced him to retreat. When the footmen of the Samnts were thereby troubled and distracted, the horsemen followed close and entered into the skirmish. But as they rode crost and overthwart between the two hobs, the Roman horsemen pricked and galloped their horse to rank them; and disordered and troubled the enigas, cornets, 队长s and troops of foot and horse, fell-mell together, until he had called the whole battral of that side to turn their backs. In this left point not Petilian alone. But Sulpisius also joyned with him, and was presen in person to check and encourage the foundiers; for he had transported and distracted
A distrusted himself from his own men, who as yet were not come to join battle at the cry & shout that arose from the left side: and seeing on that part undoubted victory, he went towards his own charge accompanied with 1200 men: Where he found a change of fortune, namely, the Romans to have retreated and left ground, and the enemy as victor, advancing forward his enmity upon them: so dismayed and daunted, Howeit, the Consul his coming made a present alteration: for both at the sight of their Captain were the soldiers hearts refreshed and comforted: and for to aid them, there came a greater supply indeed than in view of number, of tall and lusty men. So when they heard first, and saw soon after, the victory got of the other party, they renewed the fight. After this on all sides the Romans had the better hand, and the Samnites giving over fight, were either slain or taken prisoners: saving only those, who fled to Maleventum a town now named Beneventum. It is left in record that there were upon 3000 Samnites either left killed in the place, or brought away captive.

The Consuls having obtained this notable victory, forthwith do chance lead their Legions to lay siege unto Bovianum: and there wintered before the Town, until such time as C. Petilius (chosen Dictator together with M. Feltius his General of the Horse, by the new Consuls L. Papirius Cursor for the fifth time, and C. Junius Buthulos the second time) received the Army at their hands. Who hearing, that the Castle of Fregellae was by the Samnites taken, left Bovianum, and went forward to Fregellae which he recovered again without drawing his sword: for that the enemies had quit the place, and were fled by night: and when he had placed a strong garrison there he returned thence into Camponia, of special purpose to regain Nola by force of arms. Thither were retired within the walls, a little before the Dictator his coming, both all the whole multitude of the Samnites, and the rustic peasants about Nola. The Dictator having viewed the situation of the Town, to the end he might have the more open access to the walls, set all the houes on fire that were in the fumbubs along the countercarpe (and there they flood thick and were well inhabited.) And not long after, whether it were by Petilius Dictator (I know not) or C. Junius Consul (for it is reported as well of the one as the other) Nola was forced and won. That which would draw unto the Dictator the honour of winning Nola, add moreover and say, That he won also Atina and Calatia: and that Petilius upon a petition that began was made Dictator, for the letting or falling of a spike or great nail. Two Colonies that year were conducted to Subiaccum and Pontia. Succa belonged to the Aurnia. The Volscians inhabited the Island Pontia situate over against their own shore within a kenning. And a decrea pasted from the Senat, that to Cassia nono a third Colony there should be fent inhabitants; M. Vallerius and P. Decius, the Consuls that next succeeded, ordained three Triunvirs for that purpose, and sent four thousand to people those places.

The war with the Samnites was in a manner now dispatched and brought to an end: but before that the Nobles and Senators of Rome had left the care thereof, a brunt was blown of the Tuscanians war. And there was in those days another nation (letting the Gauls tumults aside) whose forces and hottness they more feared; for that their country was so near a neighbour and so populous withall. Therefore, whilst one of the Consuls was occupied in dispatching the relieves of the war in Samnium, P. Decius who lay at Rome grievously sick, by authority of the Senat, named Dictator C. Junius Buthulos. He according as the important affairs required, caused all the younger forts to take the military oath, and preit them for foulidiers, Armor, and whatsoever requisite besides, with great diligence he prepared. And albeit he was thus furnished and well appointed yet was he nothing bold and for the most part ready to begin war, willing (no doubt) to be quiet and stand upon his guard, unlefs the Tuscanians shewed themselves first in arms. The same purpose had the Tuscanians also, both in preparing for war and in making lay to begin war. So, of neither side they departed out of their own limits.

In that year was there a famous Censorship of App. Claudius, and C. Plinius. But the name of Appius became more memorable of the twin, and of happier renown unto posterity, for that he pawed with his toe the cautery or Post-way (bearing his name) and conveyed a channel of water into the City of Rome. Which works he finished alone for that his Colleague for shame of an infamous and odious choice of certain Senators which he made gave over the office. But Appius having the route fromomacch engrafted in his name and house from the beginning bare the Censorship alone. By the motion and means of the same Appius, the Patris; to whose family properly belonged the Priestly service, at the altar of Hercules called Maxima, had taught certain publicke servants (for that the function might be committed over to them as delegates) the solemn rites and ceremonies of that sacred ministrity, Hereupon is reported a wonder to be spoken and that which might strike a couple of conscience, and make men afraid ever after, to alter anything in religion from the former state and first institution. For whereas at the same time there were twelve houses of the Patris, and in them about thirty that were above fourteen years of age: within one year it is laid, that they died all with their whole issue and offspring. Moreover, that not only the name of the Patris became thus extinct, but that Appius also the Censor, within certain years, such was the ire of the gods mindfull of revenge fell stark blind. Therefore the Consuls that followed in the next year, C. Junius Buthulos the third time, and Q. Emilius Barbo the second time, in the very entrance of their office framed a complaint unto the people: That by the land and corrupt Election of some new Senators that honourable state and order was deformed, and namely, how some were over-diplit, who were of more worth than those that were taken in: And saying pl. only, That
That they would not oblige and have in any regard such a choice, which without respect of good and bad would be made for favour and affection to some and at the pleasure of the Colonels: and immediately they cited the Senate by name in that order and form, as had been used before the Colonels, App.Claudius and C.Plautius.

And in that year there were two places of charge and command, first given by the people, both pertaining to warfare: the one, that sixteen Colonels for fourLegions, should from that time forward by the people be created, which before were in a manner the gists and favours conferred by the Dictators and Consuls; and few or none of the people had any hand or voice therein. This Act and Ordinance was propounded by L.Petillus and C.Martius. Tribunes of the Commons. The other was, That the lame people should have the appointment and ordaining of two Duumvirs at sea, for the rigging, repairing, and trimming of the Navy. The maker of this Act was M. Decius, another Tribune of the Commons.

I would let pass one thing that hapned this year, as of small weight and importance, and not worth the speaking, but that it seemed a matter pertinent to religion. The minstrels that played upon the flute and hautboies, for that they were prohibited and debarred by the last Colonels, having the good cheer any more in the Temple of Jupiter, according to an old custom and tradition, took in such sort, and in a pelting chafe all in one company went their ways to Tyburn: as there was not one of them in the City left to sing and pipe before the pomp of lictories, and on their festal dates, the Senate made some concience hereof, and were troubled in their mind. Whereupon they dispatched messengers to Tyburn, to travel with the townsmen and endeavour all they could, that these good fellows might be restored and sent home again to the Romans. The Tyburnians undertook the matter, and promised right courteously to do their part: and suited them for these minstrels into their Town-Hall, and perfwaded with them to return again to Rome: but when they could not be brought to that, for any thing they could do, then they brought another policy and fear with them, that forsooth and fitted well the humour of such kind of people and of their coat. Upon a festival holyday, under a colour of making merry with minstrels and music about them, some invited one, and some another to give them a fit of mirth accordingly. But they plied them with wine (which all the tort of this profession love but too well) that they drank till they winked, and winked to long till they fell fast asleep. And being found asleep, the Tyburnians brought them gently to their beds in certain waggons, and thus believed, conveyed them to Rome. Neither perceiving that they ought to drink drunken forts they, before that their waggons were left in the market place of Rome. Nay, before they had slept out and concocted their wine that leamed up into their heads, and clouded them there the day-light came upon them and then they awoke. The people came running together from all parts to them, and after they had either got at their hands or charged them to pay, and made no more inch friolks, it was granted unto them, that three days every year being disfigured and dressed in a mask for the purpose they might range and walk about the City, with singing, and sounding their instruments, after this licentious manner and jollity, which now adays is yearly used, and their privilege of eating in the temple was restored to them again, namely, to inch as long and plaid in time of their divine service and lictories and all was well. This ridiculous pageant hapned amidst the care and preparation of two great and dangerous wars.

The Consuls parted their Provinces between them: To Q.Sextius fell by lot the Samnites to Amyntius the new war in Hannia. In Samnium Clodius, a forstree and hold of the Romans being impregnable by an assault, was a long time besieged; and forced by extrem famine, was delivered up to the Samnites. After they were once Masters of the fort, they took the garrison fortresse, and notwithstanding they yeelded themselves yet they whipped and ta' their flesh most beastly, and in the end, without all mercy killed them. Sextius exceding wroth at this cruelty, thinking nothing more needful to be done first than the winning again of Hannia: laid all other matters aside, and the same day that he extoll'd the wars, took it by force, and slew all he could find above fourteen years of age. In this train of victory the Army was brought against Bibractum. This was the chief place of the Pentrians in Samnium, the wealthiest City, the bell provided, and most furnished of all other with men and munition. The soldiers very exager and harlot for hope of a rich pilage, won the Town. But for that they were nothing to angry and hot of revenge as before, they dealt not so cruelly with the enemies: but they got together and carried away more spoil and laccage from thence than they ever had well bear out of all Samnium; and as libellously was it bestowed every whith upon the forstrees. And forasmuch as no pitched battle inplain field, no Camp to well fortified, no Cities and Forts, whosoever fenced, were able to withstand the puissant Romans in force of open arms; and the Princes in Samnium studied and applied their wits to find means of flight and hystil policy; if haply, as they waited and forsook the Territories after a brave and licentious manner, the Army disbursed once, might be entraped and encompassed within some ambush. It fell out so, that certain fugitives from the Country, and Captives, some by chance and others of purpose, being in their way, made relation of tidings to the Consuls, well agreeing all in one tale, and the same sounding of a truth indeed; namely, that a great sort of stroke and other cattell were driven together into a by-forstree out of the way: and so induced them to lead thither the Legions lightly armed, and to fit their hands with a far booty. Now the Samnites had privity forelaid all the high wails with a mighty army. and after that they saw the Romans to have entered & engaged themselves within the chafe of or forstree aforesaid, all of a sudden...
A sudden they rose up and with a great cry and shout ran upon them to charge them when they least thought of any such thing. At the first this strange and unexpected occurrence made them afraid while they took them to their weapons, and laid their lardels and bagget together on a heap in the midst. But after that every man was eated of his load, and had put on his armor, they rallied on all sides to their enligns; and without the commandment or direction of any man, they of themselves put the battel in array, each one knowing his rank and place according to the accustomed order of the ancient Military discipline. The Consul perceiving that he was brought to a most doubtful and dangerous battel, got from his horse; and protested before Fabius and Mars, and the other gods whom he called all to witness: 'That he came not into that place to get glory to himself by any enterprise, but only a booty for his soldiers; and that no fault else could be imputed unto him but an overmuch desire and affection of his, to enrich his soldiers by the spoil of the enemy. From which blame and shame both, nothing could free and excuse him else, but the manhood and prowess of his soldiery: exhibiting them with one accord to today themselves and endeavour all together to set upon their enemy, defeated and vanquished in battle, driven out of Camp and field, bereaved of his Towns and strongholds, and come now to attempt his left and utmost hope of privacy and their wilds of foraying, trusting upon the vantage of the ground and not pure force of arms. But what place is there now insupportable or unpregnable to the valiant Romans? Herewith he named the Cattle of Etruria and Sardin, and what place of disadvantage and hard access ever they had won by force. With these words the soldiers encouraged and enlamed, forgeting all difficulties and dangers, marched space and advanced forward up to the army of the enemies that now approached them, and were over their heads, Where the Romans found some difficulty at all, the while they climbed up the cliff or ridge of the hill against them. But after that the formen enlings were mounted up and had gained the plain in the top, and perceived they were embattled upon an even and equal ground, presently the terror turned upon those that lay in wait for them & were disbanding, scattered, and driven to fling away their weapons they fled and trudged as fast as they could to recover again those starting and hurrying holes, wherein before they had hid themselves. But even those difficult places which they had fought of purpose for their enemy, and their own deceit and guile, encompassed themselves. For very few of them could find the way out and escape by flight, insomuch as to the number of 20000 were slain. And then the Romans after this victory ran up and down at their pleasure to that booty of sheep and cattle, which was first presented unto them by the enemy, as a bait to catch them with.

Whiles these things thus went in Samnium, all the people of Heturia by this time, but only the Arethins were up in arms, and entred into a right great war; beginning first with the siege and assault of Sutrium: which City being allied to the Romans, was as a man would say the very Barriers of all Heturia. Thither came the other Conful Aemilius with an army to rescue and deliver their allies, and to raise the siege. Against the Romans coming the Sutrians curiously brought victuals to the Camp, lying before the City. The Tufcans spent the first day in consulting whether they should make a short war of it, by hot assualts, or temporize and protract the time by lingering siege. The morrow after, when as the Captains liked rather of expedition and halfe courstes than of more fage and safe proceedings, at the sun rising they set out a flag of defiance and the signal of battle, and armed they go forth of their Camp into the open field to fight. Which after it was told the Conful, presently he commanded a watch-word to be given, that the soldiery should take their breakfast; and after they had refreshed and strengthened their bodies with food, go straight to arm themselves; which was obeyed accordingly. The Conful seeing them well appointed in readines, commanded the enlings to advance forward out of the rampier, and not far from the enemy marshall his battels, For a good while they stood on both sides, wildly looking, and waiting that the shout and charge should begin from the adverse part. But it was past noon before there was one dart flying or javelin lanced either from the one side or the other. But then, because they should not go away without doing somewhat, the Tufcans began to set up a cry, the trumpeters found the charge, and the standard came forward. Neither were the Romans any joy behind to begin battel: Thus they ran to it, and encountered with exceeding animosity and fury; the enemies more in number, the Romans better in hardines and vertue. The fight was doubtful and dangerous, and oft the lie of many a man on both sides and namely, those that were most forward and valiant: neither began they to shrink on any part, before that the second battailion of the Romans marched and luted, advanced to the forefront of the vanguard, into the place of their wearied fellows. The Tufcans for that their vanguard was not supplied and reenforced by any new succours both before and after all about their enlings were beaten down and slain every man, Never in any one battel had there been lese running away, or more bloodshed, if the night had not protected the Tufcans to recharge were they all to die in the place: insomuch as the winners gave over play before the losers. After the fun fell the retreat was founded: and by night both parties returned into the Camp. After this no exploit was performed before Sutrium that year, but remembrance both for that the forword of the enemies army, was wholly in that one battel defeated and destroyed; and they had none left but the Subsidiary soldiers of the rearward, and those hardly able and insufficient to guard and defend the Camp: and also, the Romans were so hurt and sore wounded that there were more of them died after the battel of their hurts than were slain in the very skirmish outright. Q. Fabius, Conful for the year following, succeed ed and entered upon this war at Sarvium. And for his colleague he had C. Marcius Rufius: and H like as Fabius brought a new supply from Rome to furnish out the broken bonds, to these came fresh forces also unto the Tullians, levied at home.

For many years there had been no jars and debates between the Magistrates of the Nobility and the Tribunes of the Commons: but now there began a variance and contention one of that family and house, which even then was fatal, (as it were) and born to do mischief to the Tribunes and Commons both. Appius Claudius, the Centor, after eighteen months expired (which by the law Emilis was the full term of bearing that Magistracy) notwithstanding that C. Plautius his colleague had given up his office; could by no means possible be forced himself to go out and give over the place. Then rose up one P. Sempronius, a Tribune of the Commons, who took in hand this matter, touching the demolition of the Centorship, within the time prefixed by the law: an action double - s, not more popular than just and rightfull, nor less acceptable to the better fort, then pleating to the very Commons and base people. He having frequently rehearsed and reiterated the law

Emilis, extolled with praises up to the sky, the author and maker thereof, Marcus Emilus a Dictator; who had reduced the Centorship, an office shoretime of five years continuance (a puissance and authority, which by the length thereof of Lordship within the compass of a year and six months, "Come on, quoth he, Appius Claudius, answer and say, what you would have done in case you had been Centor, when C. Furius and M. Giranius were Centors? App no answered and said, that this demand and question of the Tribune did not greatly touch or concern his cause. For put the case, that the law

Emilis had obliged them Centors, during whose Magistracy the Act was made, (for that after those Centors created, the people had granted that law, and look what they last allowed and ordained the fame was good, lawfull, and ratified) yet neither he nor any of them, who after that law enacted were created Centors, could be bound by verity of that law. While Appius thus cavilled, and no man there presentfoothed him up, or gave applause and silent unto him: "Behold Quirites,quoth Sempronius, again, the progeny and race of that Appius, who being created Decemvir for one year, elected himself the second year: and in the third, being chosen neither by himself, nor by any other, in quality of a private person, held the sovereign dignity and government, with all the regall rights and enclips thereof: and thus continuing hill in rule and dominion, would never give over, before that his usurped governments of his ill-gotten, badly born, and naughtily kept and retained, were his final fall and utter overthrow. This is the fame family and house, (my Masters and friends, Citizens of Rome) by whose violence, by whose wrongs and opprobrium, ye were driven like poor banished persons to forgo your own dear native country, and to feize and hold the Mount Sacri; the very fame, against which ye procured and purchased to your selves the support and help of Tribunes; the fame, for which with two armies ye were fain to polepole your selves of the Aventine hill; the fame that always withfood the Statues devised against Hilary; the fame that ever impugned the laws for division of war lands among the people; the fame brake for the time, and interrupted the marriages betwixt the Nobles and Commons; the fame kept out the Commons long from bearing any dignities of the Chair, and of State:

finally, this name is much more lightishly and mortalily bent against your freedom, than that of the Tarquinii. And is it so indeed, O Appius? Would you have us believe, that being now an hundred years since

Marcus Emilus was Dictator, there have been so many Centors most noble and valiant personages, that none of them all ever read the twelve Tables?

and none of them knew that to law which the people last granted and allowed? Yes Iwis, they all with that well enough: and thereupon yielded they, and obeyed rather the law Emilis than the old and ancient Statute, (whereby the first Centors were created in the Commonwealth) even because the people approved it last: and by reason that there are two ordinances repugnant and contrary one to the other, there the new alwais repealeth and abrogateth the old. And is this your saying, O Appius? That the people are not bound to the law Emilis rather that they are tied unto it, but your good self alone is free and exempt therefrom? Was the law

Emilis able to bridge and curb those violent Centors C. Furius, M. Giranius, who shewed efficiently what harm and mischief this Magistracy could do in a Common-wealth, when for anger & despete that their term was abridged and cut short, they distracted, and deprived doctrine of the right of voice and Suffrage yes, and brought within the range of Tributaries, M. Emilis the wrought and most excellent provision of his time, both at home in peace, and abroad in war? This law took hold of all the Centors, one after another in order, for the space of an hundred years after; and bindeth now C. Plautius your Colleague, created with the same Appiices, and in equal authority with you. Tellme (I pray you) did not the people elect and make him with as good right and authority as any Centor might be? Are you the only and special man among it all others to have this prerogative, this privilege and singular precedence by your self? O

Suppose a man should create the King Sacrificer, should he, having once got the name and title of a King, give out and avouch, that he was King indeed, of as great a prerogative as any King of Rome? Who, think you, will be content with a Dictatorship of six months, or with an In-terregne for five daies and no more? Whom may a man boldly and confidently create Dictator either to taffen a spike or great nail? Or for the flately plateis and games, or horse-running, and inclike? How foolish, think ye my Masters, how base-minded and simple were they in this man his conceit, who within twenty daies after notable exploits done and archived, gave over their

their Dictatorship? or that they that being created with some error and default, went out of their place? But what need I to rehearse examples of old date? Of late, even within their ten years,

C. Menius Dictator, for enforcing a commotion more severely than flood with the blood of some great & wealthy persons, was charged by them with the guiltiness of the same crime, whereas upon the late and made inquisition; who, to the end, that being a privy percon he might answer the accusation of his adversaries, and justify himself resigned up his Dictatorship. But I would not that you in any hand were to model: no, no degenerate not a jot from that most impious flock and proud race: go not you forth of your office, howsoever you do, a day no, nor an hour sooner than you need must: but see then within, that you exceed not the ordinary time limited and let down. At leafwise, it might concern you to draw out your Censorship a day longer, or to finish it farther by a month. A month? what tell you me of a month? I will excuse my Censorship (quoth he) three years and six months, more than may be by the law. Enfylia; yes and by my self alone will I execute it. Yea many for this is somewhat like indeed, and spoken like a King. What, will you subluniate unto you a College in the room of the other? will you so? Whom lawfully is not to be subrogated and chosen not in the dead his place? For you think it not enough, belike, that you (religious holy Censor that you be) have translated and transmitted, that most ancient solemnity, and only instituted by that good Heredita in whose honour it is celebrated, from the function of most noble Sacrificers and Chaplains, of that divine and sacred service, unto the ministry of base servants, and abject flaves: and that a kindred and lineage of greater antiquity, than the very first foundation of this City, so sanctified by entertainment and lodging of the immortal gods, by your means, and by occasion of your Censorship, within one year's root out and perished every mothers son: unless also by the same means, you hazard the whole Common-wealth, and bring all into the same enormity, and guilt of wickedness, which even to preage and conjecture, my heart doth tremble and quake again. In that Lentenum or five years space was the City of Rome taken by the Gauls, wherein L. P. Pyram Censor, because he might not go out of his Censorship took a College unto him, M. Curtius Malcignus, in the place of C. Julius the Censor late deceased. And yet see how much more seber and moderate was his ambitious humour in that behalf: than this of yours, O Appius.

For L. Popiers neither alone, nor yet beyond the jull ice time by law administered his Censorship: yet found he never any one person alter him, that would imitate and follow his example. All Censors from that time forward, upon the death of their fellow Censor gave up the office, but as for you, notwithstanding that the date of your Censorship be fully out, and your companions in government departed out of the place; neither law nor fame, is able to rule and restrain. You suppute that virtue consisteth in pride, and inaudious boldness, in contempt both of God and man. For mine own part truly, O Ap. Claudius, for the reverence and majesty of this honourable place, which you have born, I would not willingly enter into any such hard course, as to touch your person by violence of hand: no, not so much as to offend your name with any foul or kind language. But as these words that have already passed your own perverseness, your opinionative consumacy, and insolent pride having wrong and forced from me: unless you will obey the law Enfylia, by your leave, I will be bold as a command you to ward and prison. And since our forefathers and ancestors have so provided and ordained, that in the Ele-lection of Censors, neither of the twain come short of sufficient voices requisite to choose him the other cannot be admitted and declared Censor; and to they mult proceed again to a new election, and the former Scrutinies are of no effect: shall I suffer you to exercise the Censorship alone, who may not lawfully be created alone? These and such like resumptions after he had alleged, he commanded the Censor to be attached and committed. In these proceedings of his, his of his fellow Tribunes adhered unto him, and three only allied Appius who called faithfully upon them for their protection and lawfull licentious; and so with exceeding ill will, and highest dishonourment of all Altars and degrees, he went clear away, and bare the Censorship alone.

These matters thus passed at Rome, and Saturium was besieged full by the Tufcani: and as the Consul was leading about at the foot of the hill certain forces to succour his allies to assail the fortifications of the enemies what way he could, they with an army must steel at amoy with him. Whole great multitude when he might ditoover upon the plains underneath, because he would help out the small number of his men by some advantage of the ground, he wheeled a little about, toward the hill tops; which were rough and craggy places fired all over with fiones and from thence he turned his banners full upon the face of the enemies. The Tuscani forgetting all things, and thinking upon nothing but their multitude, whereof on'y they preferred, gave battle so hastily and in such greediness, that casting away their short and darts from them, to the end they might the sooner come to hand-strokes, they drew their swords, as they matched against the enemy. The Romans on the contrary solidly load with shot, and applied them one while with darts, another while with stones which the place plentifully afforded them. Which, as they thumped and clattered, and stuck upon their shields and motions, although they hunt them not much, yet troubled them not a little: neither could the enemies easily come within them to fight near and close, nor any darts or javelins had they to fling and lance afar off, and thereby to annoy their enemy. And whiles they stood still exposed as Bums to receive all that came, and had nothing now to cover and protect them sufficiently: whiles some of them all at once gave ground and retired, and the whole battal was wavering and unsteady, the Roman and Principes, came forward with a new shout, and charged them afeh. This violent attack could not be the officer's fault, but turning their ensigns, fled away in divers directions toward their camp. But when the Roman horsemens who were rid over the plains and had gotten before, met them afront in the town, they left their way unto the Camp, and turned toward the mountains: from whence with their whole company in a manner disarmed and fore wounded, they recovered the forrest.

Ciminius. The Romans having slain many thousands of the Tuscans; gained thirty eight ensigns of the field, and won also their tents with rich pillage: began to conulate about pursuing the enemy. The wood Ciminius was at that time more unpassable and to be feared, than were the

of late, the German forrest: for never to that day had it been travelled and frequented so much as by merchant. And scarcely any one but the Captain himself durst venture to enter into it; for, all the red had not forgot as yet the unhappy luck they had at Cordium. Then the Conful his brother, one that was there, (M. Fabius, as some say, as others, Cato, and as others Clandius, his brother only by the mothers side) promised that he would go as a scout inquisit, to dely the wood and within a while bring certain news. He had in his tender years been brought up at Core, among the ancient friends of his houle and family, where afterwards he was taught the Tuscans learning and knowledge, and thereby was perfect in their tongue and language. And I find some authors of credit that write, how in those days the Romans young children went to school for to learn to parle Tucan, as now they do to speak Greek. But it (standeth more like a truth, that there was some special matter in this man, who with so bold semblance and dissimulation, durst intrude and influence himself among the enemies. It is said, that one only servitor accompanied him, one who had been brought up and marred together with him, and therupon not ignorant of the same language. And all the way as they went they did nothing else, but superliciously and after a general for, in the manner and wise of the quarters which they were to enter into, and the manner of the hill, the chief rulers and principal personages of that country and nation: to the end that in their speech and talk, they might not taller and trip, and be taken tandy in any apparent thing, which might bewray and discover them. They went clad in pastoral weeds like herd-

men, armed like the common people, and Pealans e.a.b of them with a fackilion and two jingles. But neither the familiar flee and commence of the wood, nor the fashion of apparel which they were, or weapons that they carried, did them so much as this one thing. That no man would ever believe, that any forrester and ranger durst enter upon the thick Ciminius forrest. Well, forward they went (by report) as far as to the Cameretins in Umbria, There the Roman venieted to bewray who they were: and when he was brought into their Senat, he treated with them in the Consuls name, about a league and amity. Whereupon, after he had been courteously entertained and friendly intreated he had his dispatch, and was willing to relate unto the Romans, That there should be ready for their army. Insufficient visuals for one whole month. If they would come into those parts: Also, that the youth of the Cameretins in Umbria should be at their command, prett in arms at all times. These tidings being reported to the Conful, after he saw before his carriage at the hill watch of the night and commanded the legions to go after, himself flaid still with the horsemens: and the morning morning by day-light he began to skirmish with the cons of his enemies, which were quartered without the forrest, and when he had long enough kept them fly and amused them at his pleasure, he retired into his Camp from whence he went forth at another gate, and before night overtook the main army. The morning after, at the point of day-break he was got up to the crest of the hill Ciminius: from whence, after he had beheld and viewed the goodly prospect of the rich grounds and fields of Hortiuria, he tendered his sollidiers abroad to forrage and fetch in prizes, and by that time they had got, and were driving a fast bozy certain tumbilary bands of the rural Pealans of Hortiuria, gathered together in great haste, and of a sudden, by the States of that country met with the Romans; but to out of order were they, that being come to refuse a prey, they had like to have been a prey themselves. A number of them were slain or put to flight, and the Romans, having waffled and made spoil all over the country, enriched with more of all things, returned victorious into their Camp. Thither were arrived (as it fell out) five messengers or pursuants with the Tribune of the Commons to warm and command Fabius in the name of the Senat, not to pass through the forrest Ciminius, for these messengers being glad that they came too late for to hinder and interrupt their enter-nises, returned home again to Rome with news of the victor.

By this expedition and journey made by the Col, the war father encreased and spread farther, than was dispatched by to an end. For all that tract lying along the bottom & foot of the mountain Ciminius, left the imitate of this ridge: and provoked to anger & desire of revenge, not only the State of Hortiuria, but also the borders and marches of Umbria. Whereupon there came to

Surruria. A greater power than ever afore: for not only they removed their Camp forward out of the woods; but also for the eager desire of fight withal speed, they came abroad into the plain field. Afterwards, they did first embattel in a plot, by them chiefly chosen, leaving over against them a space of ground for the enemies to set themselves in order of battle: but perceiving the enemies to fall off & loath to fight, they approached the very trench and rampiess: but finding there, that the guards were retired within their hold all at once they began to cry with one voice to their captains, for to give order, that the ret of their allowance of visuals for that day should be brought to

A them thither out of the camp; for they would lay in their armor and harness, as they were, and either in the night, or else in the morning betimes by day-light, give the assault upon their enemies' camp. The Roman army was no more quiet then they, yet at their Generals commandment kept in Now it was, he went the * tenth hour of the day; When as the Consul willed his soldiery to take their situation, and warned them to be ready in arms at what hour four was by day or by night he should give them the signal of battle. And in the mean time made a short speech unto them, praising highly, and italicting out of the Samnites wars, debating the Tuscans, saying, that there was no comparison between either enemy to enemy, or number for number: over and besides, he said that he had another test and secret devise in store for them, which they should know when time served; in the mean while they must keep silence of necessity, and hold their peace. By these dark speeches and hidden mysteries, he made semblance, as though he had some privy intelligence, that one part of the enemies would betray the rest when time came: this did he, to the end, that the heart of his soldiers (which haply were dismayed and discouraged at their great multitudes) might be comforted and refreshed: and for that the enemies lay abroad in field without any hold and fort, it was more likely, and probable, which he pretended. The soldiers having taken their repast, they laid their bodies to repose and sleep, and somewhat before the relief of the *fourth watch, they were raised without noise, and armed themselves. The soldiers suits and lackies, as also followed the camp, had mattocks and spades divided amongst them, to call down the rampire, and to fill up the ditches with the bank, whilest that within the compasse and circuit of the camp, they were marshalled in battle array. The chosen * cohorts or bands were placed at the gates and pallisades forth. Then at the sound of trumpet, a little before day (which in summer nights is the time of the deepest and soundest sleep) the whole army, when the rampire was laid along and level, filled forth at once, and charged the enemies on all sides lying here and there scattered on the ground. Some before they were fitting, others half asleep and half awake in their couches; but the greatest part, making hail in that hushed fright to take arms, were slain and cut in pieces. Few had time to put themselves in array, and they having no enuious, no colours to follow, and no captains to direct them, were by the Romans soon discomfited, put to flight, and pursued in chase. Some made halt to the camp, other to the woods, sundry twice one from another. But the woods were the last place of refuge. For their camp pitched in a plain, was the same day taken, and won. All the gold and silver there found, was by express commandment brought unto the Consul his pavilion; the rest of the palisage, was the soldiers share. Slain and taken prisoners that day, there were of the enemies to the number of 6000. This is a noble battle (some writers say) was fought on the other side of the wood Cuminea, before Perusia: who also report, that the City of Rome was in great fear, lest that the army being inclosed within so dangerous a wood, should have been surprized and delivered by the Tuscans and Umbrians, who were then up in arms together from all parts. But wherefore it was fought, the Romans had the day. Whereupon there came Envoys from Perusia, *Corona, and *Artenium, Where were in matter the chief and principal, all Cities at that time of all Tuscans, treating and suing to the Romans for peace; and a league; but they obtained truce only for thirty years.

During these affairs in Historia, the other Consul, C. Marius Rustilius, went from the Samnites the town *Alfium. Many other villages and castles were either utterly demolished and deftroyed by way of extreme hostility, or yeilded just and whole unto their subjection: At the same time the Roman navy also, under the Conduct of P. Cornelius, whom the Senate ordained Admiral of the sea-coast, set sail for Campania; and being arrived at *Pompeii, the mariners and sea-letters went on land to wait and forsake the territories about *Nuceria: and after they had made spoil, and pillared by matches the parts lying near unto the sea, from whence they might safely again return to their ships; they adventured farther for sweetly of gain and booty (as usually it fell out) and gave the alarm to the enemies for to rife. As they thrashed all over the fields, no man made head against them at what time, as they might have been found many one: but as they were returning with a disordered march, and flood not upon their guards, a troop of the peasants of the country overtook them, not far from the Ships, and called them of their spoil and pillage; and from them the rest of the multitude, as many as escaped the sword, were chased to their fleet.

The journey of Q. Fabius beyond the forrest Cuminea, as it caused great fear in Rome, fo it gave occasion of so joyful news in Samnium. For the rumor ran, that the Roman army was must up and besieged. And hereupon they called to remembrance, and alledged the like example of a former and shameful disgrace: *Chiusium: reporting and giving forth, that these Romans being a nation greedy addwise of increasing farther, and winning more ground, were through the same rashness now run head along into the blind forrests impassable, and invironed not to much with the power and force of enemies, as the dangerous difficulties of those pallisages. In such fort as said this joy of theirs, they cried out also that fortune had turned the glorious honour of the conquest over the

G Romans, from the Samnites, to the Tuscans. And therefore being well appointed with men and armours, they ran out from all parts, to tread down and confound C. Marius the Consul let were marching from thence, in cite Marius would not abide a battle, to go into Historia through the Manti and Sabins: And the Consul met with them by the way: where was fought a sharp and cruel battle with churchful event, and much effusion of blood on both sides. And as uncertain as it was, whether part lost more blood, yet the rumour went, that the Romans had the worse, by reason of the loss of certain knights and gentlemen of Rome, and Colonels; and one lieutenant, and that which made most, for that the Consul himself was hurt. Hereupon the brute (as commonly is seen) got more feathers still as it flew, and made every thing greater: so as the L. of the Senat in Rome, were in great fear and perplexity, and agreed to create a Dictator. Neither was there any doubt at all, but that Papirius Cursor should be the man, who in those days was reputed the only warrior above all others. But neither could they be satisfied of sending a messenger safe into Samnium (considering all the country was up in arms) nor that the Consul was for certain alive. And as for the other Consul Fabius, upon an old secret and private grudge, he maligned Papirius: which quailled, left it might hinder the service of the Commonwealth, the Senat thought good to send unto him certain Embassadors (as it were) even such as had been Consuls; who of their own authority, as well as by virtue of publick commission from the State, should admonish and counsel him to remit and forget all old displeasures and rancours, for his country's sake. When these perjuries were come to Fabius the Consul, and had delivered unto him the decree of the Senat, and used withal such speech and reasons of their own, as sated well to the errand they had in charge: the Conf. calling his sies down toward the ground, departed from the Embassadors without giving ever a word, and left them doubtfull what he would do. But the night following, in the dead time (as the manner is) he nominated L. Papirius for Dictator. And when these messengers or Embassadors gave him great thanks for mastering and ruling his affections to exceeding well, he held his resolution still of silence, and without any answer given, or mention made of himself, dismissd them; that it might appear, how upon an high mind and haughty flamock, he bridled and kept in that grief of heart and spiteful anger of his. Papirius named C. Junius Bubulcus commander of the borde. And whiles he proposed an act concerning the regiment and command of his army, before the people assembled by the Curie or wards, there hisped a matter of ominous presage, which caused that busineffe to be put off until the next day: for that the ward Fauicia, which by lot had the prerogative now to give the first voices, was noted already for infamous and unhappy, in regard that two calamities which happened in both years, wherein the late Curie likewise began the suffriges first; namely, the taking of the City of Rome, and the Caudine peace. Macer Licinius making that ward ominous and unlucky, for the third lofe and calamy received at Cremen: But the next morrow, the Dictator, after he had taken new Apiances, went through with the act, and obtained his commission, and set forward with the legions lately mulled and enrolled upon the feastful alarm given, that the Roman army was passed the wood Cyninia, until he arrived at Longula: where, after he had received of the Consul Marius, the old bands of fouldiers, he brought his forces into the field to give battell. The enemies for their part seemed not to refuse fight: howbeit, as they stood armed and stangled, and neither the one side nor the other would begin to charge, the night came upon them, and forced them to retreat. Then they abode encamped near together in rest and quiet for certain days, neither diluting their own puissance, nor yet disdaining and delisting their enemies. In this mean time there was doings and war in Etruria: for both there was a battell fought with the army of the Umbrians: howbeit, the enemies were rather disconcerted and put to flight than slain, for that they were not able to hold out and maintain fight long with such courage and animosity as they began: and also near the lake and Mear Vedunus, the Tuscanians had levied a new army, according to a facedit law, whereby one man had chosen another (who as worn brethren were to live and die together) where they fought a field, not only with greater number, but also with more courage than ever at any time before: and with such heat of anger and malice one against the other they encountered, that of neither side they thought of discharging shot and dashing darts, but began at the very first with their swords to go hand to hand: and the conflict being right fiercely begun, increased still, and waxed hotter in the very skirmish, and continued for a good while to doubtfull, that the Romans thought they dealt not with Tuscanians so often by them defeated and vanquished, but with some new nation more warlike than they. No shew of flight on neither side: down go the formost, and lay by before their Standards: and left that the enignes should be left naked and bare, and without the defendants, the second range and ward of the battalions came in place to supply the first: and so still new succours and fresh were set even as far as from the rewerward behind, defined for the last help and utmost refuge. And to that extremity of travel and peril they proceeded, that the Roman horsemans abandoning their horses alighted on foot, and were fain to go to the footmen in the forefront of the vanguard, over armor, and over dead bodies, lying all spread upon the ground; which new troop and battalions risen and sprung (as it were) a fresh, to reinforce and strengthen their disfitted fellows, dislodged the squadrions and enignes of the Tuscanians. The other legiounary fouldiers, wearied (as they were) followed hard and fecured their violence and forceable charge, and at length brake through the ranks of their enemies. Then the Tuscanians as ifflfe as they stood once, began to have the worse, and certain bands gave way and retreated: and when they once turned back, they fell plainly to take their heels and run away. This was the first day, that overthrew and laid along the pucance of the Tuscanians, who abounded so long in wealth and fortunate prosperity, their whole flour and strength which they had, was in this battell lain, and at the same time their camp won and ranlacked.

With like hazard and glorious success of the end, was the war managed with the Samnites soon after: who besides all other preparations and ordinary furnitures of war, gave order that their army should glister and shine aganise with a new kind of garnishing their haorne and armes. For having divided their forces into two armies, the one had laid their shields with gold, the other with silver. The form and fashion whereof was this, that upper part whereof with the brest and shoulders are covered was broader, and the head of it of even height; but the other end growing downward to the bottom was more pointed wedgeshie, so that it held out more nimly;

Their breast and haorne was fenced with emblems, the left leg armed with a good greave, their motions with high crests made a show of tall stature. The fouldiers aforesaid with gilded shields wore coats of sundry colours; the other with silvered, white linnen; and they had the leading of the right wing, or point of the battell; but they of the left. The Roman had notice and knowledge already what preparation there was of brave and goodly armes: and their Captains had taught them afore, that a fouldier ought to be dreadful and terrible, not dight and decked in his damasked gold and silver, but trustful in the flarpedge of iron and steel, and a good heart and courage withall: and so for that other furniture, it was rather a good booty than a mark of proof; fair and rependent, before men came to the sharp, but foul and unleenly amongst bloody wounds. The true ornament and beauty of a fouldier, is valor and hardiness; so as for all those bravesies, they went commonly with victory: and to conclude, that rich enemies would serve well for a good prize to the conqueror, were he never to poor and needy. With these speeches after that Carfor had animad his fouldiers, he led them into the field; himselfe put in the right wing; the left he committed to the condict of the General of horle. So soon as they charged one another and buckled together, a great conflict and hardly they had with the enemy, and no lefe emulation there was between the Dictator and him; striving much whither of them twain should begin the victory. But as hap was, first Junius disorderd the enemy, and from the left point which he commanded, he charged right lustily the right wing of the enemies: laying ever and anon, that he offered and sacrificed unto the Devil and infernal spirits, those fouldiers of theirs, consecrated already unto them after the manner of the Samnites, and decked accordingly in white linny, and bright silvered armours, putting in colour thereunto: and whilst advanced forward his standards, brake their arras, and made the battell to shiver evidently and give ground. Which when the Dictator perceived, how now quoth he, shall the victory begin at the left wing, and shall the right, wherein the Dictator fighteth in person, come behind and follow the battel of another, and not carry away within the greatelest part of the victory? Herewith he lette them on his fouldiers, yet gave the horsemens no place in midsthood to the footmen, or the service of the Lieutenants was inferior to the Captaines themselves and chief commanders: M. P. Decius on the right point, P. Decius on the left, both Conial men, put them selves forward, and rode out to the horsemens amongst in the wings, exhorting them to take part with them in honor, and charged a crose upon the sides and flanks of the enemies. Whilst this new terror upon the former, had on every side entered the bated of the enemies; and the Roman legions to terrify them the more, had redoubled a fresh honer, & charged them with greater fury, then began the Samnites to flee again. Now the fields were overspread with the bodies of dead men, and streued thick with armor, erewhile so brave and glorious, and at the first, the Samnites in great affliction recovered their tents; but being there, were not able to much as to keep them, for they were won and riled before night, and fire upon them. The Dictator by a decree of the Senat triumphed: and the said armor which was taken from the enemy, made the greatlest pageant of all other, in the pomp of triumph: which carried so lately a swish and magnificent, that the gielded shields were divided amongst the warrers of the company of Bankers and Goldsmithes, to the beautifying of their Hal and Market place. And hereof began first the careme of the Ailites, to adorn and let out the common place of the City in their solemn procesions, when the gilded images of the gods and holy reliques were carried about for pomp in silver chariots. And the Romans verily for their part put this goudly trim armor of their enemies to this use, namely, to honor their gods withall. But the Campanians upon a pride and inveigate hatred that they bare against the Samnites, used to set on their sword-players and fencers at the sharp (which was a column fight and paltime they had at their great feats) with this same fainbine, and termed them in mockery, by the name of Samnites.

The same ear Fabius the Conful fought with the rest of the Tucans at Perusia (which City) also had the covenant of truce) where neither doubtful nor hardly he obtained victory. And the very town itself he had forced & won (for in the same train of his conquest he approached the walls) but that their Embassadors came forth and yielded the City. When he had placed a good garrison at Perusia and sent before him to Rome unto the Senat, the Embassadors of Hierus in, who treated for peace: he being but Conful, made his triumphant entry into the City for a more magnificent victory, then the Dictator. And that for a good part of the honor of subduing the Samnites, was aceribed to the Lieutenants P. Decius, and M. Valerius, therefore at the next election, the people with general arent declared the one Conful, and the other Pretour. Fabius for taking Hierus in to bravely and valiantly, continued Coniull fyll; and had for his Colleague P. Decius Valerius created Pretor the fourth time. The Confils parted between them the provinces, Hierus in told to Decius, Samnium to Fabius. Whotaking his voyage to Nuceria, laid siege to the City of the Allies, and won it by assault; and notwithstanding they made suit for peace, he rejected and depilshed them, for that when it was offered, they would not accept it. With the Samnites he fought a battell; but without any great conflict, the enemies were

vanquished. Neither had the remembrance of that field been left in record, but that the Marians first took arms and marched with the Romans. After the Marians were revolted, the * Pelignians did the semblable, and speed alike. Decius also the other Conful had good success in his wars. He drove the Taquinians for ever, to find the army corn, and to sue for a truce of forty years. Certain captives and holds of the Volscians, he forcibly won: some of them better rated, for that they should not be any receptacle or harbour for the enemies. And with warring round about every where, he became so terrible, that the whole Tuscan nation made fate to the Conful for peace and concord. It they could not obtain, but truce for a year was granted. In regard witerof, for that year they satisfied the whole pay for the army, and a double livery for every souldier was exacted and taken of them. This was the penion and fine that their truce cost them.

But now when all was quiet among the Tufcans, the sudden revolting of the Umbrians, a nation free, and saved hitherto from the calamities of war, but only, that the Roman army passing through their territories troubled all anew: for they having raised the strength and flower of their youth and collected also a great part of the Tuscan to rebel, levied sorgecast-power that making no accoempt of Decius, whom they left behind them in Herrera, they gave out proud words of themselves, and spake basely of the Romans, vaunting and boasting that they would march right forth to assault Rome. Which designe of theirs, to soon as it was reported to Decius the Con. he made speed, and by long journeys departed out of Herrera toward the City, and in the Country of the Paphitians, encamped himself; lifting ever after the enemies, what they meant to do. Neither at Rome was the Umbrians war neglected and set light by; for their very threats and menacees feared them, as who already had seen by experience, by the fort they had at the Gauls hands how untrust City they inhabited and not unprotected. Therupon meddengers were dispatched to the Col. Fabius. That if he had any breathing time, and rest from the Samnites war, he should with all speed lead his army into Umbria. The Col. obeyed, and by great journeys went forward to * Met- vania, where at that time the other of the Umbrians lay. This sudden and unexpected coming of the Col. whom they thought very occupied in Samnian enough off from Umbria, so terrified the Umbrians, that some gave advice to retire back to their walled towns, others to relinquish the war altogether. One Canton or tract of their country (which they themselves call Matlalnata not only kept the rest in arms, but also let them on to fight immediately, so as they charged upon Fabius, as he was trenching and fortifying. Whom when the Col. saw rushing upon his rampiers in such heaps, he called his men from their toil, and as the ground & time would give leave, he marshalled them in order of battle: and after he had encouraged his souldiers with a true report & discource of many glorious and honourable journeys achieved as well in Thesalia as also in Samnium, he will to them to dispatch this final residue of the Tufcan war, that hung by and remained behind, and to be revenged of that accursed and immodest speech, whereby they threatened to affail the City of Rome. These words of his were heard by the souldiers with such alacrity and unexpectedness of heart, that before their General had made an end of his speech, they set up a shout of themselves and interrupted him: and thus before commandment and signal given by sound of trumpets and cornets, they ran amain upon the enemies, and charged them as if they had not been men, and those also armed. For (a wonderful thing to be spoken) at the very first they began to pluck the banners and streamers out of the enemies hands, after that, the sedge-beaters themselves were led to the Conuls, and the souldiers armed as they were, transpohted out of one battalion into another, and where there was any scuffling they fought not to much with sword as buckler and what with their boles and iron pikes, and what with jutting, shoudering, and striking the enemies about the arms-pits, they were overthrown and fell. In which skirmish, more men were taken then slain: and no other cry was heard throughout the field, but down with weapon, down with weapon. So that in the very conflict, the principal authors of the war rendered themselves: and the morrow after, and other cities following, the rest of the people of the briallike yeelded. The Orculians by liquituation only and pledges given, were received in amity. And Fabius having thus got the victory in that war, which fell to another mans lot and charge, led back his army again into his own province. And in regard of his prosperous and happy exploits, like as the people the year past, continued his Conulsipio to the Senat against the year following, when Ap. Claudius, and L.Polumnius were Conuls:proposed his martial rule still, made the heart of Appius, who was greatly against it. In some Chronicles I find, that Appius, whiles he was Confur fued to be Conul. and that his Election was crost and staid by L.Ponunus, a Tribune of Comuntill he had resigned up the Censorship. Being created Conul. and the war with the Samitens (declared new enemies) allotted unto his Colleague, he remained at Rome: that by civil policy, and managing home affairs, he might augment his own state and authority, since that the honour of war-service reited in the hands and conduct of another. Polumnius had no cause to repent of his charge and province for many fortunate battles he fought, and some towns of the enemies by force he won. He was a bountiful giver of the spoil away unto his souldiers: and this bounty in it fell alone acceptable, he helped much with great cointrode and gentleness, by which venitures and artificial means, he made the souldiers both venturous in perils and hardly in travel.

Q. Fabius on the other part, in quality of pro-Conul, gave battle to the Samnites near the City Alba, where the day was nothing doublen. The enemies were discomfited and beaten into their camp: neither did they be able to have kept the field, but that there was but a lit-
The day left behind ; and yet before night, they were before round about in their hold, eyes and watched with good guards all night long, that none should make escape. The morrow morning ere it was well day light, they began to yield themselves, and to capitulate, that as many Samnites as there were among them, should be sent forth in their single garments, and they all went under the gallows. As for their confederates and allies, there was no such proviso nor composition made; but they all, to the number of seven thousand, were told as slaves, and were a garland. As many as advow'd themselves to be Hernicks, were kept apart by themselves to be forthcoming. All those Fabius sent to Rome to the Senate, and until such time as enquiry was made, whether in a public matter they were prefixed fouldiers or voluntarily served under the Samnites against the Romans, they were committed to be kept in ward among landy nations of the Latins: during which time, the new Consuls, Publilius Cornelius Aruns, and Quintus Martius Trimalius (for those were now created) had in charge to propose that matter anew unto the Senate. The Hernicks took that ill. Whereupon the Anagnins held a Diet of General Council in the round Circque, which they call Maritimus, of all the Cities of that Nation: except the Altarins, Perentins, and the Vernians. Where the whole State of Hernicks proclaimed war against the people of Rome. In Samnium also, for that Fabius was departed thence, there arose new troubles and rebellions, Calatia and Sorana were forced, and the Roman garrisons that there lay, were put to the sword, and upon the bodies of as many as they took alive, they exercised much torture and cruelty. Whereupon Publius Cornelius the Consul was thither sent. And to Martius were the new enemies appointed (for by this time decreed it was), That was should be made upon the Anagnins and the other Hernicks. At first the enemies had foretold all the convenient places and ways between both the Consuls camps, that there could not readily pala a larky or carrier between, in so much, as for certain dais both Consuls abide double full how the world went, and uncertain one of the others state. The fear whereof, sped to Rome, for all the younger fort [from seventeen years of age to even and forty] were to serve and against all sudden occasions, and occurrents whatsoever, two full and compleat armies were levied and enrolled. But the Hernick war was nothing correspondent either to the present menaces, or to the ancient glory and reputation of that nation: for having done no worthy adventures, and within few dais left their camp thence, they covenanted for to have thirty dais since; during which time, they might send Embassadors to the Senate of Rome: and in confirmation hereof, they promised to lay down two months pay, and to find corn for the army, and allow every fouldier one coat. But from the Senate they were put off and referred to Martius: unto whom by order from the Senate, a large commission was granted, to dispose of the Hernicks as he thought good, and to he whole nation as yeelded to his devotion. The other Consul in Samnium being in forces more puiffant then the enemy, was not witholding encumbered much with the dificul-ty of the ground. All the passages had the enemy stopp'd, and poscided himself of the forrests and woods which were thorough faires, that no way visually might be conveyed to him. Neither could the Consul, for that all daily he deploy'd banner in field, train them forth to fight so as it was well seen, that neither the Samnits could abide present battle, nor the Romans long delay of war. But the arrival of Martius who upon the subduing of the Hernicks, made haste to aid his Colleagues, cau't the enemy to defer no longer the trial of the field. For, they, who thought themselves not good enough to match so much as the one army, knew full well that if they opposed two Consuls armies to join together, there had been no hope left. They therefore fet upon Martius as he marched without order of battle. Hereupon in all their trusses and gardles were brought together and laid in the middle; and as the time would permit, he set his fouldiers in array. At the first encounter, the shout was hard into the camp of the other Consul. Afterwards the dust descried afar off, gave an alarm, and made a trouble and tumult there. Then the Consul full presently commanded to arm; and hastily bringing his fouldiers forth into the field, entred upon the battall of the enemies in the flank, whilsts they were bus'd in another skirmish. He cried aloud to his men, that it were exceeding great shame, to suffer the other army to carry away double victory, and not themselves win the honour of that war, which was their proper charge. Whence, wherefoever he charged, he brake in and made entrance, and having pierced and made a great lane through the midst of the enemies battle, he pulled on towards their camp; which finding void of defiants, he took and set fire. Whose when the fouldiers of Martius saw burning before their faces, and the enemy likewise, as they looked behind: then began the Samnits on all hands to file; but killed they were every where down right: all places fell murder and slaughter; so in no part could they find means to escape and save themselves. Now when there were thirty thousand of the enemies slain, the Consuls founded the retreat, and gathered both their armies together, with great congratulation one to the other: by which time behinde there were defec'd far off, certain new bands of enemies, enrolled for a supply; and they gave occasion of a new and fresh slaughter. Against whom without commandment of Consul, or any signal received from their leas they, the Romans advanced tardily, crying aloud, that these homines were to be welcomed with an ill blast, and this their first training should cost them dear. The Consuls let the legions alone in this their furious heat, as who knew well enough, that these new coming fathered the old beaten fouldiers so slain already and flying away, we did soon have enough off it, and not once adventure fight. And they were not deceived in their opinion; for the whole forces of the Samnits as well old and new, fled space unto the next mountains: and thither the Romans Romans also make as great speed. But no safe place could those vanquished enemies find; for even H from the very hill tops which they held, they were beaten down, so that with one voice they all cra- ped peace. Then after the Consuls had imposed upon them corn for three months, and a year's pay, and for every fodder a lively besides, they were permitted to send Embassadors to the Senate to treat and capitulate thereof. During which time, Cornelius was left in Samnium, and Martianis returned into the City, with triumph over the Hernicks. Moreover a decree passed, that his flame riding on horseback should remain in the common place of assemblies, which was erected accordingly even before the Temple of Castor. To three States of the Hernicks, to wit, the Alatri- nats, the Venalians and Ferentinians, their own laws, and ancient liberties were restored again, because they made choice thereof, rather than to be enfranchised Citizens of Rome; and permitted they were to marry amongst the Romans, which liberty only of the Hernicks for good I white enjoined. The Anagnins, and those that had born arms against the Romans were incor- porate free denizens of Rome, but without the privilege of giving voices and suffrages: debarred they were of holding any Councils and making marriages with them; and, denied at all to elect any magistracy, but only the function and ministry of divine service and sacrific- es.

The same year the Chappell of flame Salus was by C. Junius Babuleus now Confer, set out at a price to be built, which he in his Contufhip had vowed, in the Samnits war. By his direc- tion and appointment, together with his colleague M. Valerius Maximus, were the great high waxes and cauleys made, of all fides of the City, through the fields, at the common charge and expense. The same year also, was the league renewed the morth time with the Carthaginians: and their Embassadors who came for that purpose, were courteously entertained, and rewarded liberally with rich gifts. In that year there was a Dictator P. Cornelius Scrba, with P. Decius General of the force: and there were Presidents at the Election of Consuls, for to that purpose they were created, because neither of the two Consuls could be spared from the wars, Consuls were created L. Polliam, and T. Minnius. But Piso layeth, that these Consuls immediately succeeded Q. Fabius and P. Decius: leaving out those two years, wherein he hath written that Claudius with Volumnius, and Corneilius with Martius were Consuls. Whether he forgot himself in digressing his Annals and yearly records, or of let purpose overhilt two couple of Consuls, thinking that they were not in truth Consuls, I wit not.

The same year the Samnits made rodes into the territories of Stella, within the liberties and ap- L purtences of the Campains, and therefore both Consuls were sent into Samnium: who when they were parted into divers wayes, for Polliam it took his journey to Tiferum, and Minnius to Bo- vianum: first there was batell fought at Tiferum, under the leading of Polliam. Some make no doubt, but write, that the Samnits were discomfited, and put to the worste, and thirty thou- sand of them taken prisoners: others say, that the conflict was equal, and that they departed on even hand: also that Polliam making semblance of feare, journeyed by night, & closely retired unto the hills adjoining; the enemies followed after them, two miles, and from thence encamped, and fortified alo themselves in strong places of advantage. The Conful, because he would be thought to have fought and chose a safe place, and plentifully flored with all necessaries (as it was no lefe indeed) where he might keep a standing camp; after he had fortified the same, and fur- nished it with all kind of provition, leaving behind him a strong garrision for defence; at the relief of the third watch, leadeth the neerest way, his legions not encumbered with carriages, to his Col- league, who alo himself lay in camp over against another army. There, by the persuasion & advice of Polliam, Minnius gave battell; and when as the conflict continued doubltfull until it was far on the day; then Polliam with his fresh legions, upon a sudden charged the battellions of the enemies, now already overjoyed; and partly for want of arms, and partly for wounds, they being disabled for to flee away, were out of all measure thin ever one, and with banners were taken: and to from thence they went forward to the camp of Polliam. Where theetwo victorious armies finding the enemy discouraged and amazed at the tidings of this overthrow, set upon them, discomfited, and put them to flight; and wan from them xxxi. enignes: where the General of the Samnits Statius Celius, with many a man besides, was taken prisoner, and both their camps won. Bovianum also, which the mowor after began to be assaulted, was shortly after forced; and finally with great glory of no noble acts achieved, both Consuls triumphed. Some write that the Conful Minnius, being grievously hurt, was brought back into the camp, and there dyed: and that M. Fulvius was substituted Conful in his room: and that it was he, who being fent unto the army of Minnius, was Bovianum. The same year Soris, Arpinum, and Consecta were recovered from the Samnits: and the great Image of Hercules was in the Capitol set up and dedicated.

When as P. Sulpicius Caesar, and P. Sempronius Sosips were Coll. the Samnits defiring e- ther to see an end of war, or else to delay it, sent Embassadors to Rome pretending peace. To whom "as they pleaded and intreated most humbly, this answer was given: That if the Samnits had not "so often treated for peace, when they intended and prepared war they might after certain en- "tratives, and conferences passed between, obtain their suit: but since that evermore until that "time, their words were but wind; now they would truft to their deeds, and nothing else. P. "Sempronius the Conful, shall shortly be in Samnium with an army: who would not be abused, "but soon see, whether their minds be inclined to war or peace: and as he found and saw every "thing, so would he bring word and make relation and therefore their Embassadors were to attend upon Upon the Consul when he departed out of Samnium. The same year after that the Romans army had pailed peaceably to and fro, and visited all Samnium, having victuals by the country courteously allowed, the ancient league was granted again to the Samnites. From thence turned the Romans their forces against the Equians, their old enemies: but for many years making semblance of quietness, where as indeed their peace was little to be trusted: for that the Hernicks nation was at ease and on foot, they with them, had used oftentimes under hand to send aid unto the Samnites: and after the subduing of the Hernicks, the whole nation in a manner without dissembling, and averring all they did by publick counsell and authority, had fallen away unto the enemy: and after that the Romans had made league with the Samnites, and their heralds came to make claim for their goods took from them by way of hostility, they said, It was but a tempering of them, to see, whether upon fear of war they would suffer themselves to become Romans. Which, say they, how greatly it were to be with'd, the Hernicks was able to teach them; for they, as many of them as had liberty to do what they would, chose rather to live under their own laws, then to be enthranched citizens of Romans: but others, who had not the same scope to choose to their liking, they were constrained to accept of the Burgeoise of their City, by way of punishment. Upon these speeches and arguments commonly toiled in their assemblies and Councils, the people of Rome decreed war against the Equians: to which both the Consuls went, and encamped four miles from their enemies camp. The Equians (who in their own behalf, and for any quarrell of theirs, had many years sat still and made no war) like as if their army had been levied of a sudden and in haste, without certain Captains appointed, and without any General to command, were afraid. Some thought good to go forth into the field, others to defend themselves, and keep within their camp: most of them were moved to think aforesaid upon the wasting of their country afterwards, and consequently the destruction of their cities left but with slender garrisons. Therefore after that, as amongst many opinions, this only had audience, namely, to abandon the care of publick west and every man to regard his own private state, and at the first watch to depart divers waies one from the other, and the quit, the cam, and convey away all their bag and baggage, and to defend their Cities within the walls: they all with one accord accepted thereof, and embraced it. Now when the enemies were thus scatter'd abroad about the country, the Romans by day-light, with banner displayed went forth into the field: and when they saw no man come abroad to meet them, they marched in warlike order space towards the enemies camp. But when they could perceive there, neither warders before the gates, nor any man upon the trench & rampiers, nor so much as the usual noise of a garrison, being moved with this unaccustomed silence, for fear of Forlaying and treachery, they stood still: but being got over the rampier, and finding the tents void and empty, they set forward to pursue the enemy by his trace. But when they found their foot-tracks, leading to all parts of the Country alike: as being flipt here and there, funday and divers waies; at the first they wandered out of the way, and misseth of them; but afterwards knowing by their eipials the purpose and intent of their enemies, they went round about and besieged every City, and in three or four days won forty towns: all by assault: most part whereof were razed even with the ground, and consumed into ashes, and the nation of the Equians utterly in a manner despoiled. Over the Equians there was triumph; Whole calamity and desolation was to fearfull an example, to the Marrucins, Marfi, Peligni, and Ferentins, that they sent Orators to Rome to treat for peace and amity: and to all those nations at their request, a league was granted. The same year, C. Flavius; a Notary or Register by profession, whose father Cneus was no better than of a slave made free, a man thus descened of bale and low parentage, howbeit otherwise crafty and eloquent withal, arose to be an Aedile Curule. I find in some records, that when he gave attendance in his calling to the Aediles, and law that his own Tribe were willing to give him their voices and elect him Aedile, but his name not accepted of among other competitors, for that he got his living by his pen, he caste aside his books and papers, and ware an oath, that he would no longer be a Notary and use pencraft. But Maecii Licinius avoucheth, that a good while before, that he gave over his writing, namely, after he had been Tribune, and borne two Triumphs, the one for the night miracles, the other for the placing and transporting of a Colony. But they all agree upon this, that he became very froward, and in great contumacy opposed himself and made head against the Nobles that constrained his safe birth. The civil law which before time was laid up in great secret by the Priests, and Prelats in their Arches, he published abroad: and set up a table in the great common place, in manner of a Calendar, wherein all men might know worke-dates from holy-days: when it was lawfull to plead, and when not. Alfo in despite, and to the great heart burning of the Patritii, he dedicated the temple of the goddeffe Concord upon the Court of Vulsos: and by the general consent of the people, Cornelius Barbaqui the high Priest was compelled to endure and pronounce the certain form of words thereto belonging; notwithstanding he condescended and denied, that by the custome of their forefathers any could dedicate a Temple, unlefe he were either Consul or General of an army. And therefore by the authority of the Senate, a law was preferred to the people, That no man might dedicate a Temple or Altar, without permission and consent of the Consul, or the more part of the Tribuns of Commons. I will report in this place a thing, of itself not worthy of remembrance, but only for a proof and example of the liberty of the Commons against the pride and inofencie of the Nobles. This Flavius, coming upon a time to visit his Colleague lying sick, by a complot afore hand of certain young gentle-gentleman of the Patricians that sat by his bed side, had no reverence done unto him, nor any one to much as role up at entrance into the chamber: whereupon, he commanded his ivory chair of state to be brought unto him and let him tell upon it; and he exposed his adversaries, that were too vexed to the heart with envy of his dignity, This Flaminus was nominated & chosen Edile, by the bale faction of the commoners, banding together in the place of assemblies; who first took heart by the Censorship of Appius Claudius the first that ever distained and polluted the Senate, by bringing in the Sons of Libertins: and when he saw that no man accounted that Election of Senators good and lawful, and perceived with all, that in the Court he had not that backing of Citizens which he sought for; he intermingled in every Tribe certain of the most base portion of the Commons: and if he corrupted both the common place and Mars field also. In to much as the Election of Flaminus was reputed to unworthy an indignity, that molt of the gentlemen of Rome laid away their gold rings and rich trapping of their horses which were the ornaments and ensigns of their calling. And from the time forward the City was divided into two parts. One side was maintained and upheld by the true hearted people, such as favoured and loved good things; the other by the faction of ruffe-raife and licen of the City; until the time that Q. Fabius and P. Decius were created Seniors, Fabius to bring the City unto an uniform accord, and to withstand this inconvenience, that the Elections of Magistrates should not be carried away by the strong hand of the vilest and molt abject petition, made a separation of all that base rabble; and cast them into four Tribes, and called them Virtutes, Which action of his men lay was accepted with great concurrence and thankfulness; that upon the good temperature of degrees, he purchased the surname of Maximus, which in so many victories he had not acquired and obtained. By him also (by report) it was ordained and instituted, that on the Ides of July, the horsemen rode, as it were, in a solemn muster, and throwing their great horsethorns to the Centaur.

The Breaviary of L. Flaminus upon the Tenth Book.

Two Colonies were planted in Sora and Alba. The mansions of Carcoca, were reduced under obedience. The dominion of the Angerus was augmented to the number of nine, whereas before they were wont to be but four. The law or edict as touching the appealing to the people, was now the third time proposed by Valerius the Consul. Two Tribes more were added to the ruffe, of Aniens and Terentins. War was denounced against the Samnites, and formally fought with them. What time as there was a battle given to the Taenians, Undrivers, Samnites and Gauls, under the conduct of P. Decius, and Qninius Fabius, and the Roman army was in great extremity of danger. P. Decius following the example of his father,.devoted and exposed himself to die voluntarily, for to save the loft: and by his death obtained the victory of that journey, to his countrmen and fellow Citizens. Papirius Curcius put to flight an army of the Samnites, who were bound by a solemn oath not to depart out of the battle without victory, to the end that with more magnanimity and resolution, they should enter into the field. The Consul was held, and the number taken of the Citizens, with the solemn purging and Infratation of the City. And asscssed there were 26554 als.

The Tenth Book of T. Livius.

Hen L. Geminius and Ser. Cornelius were Consuls, there was rest in a manner from all wars abroad; in such sort, as they had leisure to place certaine Colonies at Sora and Alba: And for Alba there were enrolled 6000 inhabitants, to affort the Aquarions. As for Sora, it had sometimes belonged to the Volcellians territory; but the Samnites usurped the possession of it, and thither four thousand were sent to inhabit. The same year, the Arpinians and Tebulians were infranchisled denizens at Rome. The Frusines were fined with the lofe of one third part of their lands: for they were evidently detected to have collitectd the Herricks or rebellions, and after that the Consul Commission from the Senat, had made due inquisition; the principal heads of that conspiracy, were couraged and becheад, yet because there should not pass a year clean without war, a journey was made (such a one as it was) into Umbria; upon news, that there used to issue forth day by day, certain men in arms out of a cave, and to make rodes into the country about. Into this cave or peak, the Romans entred with their eninges dispayed: where by reason that it was a blind corner, they received many a wound, and specially by throwing of stones.
A stones; until such time as they found the other mouth of the cave (for it was a thorough-fare.) So they piled a deal of wood together at both ends, and lit it on fire: with the smoke and vapour whereof, there were about 2000 armed men driven out of their hole, who rushing at last into the flame destrous to escape, were smothered and burnt to ashes.

When as M. Livius Dentor, and C. Asinius, were Consuls, the Equians began to war again: for they hardly could abide and endure, that a Colony should be planted upon their borders, as a frontier-forbes to bridile them, and affaid by all kind of force to win the same: but they were lultly repulsed by the Inhabitants only within the towne. Howebeit, a year they made at Rome, because it was not thought credible, that the Equians alone of themselves, to dispossed as they were, would be so hardy as to take arms, that in regard of that trouble, a Dictator was named to wit C. Furius Babuleus, with T. Titinius General of the horse. Who at the first conflict subdued the Equians, and upon the eighth day of his government returned into the City in triumph: and now the Dictator, dedicated the Temple of Salus, which he had vowed being Consul, and had put to workmen for to be builded, while he was Censor.

The same year a fleet of Greeks under the conduct of Cleonymus a Macedonian, arrived upon the coast of Italy, and won Thorius, a City of the Salencins. Against this enemy was the Conful Asinius sent, who in one battle dicommitted him, and drove him aboord. Thus Thorius was rendred again to the former Inhabitants, and the Salentine Country obtained peace and quietness.

I find in some Records, that it was Junius Brutus the Dictator who was sent to the Salencins: and that Cleonymus before he was to encounter with the Romans, departed out of Italy. From whence he fetched a compas, and doubled the point of Brundisium, and sailed with a forewind through the midst of Venus gulph: for that on the left hand the Havens and harbours coasts of Italy, and on the right, the Illyrians, Liburnians, and Ilarians, fierce nations, and for them most part, reputed infamous; for roving and robbing by the sea-side, put him in exceeding fear. So he arrived at length upon the river of Venus, lying far within the threes, and there he landed a few to discover the Coasts: but hearing that the frond that lay out against them was not broad and spacious, and when they were past over it, there were behind them the plashies (as it were) overflowed with the sea-tides, and that not far off might be seen the champaign fields near hand, and hills beyond; and disovering by this means the mouth of a very deep river, into which he law, that the ships might be brought about as into a lure harbour (now that rivers name was Medeum) thither he commanded, that the Armada should put in, and to make full up against the stream. The heaviest vessels, the chanal of the river would not bear; but the lighters were transported in lighter barks and small pinaces, and so fell at length with the levell and the plain Country, frequented with much people, by reason that three sea towns of the Patavins, inhabited that Territory. Being once landed, and having left a stender guard for their ships, they take Towns by assault, burn houses, plunder and drive away prizes both of men and cattle: and when they had once taint of the sweetness of booty and pilage, they went far from their ships. The alarm thereof was given at Patavinia (now the Patavins were always in arms, because of the Gauls their borderers.) Whereupon they divided their fighting youth into two regiments: the one was led into thole quarters whereas the report went, that the Greeks forraged here and there all abroad: the other, because they would these meet with the robbers and rovers, was conducted another way to the harbour, where the first wind (about fourtene miles from the Town, and after they had flain the warders, they charged upon the small barks. Whereupon the mariners were afraid, and were forced to retire their vessels to the other bank-side. Likewise upon the main they sped as well in fight against those draglings rovers: for when as the Greeks fled back to recover the harbour, the Venetians encountered them afoot, and made head against them. So the enemies were environed in the midle, and most of them slain: some that were taken prisoners, bewrayed what their fleet was, and that King Cleonymus was three miles off. There, when they had followed the prisoners lure enough in ward within the next village; some man with foulords their river-vessels, made fetty and framed with flat bottoms, for to pass over the meers and shallow waters: others embark armed men in the small gallions taken from the enemies, and made way space to give an assault upon the main fleet, and beleit those ships which fled at anchor, and durst not weigh and remove, fearing not the enemy, so much as the unknown coasts. Thele, I say, they environed, and charged upon them: and when they made halfe to gain the deep and open sea, without any resistance at all, they were purrined and chasped into the mouth of the river. Thus when they had taken the enemies ships, and fired others, namely, such as for fear and haste were driven upon the shelve, and run a-ground, then they returned with victory. Cleonymus hardly laved the fifth part of his fleet, and thus having had no good luck in attempting to land in any coast of the Adriatic sea, he departed. The items of the ships, with their beak-heads, and brazen pikes, together with the spoils of the Macedonians, were set up in the old Temple of Juno, and there be many at this day alive, which have seen them. The memorial of this sea-fight, is celebrated yearly (upon the very same day that it was fought) at Patavinia, with a solemn skrimish and combate of ships represented upon the river, within the midde of the City.

The same year was a League made at Rome with the Vellins, who came to sue for peace and amity. But from that time, there arose many and divers fearful occurrences. For news came, that that Haterius rebelled, which troubles took their beginning by occasion of the civil dissension and discord of the Aretins: who began to expel by force of arms the house and family of the Licinius (mighty and puissant above the rest) for very envy and repine of their wealth and riches. Over and besides, the Maritans stood out, and by arms maintained their title to that part of their territory, into which there had been a Colony of Carieolans brought to the number of four thousand men, enrolled there to inhabit. Against which fits and tumults, Marcus Vatellus Maximus was created Dictator, who made choice of M. Amylius Paulus to be the Commander of the Horse. Which I rather believe to be true, than that Q. Fabius, a man of those years and that worth, after so many honourable dignities, should be under V.terius. But I would not deny, that the error might grow by reason of the surname of Maximus. The Dictator having taken the field with his Army, in one battell discomfited the Maritans: and after he had driven them into their walled and fenced Towns, Milesiuns, Pleziuns, and Frebius within few daies, he won them all over their heads: and having fined the Maritans with the lots of some part of their Territory, he received them into their ancient League again. Then all the forces were employed against the Tuscans: and whilsts the Dictator was departed to Rome to take his Aupices anew, the General of Horse, being gone out a foraying, was by a secret ambush entrapped. And having lost certain enigns, he was forced into the Camp, after a foul slaughter and shamefull flight of his men. Which fearfull cowardice is not like to have been in Fabius, not only, because if ever he desired his surname of Maximus by any commendable parts, it was especially for his prowess in war: but also, for that in remembrance of Papirius K his cruelty toward him, he never could have been brought to fight, without the commandment or permission of the Dictator. This discomfiture and loss being reported at Rome, caused a greater terror than there was content. For no less than if the Army had been utterly defeated, there was published and proclaimed a lay and cession of all law, matters, wardersbeing allowed at the gates, order taken for standing watches in every street, and armour and darts carried up to the walls. And after that all the younger sort were sworn and prifon to serve the Dictator was sent again to the Army. Where, he found all more quiet than he looked for, through the careful diligence of the Generall of Horse. The Camp was removed to a place of more strength and safety, the bands and companies which had lost their enigns, left on the bare earth without the rampiers, defitute of tents and covert; and the army eager and desirous of fight, to do away and root out the former ignominie and shame. Preffently therefore, he raised his Camp, and removed forward into the Country of Rufella. Thither followed the enemies also hard at heels: Who albeit upon their late good speed they were in right great hope and affiance, to be strong enough even in open fight and plain field; yet they assailed the enemy also by the fame fleights and trains which they had already fortunately tried. There founded to be in the country thereabout, not far from the Romans Camp, certain hovels half pulled down and ruinous, belonging to a village which was burned when the country was over-run: where, after they had betolowed dolefully certain men in arms, they drave their beasts and carret in the very fight of the Roman corps de guer, commanded by C. Fulvius, a Lieutenant: at which bate, when as there slipt no man from the Roman wards, one of the Headsman advanced even under the M very trench and fortifications of the Romans, and called aloud to the Dictator (that seemed for fear to drive out slowly from the ruins of the village aforesaid) asking why they stayed behind, seeing they might safely march and pass forward still (as it were) through the middle of the Roman Camp? These words certain Caritis interpreted to the Lieutenant Fulvius. Whereat, every band or company of soldiers took great indignation, but durft not stir a foot without a warrant. Then he commanded those that were skillful in the tongue to mark whether their language sounded nearer to the speech of peafants or to Citizens: Who brought word, that both their voice, and the habit and fresh hue of their bodies, was more elegant and civil than for country shepherds. Go your wales then quoth he unto them and bid them beware and discover their ambush, which in vain they seem to hide: for that the Romans were cunning in all things, and advertised of their designs, and could no more now be overtaken with wiles, than overcome by arms. Wherefore these words were once heard and carried to those that lay in wait, presently they started up out of their lurking holes, and brought forth their enigns all abroad into the open field. The Lieutenant imposing they were a greater troop than might be dealt withall and matched by his corps de guer, with all speed for aid to the Dictator: and in the mean while himself received and bare off the brunt and forcible charge of his enemies. This message was no sooner brought, but the Dictator commanded the standards to be advanced, and the soldiers to arm and follow: but every thing was done sooner almost than it could be commanded: forthwith they caught up the enigns and took weapon in hand: and fiercely could they be held in, but that they would run away. For not only the piteful anger of the late received losses pricked them on, but also the loude of their fellows, which they might hear more loud, and to be redoubled thicker according as the skirmish grew hotter and hotter. The greater haste therefore they made, whiles one puttheth forward another, and richeth to the port-enigns to go faster and mend their pace. But the more haste the Dictator feeth them to make, the more earnest was he to keep them back in their march, and to hold them in: willing them to go fair and softly. Contrariwise the Tuscan, who rose up at the beginning of the battle, were there ready with their whole forces to give the charge. Whereupon there came messenger after messenger to the Dictator, bringing word that all the legions Legions of the Tuscans were entred into the fight, and that his men already were not able to refitt any longer. Nay himself also, from the higher ground, might fee in what danger the corps de guard was. But preluming and refitting upon this conceit, that the Lieutenant was able yet to maintain fight, considering that he was not far off himself to help and save him out of peril, he was deuisous that the enemies might be weased and tired amuch as was possible, and that his own or es at breath and in heart, should gent upon them overtoile, and albeit they went softly forward, yet by this time had the Horflemen but a very small ground to take their run with full career. For nothing marred the enigns of his legions, that the enemy should notice any covers and privy forftrumg, but leave good spaces and distances between the files of their footmen, through which the Horfes

B might have room and liberty enough to gallop with ease. Then all the battalion of the Infantry set up a cry and shout when they charged, and withal, the Cavalry, with reins at large entred within the ranks of the enemies, who being not marshalled and set in order against such a bluffling form of Horfemen, were with a sudden fear affonied. Whereupon, the troop of Praetorians which were in manner environed and compassed about, and had help and refuge almost too late, now all in general breathed themselves at ease, and were put to nothing. For these that came fresh and liuely took the whole weight of the conflict: which was neither long nor doubtful. The enemies were put to flight, and in diurnal made haste to recover their camp. And when as the Romans advanced against them with banner displayed, they quit their place and retreated, gathering themselves round into heaps in the fairest part of the camp: and as they C would have fell out, they fiek fai in the narrow gaps and passages of the gates: a great part of them leapt upon the back, to climb the rampier, if haply either from the higher ground they might defend themselves, or get over any where and escape. By chance in one place where the back was not well rammed, the rampier was forcharged with the weight of so many standing upon it, and so tumbled down into the trench. Whereupon, they set up a cry all together, That the Gods had made them way to escape, and by that means indeed they saved themselves, but more of them unarmed than armed. In this battre, were the forces of the Tuscans once again utterly abated: in so much as, after they had capitulated and promised 3 years pay, and corn for two months, the Dictator permitted them to send Embassadors to Rome for a treaty of peace. Peace was denied, but truce for two years granted: and the Dictator with triumph returned into the

D City, I flnd in some writers: that Heremns was by the Dictator quartered, within without notable baterl only by composing the variance and debate of the Aureins, and reconciling the family of the Lusini with the Commons.

M. Valerius upon his Dictatorship became Conful. Some have believed that he was created without his own fuit, yes, and while he was absent, and that the said Election was held by the Intergent. But howsoever it was, out of all question, he bare the Consilship with Apleius Panis. Whilest MValerius and Q. Apulius were Coft, all was well quieted abroad: for the Tuscas of one side, partly upon their ill success in war and partly by reason of their truce, were forced to be still and in repose. The Samnites also on the other side, being well tamed with the overthrows so many years together, repented not yet and were not weary of their new league. At Rome likewise, the Commons were quiet, and found themselves much eated, and diil barged of a great number of baile and poor people, which were withdrawn and sent away into Colonies. But because their rest should not be everywhere entirely and perpetually, there arose a quarell between the chief and principal men of the City: as well the Nobles as Commons, and that by the ingeuation and infligation of Q. and Cu. Opulli, Tribunes of the Cm. Who having fought occasion and matter every where to accuse and blame the Nobility into the Commons; when they law all means afayed in vain, at length entered into an action, whereby they kindled and set on fire not only the meanest, but even the chiefheads of the Commons such as had been Confuls, and triumphed: who wanted no promotions and honors, but only Sacerdotal dignities and Prelacies: which as yet were not in differentely common to both states. They proposed therefore a Law, That whereas at that time F there were but 4 Augurs and as many Prelats or Bishops, and forasmuch as they thought it good, that the number of Priests should be in ceated, there might be chote to the refi, 4, Bishops, and 5, Augurs, all out of the body of the Commons. But how this Colledge or Fellowship of Augurs, was reduced to the number of four, but by the death of two, I can not find: for since this is certain, that among the Augurs the number must be odd: namely that the three ancient tribes, Romanes, Sutriens, and Lucceres, should have each one their Augur: or if they needed more, they shouid with equal number increase three Priests: like as they were augmented and multiplied, when as five being put to four, made up the number of nine: that is to say, for every tribe three. Howbeit, because they were chote out of the Commons who should supply, and make up the number: the Nobles took it as grievously to the heart, as when they law the Consilship parted equally in G common: but they made rethance as though this indignity pertained to the Gods more than to them: who would themselves see, that their holy service and sacred mysteries should not be pollut. And as for them, this only they could do, namely pray and with, that no calamity thereby should light upon the common-wel. But let's earnest were they in opposing themselves and making resianlce, for that they were ned already in all such broils and contentions to have the worst and they law besides, that their adversarys that not at that (which in time pit they could scarce hope for) namely, the greatest honours and dignities: but that they had already obtained all, for which they had strive so long: in doubtful terms of hope, to wit, manifold Confulats.
Cenforships, and Triumphs. Howbeit, the contention and dispute in debating and arguing to and from the law propounded, was maintaine (as men say) between Ap. Claudius especially, and P.
Decius Mus; and after they had contended and discoursed in their Orations pro & contra, the same reasons in manner, touching the rights and liberties pretended by the Nobles and Commons, which sometimes had been alienated, both for, and against the law Lexinter, at what time as it was last on foot for the Commons to be Confuls; Decius (as it is said) represented in open audience the very semblance and flow of his father's, in such manner, as many of them who were then present at this solemn, had seen him; to wit, gilded and apparelled in Gabinie robe, standing over his pulvin, in which gesture, habit, and fashion, he offered himself to voluntary death, for to save the people and legions of the Romans; * Seemed (quoth he) P. Decius, that I then was Coh, as pure and religious in the sight of the immortal Gods, as if T. Manlius his colleague had been likewise so, and offered it, and might not the same? P. Decius have rightly been chosen, to execute the publique divine rites and sacrifices of the people of Rome? or is this all the fear and doubt, that the Gods would give leis ear to his prayers, than to Ap. Claudius or doth Ap. Claudius with more devotion serve God privately, and worship the Gods more religiously, than himself? Who was there ever that repented or milked of the yows, which fo many Confuls and Dictators of the Com, either at their first setting forth to their armies, or in time of war and battle, pronounced for the Common-wealth? Reckon and count the chief Captains, year by year, since the first time that the Commons began to have the leading and conduct of the wars: number all the triumphs ever since; it will appear that the Commons are K no whit abashed, and have no caule to complain of their own nobility, and This I know for certain, that if any new sudden war should arise, the Senat and people of Rome would repole no more hope and confidence in the ancient Patritius, than in the Com, for to be the Captains and Commanders. This being so, quoth he, what God or man can think it an indignity, to adorn those persons aloof with the titles and ornaments of Bishops and Augurs, whom ye have honoured with chair of Tribly, with the long robe bordered with purple, with the coat of arms embroidered and branched with the palm tree, with the gown or mantle of purple; wrought with divers colours, with the chaplets and coronets of triumph, and with the victorious branch and garland of laurel; whole houles ye have beautified above the rest, with letting up the piloys of e enemies? Or who can think much, if he be ridden with a facring cup, or holy-water pot, and with L a croifor staff, and his head vailed, either to kill a sacrifice, or to take Augury by flight of birds from the cattle hill, who hath been adorned and decked with the emblems and ornaments of the great God Jupiter, and hath ridden in a gilded chariot through the City into the Capitol? Or in whole Title, inscription and title over his image, men shall with content, read Confulship, Cenforship and Triumph: will not the same abide to see and read that ye have added thereunto ei-er Augurship, or Pontifical dignity? I verily for my part hope (without the displeasure, and with reverence of the Gods beit spoken) that we by the beneficence of the people of Rome are such, as for our quality and worthines, may and will yeild no less credit and honor to our Priefh-hoods than we shall receive thereby: and who desire, in regard of the honor and service of God, more than for our own titles and proper intrinse, to have the means, That whom we M serve and reverence in private, there we may also worship and honor publickly. But why have I hitherto to pleaded the causes, if the Purtius were entirely alone intrinse and invested in the prerogative of Sacerdotal Dignities; and as though we were not already possessed of one right honorable and principal Priefh-hood? We feate that the Decemvirs for celebration of sacrifices, and for interpretation of Sibylla her Prophecies, and other the fatal ditines of this people, the Prelates alio and Ministers of Apis his sacrifice, and other Holy Ceremonies, are of the Commons. Neither was there any injury done unto the Purtius at that time, when for to gratifie the Commons, the number of the Dumuvis was in creased; thou I mean, who should oversee (as superintendents) the offering of sacrifices. And now at this present they have no greater cause to complain, if the Tribun, a stout and brave man hath added five places more of Augurs, and four N of Bishops, unto which commissioners may be nominated: not to dispossess of your rooms, or to displace you, O Appius, but that men of the commons might shif you in the Faction and ministry of divine lercs and Church matters, as like as they do their part, and perform good ferhces in their several-quarters. And be not ashamed, O Appius, to have him for your colleague in the Prieff-hood and their affaires. And be not afraid, O Appius, to have him for your colleague

A. As is spoken, that the Patres were at first made and created, and not descended from Heaven; but that they were able to name their father and grandfathers; that is to say, even free men, just, and no more? What? I say, I can nominate already mine own father to have been a Consul, and shortly shall my son be able to allude to his grandfathers. There is nothing else. O Varrus, in the matter whereunto we stand, but that we may obtain all which hath been denied us. For the Nobles desire only to maintain a title and to contend, and care not greatly what title their contentions come unto. As for me, I do advise, and this would I have. That (to the good profit, and happy fate of you all, and the weak publick) this law may pass under your affirmative vote, [vulgarly.] Then presently the people commanded the Tribes to be called to a triumbus: and soon it appeared, that the law would without all doubt be accepted: but that day was lost, by the opposition and negative of some Tribunes. Howbeit, the morrow after, they were afraid to ratify it: and then with an exceding content of all hands it passed clear. So there were created Prelats or Bishops; first, P. Diccius Man; himself (that to pleaded for the law) with P. Sem-pronius Sophus, C. Marius Radnitt, and M. Livius Dexter. Likewise five Augurs of the Commons, to wit, C. Quirinius, P. Fulvius Flatus, M. Manlius Felix, C. Marius, and T. Publius. So there were eight Prelats in number, and nine Augurs.

The same year, CM. Varrus the Consul, procured the law of appealing to the people, more surely to be established and confirmed. This was now the third time after the deposition of the Kings, that this one Act was revived; and always by the same houfe or family of the Vellers. The Caius of removing the same too often, was no other I Laplace, than this; for that the mightie some of some great men of the Patres, was more powuerful then the liberty and freedom of the Commons. Only the Law Portus, feemeth to have been enacted for to fave the back and sides of Citizens from whipping because that it was awarded and fet a grievous punishment upon him, that either had beaten or killed a Citizen of Rome. The Law Vellera, which forbid, to louge or behold any man whatsoever, that made his appeas bhad this annexed only, that if any one had trelpassed and proceeded farther, it should be decreed, Lati. cedera. Such was the model and reverence of men in those days, that this one addition [in my conceit verily] was inspored to be a sufficient bond to strengthen the Law. But now adays, would a man fiercely threaten his tenant or flave in that manner.

D. The same Consul made war, without any worthy or memorable exploit, against the Equians that rebelled: who (setting aside their fluent and proud orators) had nothing left of their ancient fortune and estate. The other Cofl. Apuleius, besieged the Town "Nepetum in Umbritis." The place was difficult and hard to get up, and on the one side deep down right (whereas now standdeth Narvies) so that it was impregnable either by assault, or countermares and fones whatsoever.
Whereupon, the new Consuls, M. Fulvius Flatus, and T. Maccius Torquatus, entered upon this enterprise, left undone and unfinished by the former. Now when all the Centuries nomiinated with one voice Q. Fabius for the Consulship of that year, even without his own suit and lea-kings, M. Donatus and Tubero do write, that he himself laboured to have that change put off, and referred unto a year of more war; alledging, that for the present he would serve the Common-weal in better head, by bearing some civil office in the City: and to no dissembling what he rather defir'd, nor yet seeking for it, he was made Edile of the Chair, with L. Paprinus Corfor. But, to let this down for a certain truth I dare not: because that Pius, a more ancient Writer of Chronicles, faith, that the Edilles Curule of that yeare, were C. Domitius, Ca. Fabius, Sp. Corvelius, and Q. Fabius Maximus. That surname, I Laplace verily, gave occasion of the error in the Ediles. Whereupon emis a tale (fortoing to that error) mixed and compounded of the Elections of Ediles and Consuls together. The same yeare was held a solemn survey and purging of the City by sacrifice, called Lyncrum, by P. Sempronius Sophus, and P. Sempronius Aventius, and two Tribes more were added to the ten, Aventius, and Tarpeian. And thus much concerning the affairs at Rome.

F. But now to return to Nepetum: after much time spent in long and lingering siege before the Town two of the inhabitants, whose houses joyed close to the wall, undermined the ground, and by a secret way came as far as the corps de garde of the Romans. From whence they were brought before the Consul, and promised him to let in and receive whatarrison and troop of armed men he would in the City. This offer was thought neither to be neglected and refused, nor yet rashly to be credited. So with one of these twain (for the other was kept behind as a hostage) two other spies were sent by the same mine to discover the train. By whose relation, when it ap-ppeared sufficiently, that all was false and without danger: by the leading and guiding of the traitor alreadied, 300 armed men by night entred the City, & feied that gate which was next unto them: at which, being broken open, the Consul and the Roman army without resistance, made entry and G. Surprised the City. In this sort Nepetum was reduced to the obedience of the people of Rome, A Coloney was thither sent to Frontier against the Umbrians, called of the * Rivers name [which runneth under it: * Narnia, And the army with a rich price was brought again to Rome.

The same year the Ticinians, contrary to the tenure of the truce, made preparation for war.
But whilst they were busily occupied otherwise, it was found, that a pillaring army of Gauls invasion did mix their bess, and for a while altered their dispositions. Afterwards, by the means of mony, whereof they were full and bare themselves mighty, they fough the make the Gauls, of countries to become their friends, and followed them to band together, and so jointly to maintain war with the Romans. Their society and friendship the barbarous people refused not only, if they found upon the item what they should have for their hire, Which being agreed upon and received, and all things in a readiness for to go into the field; when the Tuscaniers willed them to follow after, they heartily denied, that they had received any consideration for to make war upon the Romans: but whatsoever they had taken, it was because they should not waste the Tuscan Land, and by way of hostility and force of arms, do any violence upon the inhabitants: howbeit, if the Tuscaniers were so minded to employ them, they would be willing to serve, but for no other reward and remuneration, than to be admitted into parr of their territory; that at the length they might have some certain place of abode, to settle themselves in. Many Diets and conferences hereabout were held by the States of Tuscan, but nothing resolved and concluded: not to much, I for that they feared to part with some of their Lands, as because they were in great need every one and another, to have dwelling by them inch neighbours, detached from so savage a race and cruel Nation. Thus were the Gauls let go and dismissed, having away with them a huge mass of money, which they got without any travail or peril of theirs.

The bruit of the Gauls tumult and insurrection, together with the Tuscan war, caused no little fear at Rome. Whereupon, more haste was made to conclude a league with the *Piceens people. T. Marthinius the Consul had the charge of the Tuscan war allotted unto him. Who lately was entred into the confines of the enemies, but as he was training and exercising amongst the Heremen, he ran his Horse with full career, and suddenly as he turned about, was call'd off, and presently lay for dead: and so the Consul, three days after his fall, ended his life. Which the Tuscaniers, taking hold of, as a good omen token and preface, got heart and were very joyfull; saying, that the Gods had in favour of them, begun this war. This was heavy news at Rome, both for the loss of so brave a personage, and for the time, wherein it unhappily fell out: to as, the stumbles held (by the advice of the chief Peers) for to substitute a Consul in his place that was deceased, frighted the Senators from choosing a Dictator. All their sentences, and all the censure and M. Valerius to be Consull was the man, whom the Senar was about to have picked for Dictator. Then forthwith, they ordered him to go into Tuscan to the army, whose coming improved and kept under the Tuscaniers: so as not a man durst once go out of their trenches and hold. Even their very fear was as good as a siege unto them: for that the new Consul neither by waiting the fields, nor firing their houses in such fort, as every where, not only the small villages, but also the good and well-peopled Towns were seen to smoke and burn again, could draw them forth to fight.

This war continued longer than men thought: but behold, there arose a bruit of another: (which considering the mutiny looses of both sides, was for good causes greatly to be feared) upon intelligence given from the Piceners their new allies, namely, that the Samnits were about to take arms and rebel, and had solicited them also to do the same. The Piceniers were highly thanked for this, and a great part of the Senators care was diverted now from Tuscan to the Samnits. The death besides of corn and victuals troubled the City: and driven they had been to extrem famine, if *Publius Maximus (as they have written, who are of opinion that he was Edile that year) by provident purveying and diligent conveying of corn, had not been as careful and M industrious, in the dispensing of victual now as before, as many times before in war affairs. The fame year there was an Interciefe, but upon what occasion, it is not known. The Intercieferes were *App. Claudius and after him P. Sulpicius, who held an Election of Consules, and created *L. Cornelius Scipio and Os. Fulvius. In the beginning of this year, there came Orators from the Lucians to these new Consules, for to make complaint, That the Samnits, who by no conditions and means could induce them for to band and take arms with them, were entered into their confines, and made wait of the "country, and by very force provoked them to war, saying, That the Lucians had long ago over-thought and pacified themselves that way: but now they were fully resolute, that they could find in their hearts sooner to abide and endure all kind of calamity whatsoever, than ever after N to offend and displease the Roman name. They besought the Senar therefore, to receive the Lucians into their protection, and also to keep and defend them from the violence and injury of the Samnits. And for themselves, albeit entering into war already with the Samnits, they were of necessity obliged to be fait and true unto the Romans: yet for better security they were ready to put in further hostages. The Senar was not long consulting hereabout: but all with one consent were of opinion, to make league with the Lucians, and to summon the Samnits to make amends and restitution. The Lucians, besides a courteous and gracious answer, were accepted into the league. Then were there Ferial Heralds dispatched to the Samnits, to give them warning for to depart the territory of the Roman allies, and to withdraw their forces out of the confines of the Lucians. But the Samnits sent out certain messengers to meet them upon the way, and to pronounce unto them, that if they presented themselves in any Council within Samnium, they should not depart again with the safeguard of their persons. When these news were heard at Rome, both the Senar advised, the people also, to make war upon the Samnits. The Consules passed their Provinces and charges between themselves. To Scipio fell *Heterius, and the Samnits to Fulvius, and so to take their journey divers ways, each one to the war allotted unto him. Scipio looked for no other, but a lingering war at the enemies hands, and like to the defensive service of the former year: but behold, they with an army well appointed and arranged, A. arranged, encountered him and gave him battle near to *Volterra's, where they fought the better *Volterra, part of the day with much bloodshed on both sides: and whiles they were doubtful which way the victory went, the night came between. But the morning, after bewrayed both who were winners, and who were losers. For the Tuscanes in the still and dead time of the night diffolged. The Roman Conful coming forth into the field, and seeing by the enemies departure, the victory confessed went forward to the camp: which he found empty of men but full of rich pilage, (for they had fearfully and in great haste abandoned their tents) and was matter thereof. From thence he retir'd his forces into the territory of the Fabians: and after he had left at *Faleriius all his bag and baggage with a meetly garrison there; lightly appointed, he marched forward, and with a

B. running camp waited the marches and territories of his enemies. He put all to fire and sword: drove away booties from all parts: and left not the ground only, wall and defiles, but set fire also upon Citties and borrough Towns. Only he forbade the assault and great forrogs Cities, into which fear had driven the Tuscanes for refuge. On *Faleriius the Conful on the other part fought a noble battle in *Sannium, near *Boeazzus, and the victory was not whithout doubtful. After which he assisted *Boeazzus, and not long after *Anlisenus and both Cities he won by force. The same year was there a Colony brought to *Carfles within the territory of the *Aequiulus. And *Faleriius the Conful triumphed over the Sammites.

When now the time of the Conuls Election drew neere; there was a rumour raised, that the Tuscanes and Sammites were levyng and enrolling of great and mighty forces: that openly in all their

C. Assemblies and Dicts, the Princes of the Tuscanes were checked and reproved, for that they had not waged the Gauls to war, whatsoever it had cost them: that the Magistrates of the Sammites were blamed, for exposing that army as it were a prey unto the Romans, which had been provided against their enemies the Lucans. For now seeing that the enemies both with their own power, and allies with the help of their allies, were come to war: they should not be able to match them, having their forces thus redoubled. Now albeit there were other famous and renowned petitions to be Conuls, yet this new fear and affright turned all men to be come favourits of *Fabius in *Maximius: who at the first made no suit, and afterwards, seeing the inclination of their affections, renounced also to be Conul. Demanding what they meant to trouble and molest him, so aged a man as he was, and one, who as he had gone through all labours and travels of this

D. world: so he had passed also the rewards, and recompenses of his travels: alledgeing, that neither strength of body, nor vigor of spirit could always continue the fame and last for ever: and besides, he feared fortune her self, and lest haply the might be thought of any of the Gods too pro-pitious and favorable unto him, and more permanent than the ordinary train and course of this world would permit. Therefore, like as himself had grown up after the glory of his elders, and ascended them; so he law and beheld with joy of heart, others also rising up after him, and to succeed him in the like glory: and as there wanted not at Rome high promotions and advances for hardy and valiant men, so there failed not brave men of worth for to receive those honors and dignities. But this by his favour so just and reasonable he whetted and kindled more and more their earnest affections and favours towards him, which he thinking to

E. dull and quench, with the reverent regard and awe of the Laws, commanded a statute to be read, wherein it was not lawful for one and the same man within ten years to be created Conul twice. But fiercely for the noise that the people made, could this law be heard read: and the Tribunes of the Com, said, that this should be no less: for they would prefer a bill unto the people, that he might be discharged and dispens'd with from the Statutes in that behalf, howbeit he had full

f. in his rebuttal demanding of them what purpose and end were the laws made, if by the very means thereof, they might be thus deluded and made of no force? For to (q'd, he) laws ruled not, but were over-ruled. But nevertheless, the people went to a sitting, and began to give their voyces: and as every Conul was called into the rails, they named and chose *Fabius Conul, without sticking at the matter. Then at last, overcame with this general accord and consent of the whole City: God lay Amen (quoth he) O Quirites, to that you do and are about. But for as

G. much as you will have your will and dispose of me at your pleasure, do me this favour yet, that I may have the chusing of my Colleague, I beleeve you make Conul with me P.Decius, man approved unto me already, with whom, I have forst sett in the fellowship of another Office: a man I say, an icreable otherwise to the greatness of his name, and worthy of his fathers virtue, from whom he is descended. This favour which he requiz'd, seem'd unto them just and reasonable. So all the Centuries behind, created Q.Fabius and P.Decius Conuls.

The same year the Ediles terved proces upon very many Citizens: for holding and poffessing of more Lands, than by Law was limited: and none in a manner was able to acquit himself thereof. Which was a great bridge and restraint to their unmeasurable avarice. As the

H. new Conuls, Q.Fabius in *Maximius the fourth time, and P.Decius *Mars the third time, conferred and laid their heads together about their charges, that the one should take in hand the

I. Sammites, and the other the Tuscanes: and conferred what forces might serve and be sufficient for this or that Province and exploit: and to whether war either of them were the more meet and fittest Leaders; certain Embassadors from *Sarvium, * Nepet, and *Faleriius, advised them. That the States of Tuscane, were now consulting in their Dicts, about a Treaty of peace: which was an occasion, that they turned all their preparations and force into *Sannium. The Conuls being gone forth, to the end they might have the reader provision of grain and

Ce 3 virtuels,
Viduaus, and the enemy be more to seek, which way they would affail them, led their Legions into Samnium, but Furius, through the territory of Sarao and Decius by the way of the Sidinius. When they were come into the confines of their enemies, both of them spred themselves all abroad, and fell to forage and spoil the country: yet so, as they sent out their elpias farther than they waited. Whereupon, they were well aware of their enemies, as they lay in ambush well appointed, within a close and excited valley near Tesenum; what way as they thought to take the vantage of the higher ground, and to set upon the Romans to soon as they were one entred. Furius having removed his carriages into a secure place, and set there a competent guard for defence, fore-told his soldiers that there was a battle towards: and in a four-square battalion marched directly to the fortiérid Embacado, where the enemies lurked and lay in wait. The Samnits then, despairing and I out of all hope to do any great exploit by sudden tumult, considering their forces were discovered; and seeing they must once at the length come to the tryst in open field, were themselves also more willing to put all upon a quick bend. Thereupon they defended into the plain and even ground, and committed themselves to the fortune of fight, with more courage of heart than hope of victory. But were it, that they had assembléd together the whole force and multitude out of all the Nations of the Samnits, or that the hazard of the main chance made them more hardly and take the better heart: surely even in plain field, they held the Romans play and put them to great fear. Furius seeing the enemies no way to retreat and give ground, commanded M. Flavius and M. Valerius, two Colonels, with whom he had set forward and advanced into the foremost, to go to the Horsemen, and to escort them, If ever they remembered and called to mind, that the K. Common-wealth had been helped by the valor of the Gentlemen on horseback: they should that day endeavour to make invincible and eternal the glory of that degree and order of Cavalry. For seeing that the enemies stood immovable against the Infantry, there was no other hope but in the force of Horsemen; and here withal he called upon those two young Gentlemen, and playd both the one and the other with like courtesy, once, twice prasing them, another whiles lobing them with fair and large promises. But when the, as the essay of the force was new, prevailed not thinking where strength would take no place, there craft was to be tried and practised; he caused Scipio his Lieutenant, to withdraw out of the conflict, the javelins of the first legion, and as closely as he could to fetch about with them, toward the next hills: and then, to march up the hill some way from the sight of the enemies; and after he had gained the top, all of a sudden to L. shew himself behind, and charge upon the enemies backs, whiles their faces were turned another way. Now the Horsemen, by the direction of those two Colonels, being ridden of a sudden before the standards, troubled their own fellows almost as much as the enemies. For against these troops and corners of Horse that thus violently put forward, the Samnits battel stood immovable, and on no part could either be forced to retreat, or to break their array. The Horsemen when they saw this attempt to take no effect, retired themselves behind the ensigns, and departed out of the bater. Hereupon took the enemies more heart unto them; neither had the vanguard of the Romans been able to abide so long a conflict, and the violence of the enemies still encroaching, upon their own confidence, but that the second ranges in the middle way, by the Conful his commandment, came forward into the front of the vanguard. Where they with their fresh strength M flayed the Samnits, being now ready to enter forcibly upon them, and to gain the ground; and withal, at the time appointed, the ensigns shewed themselves from the hills, and came down, aware to the enemies; and letting a few, not only daunted the hearts of the Samnits, but al- ternately the Romans. For both Furius cried aloud, that his Colleague Decius approached, and every soldier for his part, what he might, with joyful and cheerful hearts, iterated, that the other Conful was come, and the legions were at hand. Which error and misaking, it turned to the good of the Romans, so it causd the Samnits to flie, and to be surprized with a fright, fearing and doubting nothing so much, as that being now overroiled and wearied, they should be overcharged also with fresh and liable forces. And for that in their running every way, they were shattered slanderly; there was left slaughter than for the preparation of so great a victory. For 3400 men only were slain, and of prisoners were taken, wenee three hundred and thirty; and three and twenty bowders and ensigns were wretched and carried away. The Apulians had joyned with the Samnits before the battle, but that P. Decius the Conful encampd against them at Molendente, and having drawn them forth to fight, discomfitted them. Where also there were more that fled, than died; when the two worlds: for not above 3000 Apulians were slain. And Decius, making no reckoning of that enemy, conducd his legions into Samnium. Where, two Confuls hot, having over-run the country in divers parts within five months space laid all wait and defend. Five and forty places there were in Samnium, where Decius had encampd; and eighty five where the other Conful had pitched. In which, they left behind them not only the marks of takings, ramparts, and ditches; but also many other notable signs and tokens of the country waltled all about, and utterly spoild by them. Furius besides, left behind the City Cameria, where there were taken prisoners two thousand and four hundred armed soldiers, and slain there in fight upon.

From thence he went to Rome against the Election of new Conuls, and made all the haste he could to dispatch that business. And when as all the Centuries first called forth to give their suffrages named Q. Furius for the Conful; then Appius Claudius a Conular man, and one of the Competitors, a grim fir, and ambitious by nature, laboured no more for his own honour and advancement,

A vancement, than to recover again unto the Parthians, both the rooms of the Consulship, and employed as well his own devoirs, as also all the means and assistance of the Parthians and Nobility, to have himself chosen Consul with Q. Fabius. As for Fabius, at the first, spoke and alledged in his own be half, the same reasons in manner which he had used the former year, and refused to be Consul. The whole body of the Nobility told about his feast, praying industriously, and entreating him to pluck the Consulship out of the more and base degree of their Commons, and to restore the ancient Majesty both to the Magistracy itself, and also to the Parthians and their houses and families. Fabius stirs silence made, framed a middle and moderate kind of speech, whereby he appeased and allayed their hot affection, promising and affurering, that he would willingly accede the names of two of the Nobility, if he might see, that they would create any other Consul but himself: for at this present Election, he would in no wise admit himself, to be eligible and nominated Consul, and give do to have a precedent to prejudice all cousin of law, for the time to come. So I. Volmannus, out of the body of the Commons, was created Consul with App. Claudius, who likewise in the former Consulship had been matched Colleagues together. The Nobility used to object unto Fabius, and reproached him, that avoided App. Claudius to be his companion in government, who for eloquence and other civil parts was no doubt a singular and excellent man. When the Election was ended, the old Consuls were commanded to war in Samnium, having their Government continued, and their commission renewed for six months. And (o the year following likewise, when I. Volmannus and App. Claudius were Consuls, P. Decius, C who being Consul, had been left behind his College in Samnium, ceased not now in quality and name of Proconsul, to wait the country: until at length, when the Samnites would in no place abide barrel, they were by him chalced out of their own borders and limits. And thus driven out of the field, and excluded out of their own country, they went into Hatinus. Where, supposing that with fohuge a multitude of armed men, they should do that more effectually with intrety and prayers mingled with threats among, which by so many Embassages they had so oft attempted in vain; they called for a Diet and general Council of the States and Princes of Hatinus.

Which being assembled, they declared and shewed, for how many years space they had maintained war with the Romans in the right of their freedom; that they had allayed all means, if happily they might have been able by their own puissance alone, to sustain and support the weight.

D of so huge and important a war: that they had besides made proof of the aids of other neighbour nations, but to little effect: that they had bought for peace of the people of Rome, when they were not able to wage war any longer: and because peace was more grievous unto them with that subjection, than war with their liberty, they had rebelled and made war again: and now their only hope they had, remained in the Tuscan: knowing well enough, that for men, munition, and mony, they were the mightiest nation of all Italy; as having to their neighbours the Gauls, a people born and bred up in armor and war: by natural disposition fierce and cruel, but especially in any quarrel against the people of Rome of whom they do (and not untruth report) that they were by them vanquished and constrained to ransom themselves for gold.

Now the Tuscan were of that heart and courage, as Presura sometimes, and other their no progenitors were: there were no doubt, but that they might diffe-re the Romans, and difpofe of them all the ground on this side Tyberius, and make them fight for the defence and preservation of their lives, and not for the intolerable feignory and dominion of Italy. They said moreover, that there was now come unto them an army of Samnites, well appointed and furnished with armour, and stored with pay and mony, who would follow them forthwith, even to the assault of the City of Rome, if they would lead them.

While they were thus braving, and gloriously boasting themselves, and preparing of war in Tuscanie, the Romans war at their own dores, lay lobe upon them, and flung them at the heart. For P. Decius having learned by the epilals, that the Samnites army was gone forth, and had taken their voyage, assembled a Council and said, What mean we thus to range over the fields, warning from village to village? And not rather affall the walled Towns and strong Cities? There is no army now, that defendeth Samnium: gone they are out of their confines, and wrought their own exile and banishment. When they all had allowed of this motion, he led forth his power to assault the strong City Nursantia. And hotly were the soldiers let, both for the love they bare to their Captain, and also for hope of winning a richer pillage thereby, than by driving booties out of the country, that in one day by mere force of arms they won the Town. Where two thousand and one hundred Samnites, fighting men, either fell upon the edge of the sword, or were taken prisoners, with a great and rich booty besides. But for fear that it should surge and encumber the army with heavy carriages, Decius caused his soldiers to be called together unto an audience, and thus to them he said. And will ye stand contented indeed without victory this day, and this prey? Or will ye build your hope still, answerable to your posterity, and valour? All the Cities of the Samnites, all the substanse and riches that it and remaining in their Cities are yours for a much as ye have in so many battels vanquished their nations and at last driven them out of their own country. Sell these prizes, and with hope of gain draw after you chapmen and merchants to follow the army. I will from time to time still help you to wares and commodities for to sell. Let us go from hence to the City Romans, where your toil shall not be so great, but the spoil far greater. So when they had made tale of their pillage, and willingly of themselves called upon and exhorted their Captain to that expedition, to Rome lest they go. Where likewise, without more and platform, without warlike engines of battery, so soon as they advanced their engines, and approached the walls, they could by no violence be driven from thence but set up ladders in all height, at the next place that every man could find, and so scaled up the walls. Thus the Town was won and ravified. To the number of 3,200 were slain, and 6,000 taken prisoners. The soldiers having got an exceeding booty, were forced to fell it, and make all away, as before: and from thence without any rest at all given unto them they were led to Ferrantum, yet they marched thither with exceeding courage and cheerfulness. Howbeit there they found more difficult and perilous service: for the walls were with all forcible means defended, and the place itself was both by man and hand, and natural situation, fiercely fenced: but yet the soldiers now being felched, and entured to spoil, over-ate all difficulties. Three thousand men about the walls were slain: and the laggage fell to the soldiers share. The greatest part of the honor in slaying and winning of these Cities, is ascribed in some Chronicles to Fabius Maximus. For they write, that Martia was by Decius won, but Ferrantum and Rome, by the conduct of Fabius. But some attribute the glory hereof into the new Colonels. And there are, that give the glory not to both, but to the one of them, to wit, P. Villulano, unto whom befell the Province of Samnium.

Whiles these affairs thus went in Samnium (by whose leading and managing it skills not) in the mean time a mighty war was a preparing in Etruria: and that, of many nations banded together: the principal amongst were was Gabini Equites Samitum. The Tufcans, in manner all, had taken arms and levied their forces, and the near society, called also the people of Umbria and adjoining to take their part: besides, Gauls also were wored for mony to aid: all which multitude assembled together, and met in the Samnite camp. The news of which sudden and unexpected tumult, being brought to Rome; for so much as P. Villulanno the Consul, with the second and third legions, and with 1,000 confederates was gone already into Samnium; it was thought good and determined, that Appius Claudinius with all speed possible, should go into Etruria: and after him, two Roman legions followed, to wit, the first and forthth, with twelve thousand allies: who encompassed not far from the enemy. But more good was done there, in respect that they came thither betimes, (to the end that the fear of the Roman name might keep inawan certain nations in Etruria, which already intended war) than for any exploit performed either skillfully or luckily, under the conduct of the Consul. Many skirmishes there passed in places of disadvantage, and at times unconvinent: in so much, as the enemy took more heart, and conceived greater hope every day more than other: and now it grew welter to this point, that neither soldier could well reckon of the sufficiency of Captain, nor Captain tried upon the loyalty of the foinder. In three several Annals I find, that Appius dispatched his letters to his fellow Consul, and sent for him out of Samnium: howbeit, I am both to let this down, being so uncertain a sit: it seeing that the very Consuls themselves of Rome, who now the second time were coupled together in one government, contented, and openly jarred about this point: whiles Appius denied fairly that he lent any script at all, and Villulannus again avouched, that he was sent for by Appius his letters.

Villulanno this time had won three Castles in Samnium, wherein were slain three thousand enemies, and almost half so many taken prisoners: and composeth besides the seditions and quarrels of the Lucans, which arose from the Commons and needy persons, and that, with the exceeding good contentment of the chief and principal personages of the country, by the means and meditation of Q. Fabius the Proconsul, who was the thirteenth with the old army. This done, he left Decius to wait and pull the country of the enemies, and himself with his forces marched toward his Colleague into Etruria. Who at his first coming, was received generally with all the joy that might be. For mine own part, I suppose verily, that as Appius had good cause to carry an angry formage with him, in case his confidence bare him witness, that he wrote not unto him: so again, if he had need of his Colleagues aid, he shewed an illiberal, unkind, and unhonorable nature of his own, in that he would so illibable, and not be known thereof. For being some forth to meet him, before they had well greeted and saluted one another. How now, quoth he, Villulanno, is all well? How goes the World in Samnium? What hath moved you to abandon and leave your own charge and province, and to depart? Villulanno made answer, that in Samnium all things went well and chieved prosperously, and that himself now was come, as sent for by his letters: which if they were counteracted, and that there were no need of him in Etruria, he would presently turn his engines and be gone. Mary, quoth he, and good leave have you, you may be gone when you will and no man holdeth you: and believe it is, that you who peradventure are not able to wijch and manage your own affairs of war, should glory thus, and make your boast that you are come hither to help others. Hereat Villulanno should reply again and say, It is well, and God send us good luck; I had rather lose my labour, than ought should have happened, whereby one Colleague army were not sufficient to deal with Etruria. Now as the Commons were parting amongst us from the other, the Lictorions and Colonel of Appius his army came and stood round about them both: some requested their own General, that the aid of his Colleague which ought to have been accepted by them if it had been required now that it was so offered so willingly, and of his own accord, should not be refused and rejected. But the more part encouraged Villulanno, as he was ready to go his way, and carnally befought him not for any crowded contention, and debate with his companion, to betray the common weak. For if any overthrow or misadventure should happen the blame would be imputed rather to the for-
A ""taker than the forfaken: and now things were come to this pass, that the honor or dishonor of the war in Hettarea, prove it well or ill, should fall upon L. Voltemanius: for that name would ""enquire of the words and language that Appius gave him, but of the fortune and success of the army: and albeit Appius had given him his farewell and pasport, the west publick and the army held ""him still by the sleeve, and for proof herof, let him but make trial of the foot-soldiers hearts and ""affections. Thus with remonstrances, persuasions, and hearty prayers to the one Consul and the other, they drew them both, in manner against their wills, to part in publish audience before the whole army, where they grew to longer speeches and discourses, but to the same purpose and effect, as before in the hearing and presence of a few. Now when Voltemanius (as having the better B came, seemed to reply, and that with good grace and words enough, against that regular eloquence of his Colleague: and that Appius in triumphing and countenising manner, gave out and said, That they were beholden to him, and might commend him, that of a dumb and conquested Consul they had one, that was so ready and eloquent: and who in his former Consulship, and specially in the first months, could not open his mouth, and speak a word, was now of a sudden become an Orato- rian, and able to make plausible and proper Orations: then replied Voltemanius and said, ""Would ""God, with all my heart, you rather had learned of me to think valiantly, then for you to speak ""finely: and in conclusion he said, he would render him an order, which should determine and put ""out of all doubt, whether of them twain, were, not the better Lawyer and Orator (for at this ""present the Common-wealth stood not in need of such) but the better warrior and Captain General. C ""ral. Whereas therefore, there are but, Provinces, Hettarea and Samnium, it shall be in your choice ""(qd. he) to take one of them, whether you will, and I myself will with my own army make war ""in the other. Then began the foot-soldiers to cry aloud unto them, that they would jointly enter ""both upon the Tuscian war, which con""ent and accord of theirs, when Voltemanius had perceived, ""For almonch (qd. he) as I have once mistaken and misinterpreted the will of my Colleague, I will ""not in any case stand in doubt and be ignorant of your minds too: Let me know therefore by a ""shout of yours, whether you would have me stay or depart? Whereat they set up such a noise, that it gave an alarm to the enemies, and ran them out of their camp; and presently they caught ""their weapons up, and came forth into the field. Voltemanius likewise caused the trumpets to sound, and the standards and ensigns to be brought abroad. Then Appius (as it is reported) being plainly D ""layed, that whether he fought or fell, the victory would be attributed to his Colleague, and fell in a manmecting and tumultuous for a while: but afterwards hearing, let that his own legions also would follow Voltemanius gave likewise unto his men the signal of battle, which they to instantly called for, But neither they, nor the enemies were well arranged and in good order: for both the leader of the Samnites (Gellius Egnatius) was gone a foraging abroad, with some few cohorts and bands with him; whereupon the foot-soldiers rather of their own heads, than by conduct and direction of Cap- tains, began to charge: and all the Roman armies were not been head forth together nor yet had time enough to be marshalled accordingly: for Voltemanius not gave the charge before that Appius could come to encounter the enemies: whereupon, the forefours were not equally matched together: and as if some fortune had exchanged the enemies, that they were wont to fight withal: E the Tuscans presented themselves to Voltemanius, and the Samnites who layed awhile (for that their General was absent) adhered unto Appius. It is reported that Appius in the very heat of the skirmish, was seen in the front of the formost enemys to lift up his hands to Heaven, and pray in this wise, O Lady Bellona, if thou give us victory, and the honor of this day then, be late, I now here unto thee at this hour, a fair Temple. When he had thus prayed, as it the goddess had put life into him, and animated his courage, both himself matched the valor of his Colleague, and his army answered the virtue of their Commander, For he performed the devout and part (indeed) of a brave General. The foot-soldiers likewise, for fear that the other army should begin the victory, endeavored and fenced all that ever they could: Whereby, they difarrayed, discomfited, and put to flight the enemies, who could not eaily abide any extraordinary force and violence, more than F they were wont to meet withall. And so with prizing hard upon them still that retreated, and chastening them bodies that were shattered in flight, they beat them into their camp. There, by the coming in of Gellius and the Sabellian bands, the battle for the time was f efficiently renewed. But when they also, within a while were discomfited, then was the camp affliated by the conquerors. Thus whilsts Voltemanius for his partenred with banner displayed unto the very gate and Appius ever and anon, reiterated the name of Bellona the victrefx and all, to set on fire and inflame the courage of the foot-soldiers: there was neither trench nor rampier that could hold them back, So the camp was won and sacked, and a huge pillage therein found, which was given all to the foot-soldiers. Seven thousand and three hundred enemies were slain, 2100 taken prisoners. During the time that both Consuls, and the whole populace of the Romans, were thus more G bent and employed in the war within Tuscany; there were new forces raised in Samnium, to wait the marches of the Roman Dominion: who taking their way through the Vetulins, into Compe- nius and the country of Faleria, drew huge prizes and booties away. And as Voltemanius by great journies returned into Samnium (for by this time Fabius and Decius were come to an end of their prorogued governments) - the bruit that was blown abroad of the Samnits army and their forraging of the territory of Capua, turned him out of his way, to the defence of his allies and conde- rars. So soon as he was entred into the country Calvium, both he himselfe saw the fresh marks and tokens of great damage and desolation: and also the Calenians advertised him, that the
the enemies carried with them already to execute a prey and booty, that they were scarce able for it to march in good order; and that their Captains began openly to speak and say, that the belt course they could take, was presently to retire Samnium, there to leave their prizes and booties, and so to return each to their rodes and make new expeditions; and not to commit an army, to laden and irriugrished, to the fortune and hazard of a battle. Which words, albeit they found much to a truth, yet he thought it meet to look better into the matter, and to build upon a finer ground, and therefore he lent certain light Horlemen, to intercept some foragers as they thronged and were scattered one from another in the fields. By whom he learned, after much quizzing with them, that the enemies encamped by the river Vulturis, and from there at the third watch, would set forward on their journey directly into Samnium. After he had signified intel-ligences and advertisements concerning these things, he dislodged and put himself upon his way and encamped so far from the enemies, as his approach by being too near could not be known, and yet he might be able to surprize them as they should shine in disorder out of their camp. So a good while before day, he marched towards the enemy: and sent such as were well seen in the Octian tongue, to listen and learn what they did, Who being intermingled with the enemies (which was an easy matter in that night garboil and confusion) they found that the enigns were set forward, not sufficiently accompanied with armed men for defence; and that the whole pillage with the guard and convoy thereof, was now going forth, and marched carelessly like a fort of vile and baile lozells, every man thinking of his own particulars and running on his own head, without consent of others, and with little or no direction and government. This was thought the meetest time to set upon them: and now it drew near. Day whereupon he commanded the trumpets to sound the charge, and set upon the march of the enemies. The Samnites, mumbled as they were, and pressed with their booty, and few of them here and there in armour, began some of them to double their pace and to march faster away, and drive before them their booty: some flood still, and will not whether they were better, to go on forward, or retire again into the camp. But whiles they thus trifled and stayed, they were environed and surprized by the Romans: and by this time they had gotten over their rampier: much killing there was, and confusion in the camp. The Samnites, as they marched, besides that they were troubled with the affanks of their enemies, were also disquieted with the sudden escape and revolt of their prisoners: who being some of them loose, looked allio those that were bound: whilst others of them, caught up their weas-pons which were fastened to the packs, and being confusedly intermingled in the march, made a greater and more fearful garboil and havoc, than the very barrel of the enemies. And more than that, they performed one memorable and notable act above the rest. Foras Statius Eg-natius the General, went about the ranks and files encouraging the soldiery to fight, they set upon him, scattered the Horlemen about, that accompanied him, environed him about, and took him as he sat on Horleback, and haled him to the Roman Conful. Upon which tumult and stir, the foremost enigns of the Samnites were called back, and the barrel which in manner was done, now began aright: yet could not they any long time restit and hold out. Slay there were about six thousand: two thousand and five hundred taken prisoners. Amongst whom, were 4 Colonels and 30 Ensigns: and (that, wherein the victors took contentment) of captives, 7000 M and 400 hundred were again recovered: with an exceeding great booty which they had got from their allies: whereunto, by proclamation were called, all that could lay any claim, or pretend a right, to seize upon their own goods, and to receive the same by a day appointed. And look what parcels could not be owned or challenged by the true owner, was given away to the foouldiers: who were compelled to make sale thereof, to the end, that they should not set their heart upon any thing burwar.

This lackage of the territory of Capua, had raised great trouble and stir in Rome. And at the very same time also, it chanced, that there came news out of Histria, how that upon the with-drawing of Vulturis his forces out of those parts, all that country was up afresh in arms: that Gellius Eg-natius the Samnian Captain, and the Umbrians likewise, were moved to revolt; and the Gauls also solicited with great sums of mony. At this bruit the Senat being afraid, commanded an abstinence or vacation of term, and that all forts of men should be immured: and not only the free born natural citizens, and the flower of the youth were set in fort and sworn, but certain companies also of the elder fort, yeas, and bands of Libertins newly enfranchised, were enrolled by the hundreds. Likewise they sat in Council about devising means for defence of the City: and P. Sempronius the Pretor, had the whole government of the State. But the Senat was partly caiid and discharged of this care, by the letters of L. Vulturis the Conul, which gave intelligence that the foragers of Campania were defeated, slain, and put to flight. Thereupon were decreed in favour of the Conul, for this exploit by him achieved, solemn proceedings, and the abinti-ence of term again was remitted, which had continued for eighteen days since: and the prosecu-tion aforesaid, was right joyfully performed. Then began they to devise about garrisons or de-fence of the country, thus waifed and overrun by the Samnites. And agreed it was, that two Coloni-ies should be sent about the Veltin and Falern coasts, one to the mouth of the river Lipis, which Colony was called Mixtura, the other in the Veillinforsset and lighters, adjoyning to the Falern country: where Synops, a Greek Town sometime flood, and afterwards was called by the Romans there inhabiting, Sinussa. The Tribuns of the Com. had in charge to ordain by an Act of the common people, that P. Sempronius the Pretor should choose certain Trium-
A virs, about the sending and translating of inhabitants into those Colonies. But much ado they had to find those that willingly yeelded to be enrolled Coloners, supposing indeed that they were sent thither, not to inhabit Land and ground for their beat behoof, but to lie in garnison, and to stand upon their guard in those frontiers, which were continually moysted by warlike enemies; From the care of these affairs, the Senat was withdrawn, by occasion of the Tufcan war, whereof the rumour daily encreased: and letters also came thick from Appius, who warned them not to neglect the rising of that countrey: which letters imported, that four nations had united their forces, and banded themselves together; to win, Tuscanis, Samnium, Boetians, and the Gauls: that they were already encamped in two places; for that one was not to able to receive to great a multitude. Upon these occasions, as also for that the time drew neer of Election of Conuls; Lucius Volumnius the Conul was called home to Rome. Who before that he called the Centuries for to give their voices, having assembl'd the people to an audience, discoursed before them at large, concerning the greatnes of the Tufcan war. "How that afore time, when he himself and his brother Conuls warfed there together, it was of so great importance, that neither one leader, or yet one army was sufficient: and by reports, the Embrrians, and a mighty power of Gauls were afterward combined upon them. So that they should remember, that they were tochieve that day two Conuls, against four Nations. As for himself, but that he was certainly invaived and confirmed, that the people of Rome would with a general consent declare him Conul, who at that time, without all controversy was counted the principal Captain and best leader of all others, he would forthwith nominat a Dictator. No man doubted, but the Q Fabius was the man, who by the silent of all, was meant and destined to this charge: and him together with Volumnius, both the prorogative tribe, and all those that were called first, every one, nominated to be Conul, Fabius made a speech by way of excuses, in habitude, like as he had done before, two years together: but afterwards seeing he was overcome with the general agreement of the people, he framed it so in the end, that he required P. Decius to be his collegue: "Alleging, that he would be in stead of a good prop and stay to him in his old age: how he had found by experience in one Conulschip and two Conulshipps, born jointly together with him, that there was no jury and defence of the Common-weal, to the concord and agreement of those that are companions in government. And to any other new Conulee besides him, hardly could an old mans mind and frame. Alto that he would and could more easily impart his mind and purpoe to one, whose humor, condition, and behavior, he had been already acquainted with. The Conul, himself confirmed his Oration, and accorded them unto as well, in regard of the commendable parts and defects of P. Decius, as also of the good that proceeded and ensued upon the mangnifice of war-affairs, by the concord and unity of the Conuls; and of the hurt which hapned and followed upon their disagreement and dissention: "and therewith he shewed how near they were of late to utter perill and destruction, through quarrels between him and his brother Appius: admonishing Decius and Fabius both to live so, as with one mind and heart they should be for the same things. He added moreover and said, they were men of Action both, born for war and to be soldiers: for martial feats renowned already: but for to maintain contencions of words and quarrells of the tongue, altogether rude and unskilful, and such natures, (said he) were fittst to make Conuls. As for nimble heads and fine wits, deeply seen in points and quicke of law, fail of their eloquent terms, such as Ap. Claudius was: those were meet to be made Lord Presidents of the City and chief Judges in the common place, for to sit in judgment of causes, and see the execution of laws. Thus in handling of these matters was that day spent. The morrow after, according to the Conuls appointment, was the Election held, both of new Conuls, and also of Pretors. Q. Fabius and P. Decius were created Conuls, and App. Claudius Pretor, all absent. And Volumnius by Act of the Senate, and grant of the Commons, had his government prorogued, and continued in his charge one year longer.

The same year were many strange fights and prodigious monsters seen: for the turning away of the dangers foreignsigned and menacing thereby, the Senat decreed supplications and Letters for two daies together. Wine and incende for the sacrificies, was allowed at the publick charges of the City, and in procession went both men and women in great number, with much reverence, to visit the Holy shrines, and there to do their devotions. Those solemn supplications were more renowned and memorable, by reason of a contention that arose among the dames of the City, in the Chappel of Lady Pudicitia Patritia, which handeth in the beat-market, by the round Church of Hercules. The Noblemens wives would not admit into that Chappel Virginia the daughter of Aulus, who, notwithstanding she was nobly descended from the race of the Patritiis;gave espousals Volumnius the Conul, a Commoner, and was married (forsooth) out of the family and rank of the Purtiiis. Whereupon, there began some short and cutted threow G words to be dealt between: and so (as women commonly are soon angry and let on fire) there grew to heart-burning and hot contention. Whiles Virginia allledged and said, that the being a Gentlewoman and Patritia born, and a chaste and honest Dame, was enetered in the Chappel of Patritis Chaftitie over and besides, she had not been noted for Bigamy: but was the wife of one only husband, unto whom she was given and brought a pure maid: and as forther husband, and his dignities which he had born, his noble acts that he had achivied, she had no cause to complain, or be ashamed, nay rather, she gloried therein right greatly. After this, she accumulated these magnificent and glorious words, with a generous and brave deed. For in the long street where the dwelt, the set by and cut off a part of her dwelling house, as much as would serve for an Oratory or ory Chappel, and there erected an Altar. And when she had assembled the wives of the Commoners together, and had complained of the injurious dealing of the Patriarchal dames: "This altar (quoth she) do I dedicate unto Fadieisa Plebeia: and all you here I exhort, that with what emulation, the men our husbands; in this City contend about fees of valour and arms, who may do best; so likewise the Matrons and wives strive and excel in continence and chastity; and that ye will labour and endeavour, that this altar may have the name to be frequented, and revered unto, with more reverence and devotion, yea, and if (it be possible) of more chat women, than that other of the Nobility. And so it fell out indeed, that from that time, this altar also had the same rites (in a manner) and ceremonies as the other, which was more ancient: in such sort, as to wife, but of approved honesty and chastity, and wedded but to one husband during her life, might be allowed there to sacrifice and offer oblations. But this religious order and institution, in lapse and process of time was prophaned afterwards and divulged, and the altar frequented by them that were stained and infamous, and not only by matrons of name and quality but also by women of all sorts and degrees, until at last through diisuse it grew to be utterly forgotten, and came to nothing.

The fame year the Ediles Curtule, Cn., and Q. Oenetus accused certain Ufurers, who were convicted, and their goods forfeit and confiscate. And of that which came into the common chest, they caused to be made a brazen portal in the Capitol, and silver vessels for to furnish out three tables in Jupiter's Chappel: also the image of Jupiter himself in the Lantern or frontispice of the Capitol, being in his chariot drawn with four steeds. Moreover, at the Fig-tree Raiminades, they erected and set up the images of the foundling babies, the first founders of the City, pendant at the ears of a thee-wolf. They paved also with square stone, the cauley and high way from the gate Capena, unto the Temple of Mars. The Ediles likewise Commoners, L. Aelius Patris, and C. Fulvius Curvus, of the forfeited mony which they levied of the grasers or farmers of the City paffures, who were condemned and fined, exhibited certain pages and players, and let up golden bolles in the Temple of Ceres.

After this, Q. Fabius the sitt time Consul, and P. Decius the fourth, entered their government, who now had been companions together in three Consulats, and in one Censorship, men renowned, not more for the honor of their noble exploits in war, which was right great, than for their loving agreement and concord. Which unity of theirs was not perpetual to the end; by occasion, I suppose, of the contention of the States that came between, rather than of any difference betwixt themselves. For the Patriarch labour, that Fabius should have the Province of Tuscan extraordinarily; and the Commons were as earnest with Decius to put the matter to a Lottery. Certain it is, that a great contention there was in the Senat. But afterwards, seeing that Fabius was able to do more and make a greater side than his Colleague, the matter was brought again before the people. In which assembly, few words passed between the parties themselves, being martial men both, flaunting more upon deeds than words. Fabius gave out and said: that it was an indignity, that another should gather fruit under the Tree that he had planted, also, that himself as the man, who had opened the way through the wood Ciminia, and had given entrance and passage for the Roman war, through defart and wild forests, What meant they then to trouble him, a man of those years, with this place of charge, in case, they minded to give the conduct of this to any other General but himself? No doubt, but by little and little he upbraided them covertly and cal in their teeth, for chusing unto him an adversary, and not a companion in government: ye, and charged Decius, that he repented and envied the good concord, wherein they had lived together, during the time of these Magistracies already. Finally, he aimed and reached at no farther matter than this, but if so be, they thought him worthy of the Province, thither to send him. For as he had been at the appointment and pleasure of the Senate, so would he be at the ordering and direction of the people. On the other side, P. Decius complained of the injury offered by the Senat: for that the Nobles had endeavoured to restore to their power, and done their best that no Commons might have access to honours and places and dignities: and after that prows and valour had got the upperhand, and prevailed so, as even in those kind of men vertue wanted not her due reward and honour; there were means sought, that not only the voices of the people were deluded and made vain: but also the very awards and arbitrements of fortune, were transferred to the wills and pleasures of some few. All Consuls before him had their provinces by lot: and now the Senat by their absolute authority, without casting lots, gave unto Fabius the charge of his province. If it be (faith he) to honour the man: verily, he hath so well delivered both of my self and of the Commonwealth, that I favour highly and render the glory of Q. Fabius: provided always, that it get not a thinning litle, by a foil of my disgrace and disfavour. And who will ever doubt, where Q there is one difficult and dangerous war, and the same precisely and absolutely charged upon one Consul, without ordinary and lawful calling: but that the other Consul had met a Cipher, and is reputed either needless, or good for nothing? As for Fabius, like as he gloried in his service and noble Acts achieved in Tuscan, even so would Pulibus Decius also full lain do the semblable: and peradventure, he should be able to put out and quench that fire once for all, which Fabius left behind him, so covered and raked up, as that oftentimes it suddenly brake out again, and yielded forth new flames and bazes. In conclusion, he could be content to yield.
The Tenth Book of T. Livius.

A yeild the titles of honour and all rewards of vertue unto his Colleague, in the reverenc_ regard of his old age, and majesty of his person: but too many hazard or jeopardy that might be prem_ fented unto them. he neither at this time gave place, nor ever would (with his good will) to him or any man else whatsoever: and the gr_ no other good by this contencion, yet would he obtain this much at the lea_f, that the people should hold their own, and dispose of that abso_ lutely at their discretion, which was in their power: rather then permit the Nobles to gratifie any one therewith at their pleasure. And herewith he prayed sup, Opt. Max, and all the im_ mortal gods, that even as they vouchsafed to bestow upon him and his Colleague equal valour and happiness in the conduct of their war, so they would afford them one and the same right of authority and rule. For, surely it was in nature meet and reason, for example good and profitable, and for the credit and fame of the people of Rome much material, that this should be Confuls, as by either of their guidance and conduct, without exceptions: the war with the Tuscan might be administrated as it ought to be. Fabius then, having begotit the people naught else, but that before the Tribes were called in to give their suffrages, they would hear the letters of App. Claudius Pretor read, which were brought out of Tuscany, departed out of the assembly. So the Province of Tuscany, without calling lots, was awarded unto Fabius, with no lea_ consent of the people, then of the Senat. Hereupon, all the younger fort (in manner) ran to the Conful, and offered their service of themselves, and gave their names to be enrolled, so defers were they to serve under that Capital. Which multitude being thus flocked about him round: Four thousand footmen (quot_ he) and fix hundred horse, and no more, as I minded to take up and levy. As many therefore, as to day and to morrow, will present themselves and give their names, will I accept of, and take with me: more care have I to bring you all home rich and wealthy, then to have numbers of soldiery to fight my battles. Thus he for_th with a competent Army well appointed, and so much more confident, and in hope of good success, by how much less he stood upon the great number: and directed his journey to the Town Abancu, where Appius the Pretor encamped, and from whence the enemy was not far distant. A few miles on this side, the jewellers or wood-purcers, accompanied with a good guard of soldiery for their convey, met him: who seeing the Senatours going before, and understanding that it was Fabius the Conful, with joy and cheerful hearts, thanked God and the people of Rome, for sending unto them such a General. After this, when they came all about the Conful to salute and welcome him, Fabius demanded whither they went? who answered, to purvey wood and jewel, Say ye so? (quot_ he) and have ye not your camp encaped and for_ tined? Yes, cried they all, and that with a double rampart and ditch, but yet are we in exceeding fear. Then (quot_ he) ye have wood and timber enough, Go ye back again, and down with the trench and palliade. Who returned into the camp, and as they were plucking up the rampart, they gave the alarm both to the soldiery that tarried behind in the camp, and to Appius himself, and made them afraid. Then every man laid to one or other as they came, that it was by the ex_ press commandment of Q. Fabius the Conful that they did so. The morrow after they removed the camp: and Appius the Pretor was dismissed and sent away to Rome. After which time, the Romans abode no where in standing camp: for he said, it was not good and commodious for an army to make abode in any one place: but that it was better and more wholesome both for the a_ gility and health of their bodies, to have a running camp, to be ever marching, and changing the air and the soil. But their journeys were no other, then the winter would permit, which was not yet past.

In the beginning of the Spring, Fabius having left the second legion at Clusium, which in old time was called Camara, and appointed Scipio Pro-pretor to begovernor of the camp he returned himself to Rome for to consult about the war: were it of his own accord and motion, because it appeared evidently in view of eye much greater then it was reputed before: or that he was sent for by order from the Senat: for there be writers that affirm both the one and the other. Some would have it thought, that he was called back again by Appius Claudius Pretor, who both at the Council Table in the Senat Houfe, and also before the body of the people (like as he had continually done by letters) enforced the fear and terror of the Tuscan war, saying, that one General and one Army, were not sufficient to make head against four Nations: that it would be dangerous and doubtful, whether they jointly in one body gave battle unto one, or maintained war apart in divers quarters: that one man was not able to perform and manage all at once. As for himself, he had left behind him two Roman Legions and no more: and with Fabius there were come not full five thousand in all, of horse and foot together. His opinion therefore was, that with all speed P. Decius the Conful, should go to his Colleague into Tuscany, and L. Valen_ timius have the charge of Samnium in the meantime. But in case the Conful had rather go into his own Province, then he advised, that Volumnius took his way directly with a full and com_ plet Confular army into Tuscany, to the Conful. When this dispatch of the Pretor had moved a great part of the Hors, then P. Decius spake (by report) to this effect: That all should be left entire and free to the disposition of Q. Fabius, until such time as either himself in person (if it might stand with the will-publickly) were come to Rome: or lest one of his Lieu-repres by whom the Senat might be informed, and truly understand the poyle and importance of the war in Tus_ cany: what forces were requisite, and how many Leaders and Captains were expedient and need_ ful. Fabius, so soon as he was returned to Rome, both in the Senat-House, and also in the audience.
of the people, held a middle course in all his speech; that he might seem neither to encrease, nor yet to diminish the rumor of the war: and in assuming to himself another Captain, he pretended, that he condescended the more, in regard to other men's fear, more than for his own safety, or for any danger that the State was like to incur. Howbeit, if they would allow him a conductor and companion in war, how might he forget Peter Decius the Conful of them whom he had to good purpose and experience in many Magistrates which they had born and administrated together, of all men in the world he loved none better, and would make choice of no one sooner: and having Peter Decius with him, he would never think his forces too few about him, nor his enemies too many before him. But if peradventure the mind and heart of his Colleague Hord otherwise, his request was, that they should give him L. Volturnius to be his assistant. The determination of all was referred over to Fabius, both by the people and Senate, and also by the Conful himself. And when, as Decius showed and testified, that he was ready to take a journey either into Samnium or Tuscany, there followed such a joy and gratulation of all men, as if they had conceived in their spirit a victory afore-hand, and even now, had decreed for the Conuls, not a doubtful war, but a glorious triumph. I find in some writers, that Fabius and Decius, presently upon the entrance into their Magistracy, went into Tuscany, without any mention of calling lots for their charges and provinces, or of the contention between the two Colleges, which I have before. Thence some again, having laid abroad these debates, stayed not there, but over and besides have added a large tale of matter, touching the inventives of Appius before the people, against Fabius in his absence; as also the obstinate stubbornness of him being Pretor, against the Conuls, to his very face: moreover, another contention and variance between the two Conuls; whiles Decius endeavored to bring about, and was instant that each one should keep him to his own Province allotted unto him, and hold it. But all writers agree in the course of the history, from the time that both Conuls went out to war, and to forward.

But before that the Conuls arrived in Tuscany, certain Gauls called Senones, came with a great power before Clusium, ready to give assault unto the Roman Legion and the camp. But Scipio, who was left Governor thereof, thinking it necessary to help out the small number of his men, by advantage of the ground, led his army up to the hill between the town and the camp. But (as it falleth out in such sudden cases) he had not discovered beforehand the wayes and passages about; but inconsiderably went forward, and engaged himself up to the top and pitch of the hill, which the enemy was master of already, by another side. Thus was the legion afflied on the back and beat down, and thus was it enclosed and environed round, by a multitude of enemies, and put to the word. Some writers there be who report, that the whole legion perished there, so as not one escaped alive to carry tidings, Also, that the Conuls who now were not far from Clusium, had no news brought them of this overthrow, before the horsemen of the Gauls were in sight, who carrying the heads of them that were slain, some hanging before at their horsepoirets, others flit king aloft upon their lances, braved and triumphed singing and chanting songs of joy, after their manner. Some write, that they were the Umbri and not the Gauls, and that the defeat and miscarree was not so great: also, that when the foragers for the camp under the leading of L. Milculus Torgatus a Lieutenant, were compell'd against by the enemy; then Scipio the Pre-potent came forth of the camp to succour and rescue them and that the Umbrians who first had the better, afterwards when the battle was renewed, suffered the foil and were overcome, and that as well their prisoners as their booty was taken from them. But more probable it is, that this overthrow was given by the Gauls, then the Umbrians; for that as divers times afore, so that year especially the City was frighted with the tumults and risings of the Gauls. Upon this defeat, over and besides, that both the Conuls were gone to war with four legions and a great power of Cavalry of natural Romans, and a thousand horsemen of Capua, chosen out of purpose for that war, and lent unto them, with a greater power also of Allies, and of Latins then of Romans: there were two other armies not far from the City of Rome, opposed to frontier and made head against Tuscany: the one in the Faliscian territory, the other in the Vatican, Ce. Fulvia and L. Paullinius Mecuvius, both Pre-potents, were commanded to keep a standing camp in those parts. But the Conuls by this time, having passed over the mountain Apennines, were come to the enemies within the country of the Sentinats, And there about four miles off, they let them down and encamped. Then the enemies, after much contention, resolved in the end upon this point; not to be intermengled all in one camp, nor come into the field and hazzard all their forces at once in one battle. But that the Gauls should take the Samnites unto them, and the Umbrians join with the Tufcans. The day of the battle was appointed. The Gauls and Samnites had the charge to maintain the fight: and in the time of battle the Tufcans and Umbrians were commanded to assist the camp of the Romans. But the their designs and purpoises were altered by reason of three Chuni fugitive traitors, who by night flee away privily into the Conul Fulvia, and disclosed the intents and enterprize of the enemies: who were sent away with rich rewards, to the end that every hour, upon new plots and devices that should be determined by the enemies, they would give them an inkling and certain intelligence. The Conuls write unto Fulvia and Paullinius, that the one should advance and come forward with his army, out of the Faliscian country: and the other out of the Vatican directly unto Clusium: and that with all their forces, they should overrun and destroy the enemies country. The rumor of these roads & invasions, caused the Tufcans to remove out of the Seminar territory, to the defence of their own frontiers. Hereupon the Consuls made speed to strike a battle in their absence. And for two days space they skirmished continually with the enemy, and challenged him to the field but for those two days, no worthy deed of importan en was achieved. A few on both sides were slain, and thereby were their contiguities rather provoked, and their biomacks whet to a full feat battle then any trial or hazard made of the main chance. Upon the third day into plain field they come with all their power. When both armies stood ranged in battale array, there returned a Hind to be cheated out of the mountains, and to run away before a Wolf, even through the midst of the plains between both armies: then, parted both their wild beasts against, the Hind took her way to the Gauls, and the Wolf his course to the Romans, The Wolf had way given him through all the ranks and files but the Hind was killed among the Gauls.

Then a Roman found one on the foremost, who was to fight before the enemies: There will be the fight (quothehe) will the slaughter be, wherefore the beast faced and dedicated to Diana die d, but here on this part, the martial Wolf, confronted to Mars, having with victory gone clear away alive and unwounded hast put us in mind of our martial Nation and of our first founder, the to of Mars. The Gauls put themselves in the right wing, the Samnites in the left, Against the Samnites, Fabius marshaled the first and third legions, in the right point: and Decius, the fifth and sixth in the left, against the Gauls. For the second and fourth seated in Samnium under I. Volumnius Proconsul. At the first shock and encounter, the battle was to indifferently fought, and to equal force, that if the Tuscanians and Umbrians had either shewed themselves in the field, or affrighted the camp, the loss and overthrow must needs have light in either places whereas they had bent their forces. Howebeit, although hitherto the conflict of battle went equal and indifferent, and that yet fortune had not determined, which way the would enline and give the victory yet they fought not alike, in the right and left wings. For the Romans under the conduct of Fabius, rather warded the enemy warily, and stood upon their guard, then offered to charge lutilly: so as they maintained fight, and drew it at length until it was very late in the evening, because the Captain was enformed and periwaded of the Samnites and Gauls both, that being as they were in the first skirmish very hot and furious, it was sufficient to keep off at length and at offices end. As for the Samnites, their courage would have bet and fail by any long conflict and the bodies of the Gauls, (who of all others can least away with travel, & heat especially) would turn all to freeze, & mix it away, who at the beginning fight more fiercely then men, but in the end more fainly then women. Against that time, therefore, when the enemy used to fall & give over, Fabius had kept his soldiers in breath & reserved their strength fresh & lusty. But Decius being very eager & hot by reason of his youth and courage of heart, lain on lutilly at the first, and spent upon the enemies all the force & vigor he had: and for that the infantry seemed to fight but coldly, he let the Cavalry work: and himself personally in the thickest throng & troop of most valiant and hardy Knights, exhorted and begot; the foremost gallants of those lusty youths, to join with him & to charge upon the enemy saying that they should carry away a double honor if by the means of the men of the armies, the victory began at the left wing. Twice they forced the Gauls horsemen to turn aside and back, but when as they were engaged together within, and now fighting hard fell pellic all among the quadrupeds of the horsemen, they beheld a new and strange kind of fight, which troubled and terrified them. For the enemies standing all armed upon chariots & wagons, with a great noise of their tents, and rumbling of the wheels, could fell upon them & mightily frighted the horses of the Romans, which had not been acquainted with such unheard & strange noises. So the horsemen who had the upper hand before, & were at point, were now with a foul fear discomfited and scattered, as if the hideous furies of hell, & the devil himself had been amongst them, Whereupon they fled suddenly & not looking before them were overthrown both men & horse. By this occasion the enigns of footmen were disordered & disordered, and many of those that were ranged in the front before the enigns, were by force of horse & wagons driven through the tailtions, trodden under foot, and their guns smashed out. Hereafter the batalions of the Gauls footmen, seeing their enemies thus scared, followed them on space, & gave them no time of breathing. Decius cried out aloud to his men, Whither flee ye? Or what hope have ye to save yourselves by flight? Decius opposed himself against them that retreated and fled; Decius talked thole that were disband and it attered but seeing that by no force or means he could slay them, thus amazed & astonin as they were, he called upon his father P. Decius by name, and said: Why do I stay any longer the fatal death that is defined to my house & name? It is given to our race & family to be faclified in lieu of propitiatory sacrifices for to afoil & save the publick weal from dangers menaced & threatened unto it. Even now therefore, will I offer the legions of the enemies to be faclified & with my fell to Dame Tellus and other infernal gods. When he had spoken these words, he commanded M. Livius the high Priest (whom as he marched into the field, he straightly had charged not to depart from him) to pronounce and say that form of words, whereby he should devote, offer, and take himself to death, together with the legions of the enemies, for to save the army of the Quirites and people of Rome, Which when he had done by the same form of prayer and in the same habit wherein his father P. Decius at the river Tiberius, in the war against the Latins caused himself to be offered to death & besides their solemn prayers, added moreover these words: That he drave before him Fright, Flight, Murder, Murther, Bloodshed, Ire and Wrath of gods in Heaven & fiends in Hell: and that he would with deadly malpractices and execrable curses invite the enigns, weapons, and armors of his enemies; and that one and the same place, should give both both himself, and also the Gauls and Samnites together with him, plague, perdition, and death. But after these cursed, horrible, and detestable speeches against his own people and his enemies: look where he saw the thickest ranks of the Gauls, thither he spurred his horse, and rode in amongst them: where amidst the pikes, javelins, and swords, he was presently slain. Then could it hardly be seen, that the battle was any longer fought by power and help of man. But the Romans so soon as they had lost their captain, (which at all other times is wont to strike a terror into them) stayed their flight, and were willing and contented to renew the battle afresh. The Gauls, and especially that troop which flouid about the Cof, his body, liaded as though they had been out of their wits, flung their darts from them (I know not how) to no purpose, and in vain: some of them fiiood fiill, as it were benumbed, forgetting both to run away, and to fight still. But on the other side the high Priet Livius, with whom Decius had left the reins, and whom before his death he nominated and ordained to be Proprietor, cried out, as loud as he could, that the Romans had the victory, and by the death of the Cof, were acuit and excused from all other fatal danger: but as for the Gauls and the Samnites, they were defined and forfeited (as it were) to mother Telus and the infernal spirits. And now Decius (quoth he) hailed after him and calleth to follow him, the army that with him was devowed, cursed, and offered: now all the enemies are full of turies and fearful fright. Then, as these aforesaid began the skirmish again, behold there came unto them, Cornelius Scipio, and C. Martius with a troop of succours from the next race; who by commandment of Q. Fabius the Consul, were sent to aid and refuce his College. Where they heard the worthy end of P. Decius, a noble example to encourage them to adventure all kinds of hazards in the service of their country and Common-weal. Therefore, when as the Gauls flouid close and thick together, opposing their targets before them, ranged and joined one another feather with feather, fo, as to deal with them afront, and to cope together at hand froaks, was thought a difficult and dangerous matter: then, by the commandment of those two Lieutenants, the darts and lances which lay fired upon the ground, between the two armies, were gathered up, and flung against the pavis and tortoise-like of the enemies targets aforesaid. And by reason that these javelins and spears light and fluck fast, some in their targets, and some in their very bodies, it hapned that their knot was broken, and the baillimon (as huge and cloie as it was) disband'd, in such form, as many of them, notwithstanding their bodies were unmouched and maimed, fell down altoned one upon another. Lo how fortune alter'd the case, and changed all in the left wing of the Romans. But in the right, Fabius (as is beforefaid) at the first, lingered and drew on the day: but afterwards, when he perceived, that neither the enemies fhouts, nor their manner of giving charge, nor yet the darts and javelins which they lanzed, had the fame vigor and force, as before the commanded the Captains of the horsemen to wheel about, with their Cornets, and to flank the Samnites, that upon a signal given, they might charge them overthrow with all the violence they could, whiles his own Legionary footmen by little and little advanced forward, and brake the ranks and disordered the enemy. When he saw once, no resistance made, and that without all doubt, they were wearied and out of breath: then he gathered together all his subsidy companies of the reeguard, which he had reserved until that time and busines, fireth and in heart: and at once, both led forward the Legions, and gave the horsemen also a signal to let upon the enemies, But the Samnites could not endure this violent charge, but ran as fast as ever they could to recover the camp falt by the baillimon of the Gauls, leaving their fellows behind them in fight to pay the reckoning. The Gauls having likewise made a target-like, flood thick and cloie together under it. Then Fabius advartised of the death of his brother Conulf, commanded a wing or Cornet, to the number almost of 500, horsemen of Capua, to withdraw themselves out of the conflict, to caft about and to play upon the backs of the Gauls: after whom, he caufed the Princeps of the third Legion to follow: and whereever they elipted the ranks of the enemies by force of horsemen disorder'd and broken there, to second them, and press on, and kill them while they were in disarray, and afraid. Himself vowed a temple to Jupiter Victor, together with the spoils of his enemies. Which done, he advanced straight forward to the camp of the Samnitis. Thither all the multitude of them were driven in great fright and disarray, and for that the gates were not able to receive so great a multitude, crowding together, that they were kept out, and could not get in, by reason of the throng of their fellows, began again to fight under the rampart. Where Collins Egnatius, the General of the Samnits was stucken down and slain: after this, the Samnites within their rampart, were killed every one, and their camp after small resistance won. The Gauls behind their back were environed and cut in pieces. That day were slain of enemies five and twenty thousand, and 8000 taken prisoners. Howbeit, this victory cost the Romans blood: for of P. Decius his army, there died 7000, and of Fabius, 1200. Fabius then having lent out to seek out the body of his Collegue, gathered up all the spoils of the enemies into an heap, and burned them, to the honor of Jupiter Victor. But that day could not the Consul his body be seen, by reason it was covered and hidden under heaps of the Gauls that lay there dead. The morrow after it was found and brought again with many a tear of all his followers. Then Fabius letting all other matters for the time aside, solemnized the burial and funeral obsequies of his fellow Consul, with due commendation and condigne prases, and with all honor that could be devis'd.

In Tuscany also about the same time, Q. Fabius Propror, had fortune sufficient to his hearts desire: besides great damage done to the enemy, by invasions & rodes into the country, he fought also A notable battle: wherein of Perusins and Cinfrns were slain above 5000, and twenty en signs won. The Samnits, as they fled through the territory of the Pelignians, were by them intercepted and encloset and of five thousand, they were left but one thousand. Great is the fame of that day, and of the battle that was fought in the Sinisinate territory, if a man hold him only to the truth, and make no more of it than it was. But some have overreached a little, and written, that the enemies were 40000 foot and 4000 horse strong: also, that they had a thousand char-iots or waggons, reckoning and comprising the Umbrians and Tuscans withall: who also (as they say) were at the battle. And to encrease also the power and forces of the Romans, they report, that L. Valerius Propertor, was a Commander, together with the Consuls, and that his army was joined with the Legions of the Consuls; but I find in most Chronicles that this victory was achieved by the two Consuls only. Valeriusinus in the meantime warred in Samnium; and having forced and driven the army of the Samnits, to take the hill Tiferinus, nothing afraid for the disad-vantage of the place, did confine them, and put them to flight. Q. Fabius, having left the army of Decius behind him in Tuscany, reduced his own legions into the City, and triumphed over the Gauls, Tuscans, and Samnits. His footdiers followed him in his triumph, who, in their rude military times and longs, celebrated no less the brave and noble death of P. Decius, than the worthy victory of Quintus Fabius. And they revived the memorial of his father late deceased, comparing him in equal degree, for the issue and event, as well publick as private, with the praises of his son. Of the booty and pillage gained from the enemies, the footdiers had given unto them: As Ailes appeare, with a liberty cloak, and cost a good reward for a footdiers service in those days.

For all these notable victories achieved, yet neither the Samnits nor the Tuscans were at en-cer. For both the Perusins began to rebel, so soon as the Consul had away his army: and also the Samnits came down to forrage and spoil into the territory of Perusinum and Forminum, and another way into Ferentinum, which lie along the river Valderus. Against them was Appius Claudius the Preator, sent with Decius his army, and Fabius in Tuscany, which began new war, and drew four thousand and five hundred Perusins, took prisoners 1749, who were confined for: 3 s. 6 d. Ailes a piece.
The rest of the pillage was all belotted upon the footdiers. The Legions of the Samnits being purified hard at heels, partly by Appius Claudius Preator, and partly by L. Valerius Proconcinus, met all together in the territory of Stills. Where both the Samnits legions abode, and also Appius and Valerius joined and encamped together. There was a sharp and cruel battle fought on both sides. The Romans were incensed with anger and choler against those that had so often rebelled: the other, upon a desperate mind were resolute to hazard the utmost. So there were slain of the Samnits, 16500; 2700, taken prisoners, and of the Romans there died two thousand seven hundred.

This year to fortunate in war, was by reason of pelissence much afflicted; and for certain prodigions tokens, full of care and perplexed. For it was reported, that in divers places it rained earth and that in the army of Appius Claudius, there were many smitten & blessed with lightning. In regard hereto, the books of Sibyls were perused and fought into. The same year Q. Fabius Garber, the Consul his son, fined and punished by the peace, certain wives who had been convicted and condemned before the people, of Adultery: of which money he raiful by their fines, he caused to be built the Temple of Venus, which handeth near the Circius or Race.

There remain yet behind certain wars of the Samnits, whereof we have now continued our biography in these four books, for the space of six and forty years, ever since that M. Valerius, and A.
Cornelius were Consuls, who were the first that warred in Samnium. To let past therefore, and not to trouble the reader, with a prolix narration of the alternative overthrows given and received between both nations so many years one after another, for all which calamities and los ses their hearts and courage could not be daunted or conquered: the very last year, the Samnits, in the Sinentian country, in the Pelignian territory, at Tiferinus, and in the territory of Stills, were defested both by themselves, with their own legions, and also mingled with others; and that, by four armies, and four Roman Captains: loft the bravest and most noble General of all their nation; saw their conquerors and allies in war. the Tuscans. Umbrians, and Gauls, in the fame principle as themselves, not able to stand and maintain their estate any longer, either by their own power, or with help of foreign forces; yet for all this, would they not abate from war, to little weary were they of defending their liberty although it was unfortunately: choosing rather, to be vanquished, than not to attempt the winning of victory. Who is he, that would not think it irksome, and tedious, either to write or read this long suits and train of wars, which they in fighting were never wearied?

After Q. Fabius and P. Decius, succeeded Conuls L. Poetlminius Merullus and M. Atti cius Regu. To them both, was committed charge of Samnium, for that the bruit went, that the en-nemies had prepared three full armies, the one to go again into Tuscany, the second to invade and over-run the territory of Capua, and the third to defend their own frontiers. Pothirius by reason of tickts remained at Rome, but Attius were plenty with an army forth to the end that he might pursuie the enemies on a sudden in Samnium, before they had taken the field sot to the Senate had given direction: and he found the enemy in the way to meet him, as if it had been fo of purpose before by them determined, ready there to keep him from entrance and so far off were they from wailing the lands of the Samnits, that they could not on enter into

their confines: nay, the Samnits debauched them from departure thence, into the peaceable parts and territories of their allies. Now when as they were encamped afofrone against another: that, which the Romans being to often conquerors, would hardly have adventured, (see how utter delight driveth men to rash projects and extremities) the Samnits attempted: even to give assault upon the Romans camp. And albeit this to venturous enterprise sped not well in the final effect, yet was it not altogether in vain attempted. There chance to be a Peggy mit, which continued a good part of the day, so thick and palatable, as men could not see before them, I fly not, so far as without the trench, but not so much as thole that came close to speak one to another. The Samnits hereupon taking the advantage fit for an ambushment, before it was feft day light, and the same much overcast and dim with the mist, came as far as the Corps de guard of the Romans, who in the gates and entrance of the camp warned but negligently: being thus taken on a sudden, they had neither courage nor strength enough to resist. At the back-side of the camp, they assaulted the great gate Decumana, seized the Quellors pavilion, and that quarter about it: where the Quellor himself (L. Opimius Pansa) was slain, and thereupon the alarm was given, The Coh, being with this tumult raised, commanded two bands or cohorts of allies: to wit the one of Lucianians, and the other of Suefians, which haply were next hand; to defend and guard the Pretors pavilion, and that quarter, In the mean while he marched with the legionary bands along the high broad street in the camp, called Principalis, and before they had buckled and fitted their armor about them, they were ranged in battle array; and had knowledge of the enemy, by the ear and eye. rather than by the sight of the eye: neither could they give an estimate what K number they were. At the first, as doubtful of the event, and mistrustful, their fortune, they retreated, and received their enemies in, and let them come even into the midst of the camp: but then the Conful cried out, and asked, Whether they meant to be turned out of their own ramparts and holds fast, and alter have a new piece of work to affair and win them again? So they left a shout, and put all their might together, and still made resistance only and kept their ground: but afterwards they let forward, and prefled upon them: and having once beat them back, they drive them along them: with the same fear, that they themselves began, yet, and chafed them out of the gate and the trench: but to proceed further, for to pursue the chafe, they durst not, for fear of some ambushment, by reason of the misty and troubled weather, containing themselves with the saving of their ramp and no more: and so they retired within their ramparts having slain to the number we near of, three hundred enemies. Of Romans, as well their that were in the first Corps de guard and Sentinels, who kept the watch, as of those that were surprised about the Quellors lodging, were killed 230. This bold adventure of the Samnites speeding so well, made them take better heart; so as they would not permit the Romans to encamp further into the Country, no, nor so much, as to go a foraging into their territory: whereupon they were compelled to retire again, and to purvey forage in the quiet and peaceable quarters of their friends about Sora.

The bruit of all these occurrences more troublesome and fearful then truth was, being come to Rome, sanctified L. Pefhoniuns the Conful, before he was well recovered of his sickness, to take the field: but ere he departed the City, he proclaimed the Rendezvous at Sora, for his soldiers there to meet. Himilici: now dedicated unto the goddess Victoria, the Temple, which in the time of his Conule Edichilp he took order to be built, with the money raised of certain fines taken of persons condemned. Then took he his journey to the army, and so went forward from Sora directly into Samnium, to the camp of his brother Conful, But the Samnits distilling themselves, as not able to withstand two armies, were dillufed, and departed back: and the Conuls also parted one from another, holyday ways, to wallace the country, and assault the towns. Pefhoniuns acting first coming, alloyed by meer force to saif the town Milhonias, and leaping he could do small good that way, at length by rolling trenches and platforms, he approached close to the walls, and wanit: and abstr the town was thus forced, yet there continued a sharp and long fight in all streets and parts there: of the four hundred of the day until the eighth, with N doubtful and variable events for a good while; but in the end the Romans became masters of the town. Of Samnits were slain 3200 and 4100, were taken prisoners: besides the gaining of other boory and plage, From thence, he led forth the legions to Perennium, but the inhabitants with their bag and baggage, and all that they could drive or carry, had quit the town in the full night, fatten and departed in great silence at a contrary poltern gate, which opened from the camp of the enemy. The Conful so soon as he was come, at the first approached the walls, as well appointed and provided of all things, as if he should have found as much to do, as at Milhonias: but afterwards, perceiving all silent and defolate throughout the City, facing neither men nor ammunition within the towers and upon the walls; he held back his soldiery. deatious and greedy to enter upon the bare walls, so abandoned and distinguished of defence: and doubting to off he didlongere he were aware, into the trains of some hidden and priFFy ambusc, he command ed two Co's of the Cavalry of Latine confederates, to ride about the walls about the countercarr, and well to view and consider all places. The horns men finding one or two gates near together standing wide open, and in the very same ways that led from thence, the fresh tracks and footing of the enemies as they fled by night; rode foltly nearer and nearer to the gates: and there they might see straight above them the entrance, and the City lying open even from one end to the other: whereupon they brought word back to the Conful, that the City was abandoned, and the enemies
A enemies gone: which was very evident and apparent, as well by the very foltitude thereof, as the new and fresh marks and traces of their dislodging and departure: as also by the stuff and goods that lay here and there. I steered all abroad, whilst they halted fearfully in the dark, to take their flight, The Conful upon this report, with his host drew to that side of the town, which the horsemen were at: and pitching down his enigns not far from the gate, commanded five other horsemen to enter into the City; giving order, that when they had gone forward a pretty way, three of them should stay behind in the same place if they saw all safe and out of danger; and the other two, bring him what they had seen and found. Who being returned, made relation that they were gone so far as they might see about them every way into all parts, & could perceive nothing but silence and vast desolation all about, both far and near: then forthwith, the Conful entered the City, with certain cohorts lightly appointed, and charged the rest in the mean while to fortify the camp. The soldiers being once enticed, fell to break open the doors where they found a few silly old folk, and some feeble and diseased persons, with such movables as were hard to be conveyed and transported: those they killed, and ranfaked: and by certain captives they understood, that divers other towns thereabout, were all with one accord fled and gone: and as for their own countrymen, they departed at the first watch of the night, and they thought no other verily but that in the rest of the Cities, they shou'd find the like emptines and solitude. And as the prisoners said, so proved indeed: and the Conful postified himself of those forlorn and abandoned towns.

C The other Conful M. Attillns, had to sene war for his part: who as he was marching with his Legions toward Ltercia, which he heard was besieged by the Samnites: the enemy encountered and met him in the very entry of the frontiers, and gave him battle: and the anger and indignation upon both parts, but the end and fill he more heavy and dolorous on the Romans side: both because they were not used to be vanquished: and also for that in the very looke and retreat, rather then in combat and skirmish, they found that many more were hurt and slain of their part. Which feartful flight and terror, as it began in the camp, if it had surprized them in the conflict, it would have been an heavy day with them: & no doubt they had received a notable overthrow. And even then being as it was, they had a careful night, and full of anguish; thinking truly that the Samnites would presently assault their camp, or at least wise in that in the morning betimes they would have necessity flight with the conquerors. But the enemies, as their loss was left, to their heart and courage was never the more: For so soon as the day brake, deforins were too they be gone without any bate, Howbeit there was but one way, & that lay close and near to their enemies: which they were not so soon enticed into: but they made them a far off, as if they marched straight to the assault of the camp, The Conful commanded his men to arm, and to follow after him without the ramparts. To his Lieutenants, Colonels and Captains of the Allies, he gave several charges to do as he thought needful and requisite. They all promised to execute any direction whatsoever: but they said within, that their soldiers hearts were done, that they had watched and fit up all night, amongst the griefvous and uncomfortable groans of them that lay a dying: and no doubt if the enemy had come before day against the camp, so daunted were they, that they would have abandonne their colours: and even now for very shame and nothing else, they forbore indeed to run away, but otherwise their hearts were gone, and they clean spent. The Conful hearing this, thought good to go about him elin person, into every one of his soldiers, and to speak unto them: and even as he met with any of them, and saw them in backward, and going about to coldly to take arms and weapon in hand: he checked and rebuked them: crying aloud, and asking why they sat still? why they loitered and made such delay? saying, that the enemies would come to them within the very camp, and cut their throats, unless they made more haste to sally forth:yes, and forced they should be to fight before their tent doors if they would not give battle with the trench and ramparts. They that are armed (faith he) and will fight manfully, shall obtain undoubted victory: but the unarmed and naked man that attendeth the enemies coming, Maist rather die for it, or endure captivity. As he rated and rebuked them in these terms, they answered flatly against that they had enough of yesterdays work, and were utterly done and had neither strength nor blood left them in their bodies: and now the enemies (say they) seemed more in number then they were the day before. Amid these speeches the army approached and being now but a little way off they might take a full view of them more certainly, and see everything. Whereupon they said confidently, that they saw the Samnits to bring with them their stakes and pales to call a palisado, no doubt, round about their whole camp. At this the Conful cried out upon them for very shame to suffer a reproach and disgrace of a most bitterly enemy. And that we be (nomine be) belter and emmated within our own camp, there to die for hunger and famine with shame, rather then by edge of sword (if there be no other remedy) with honor, like men? The gods speed as well (nomine be) and their will be done: and do every man as he thinks best. So M. Attillns the Conful, being rebuked even himself alone (no man else will follow) to meet the enemy in the face, and rather be beaten down and dier amongst the Samnites enigns, than face the Roman camp beleighted with stern fight, and rampart raised about it. The Lieutenants, Colonels, and all the bands and Coronets of the Cavalry, ye, and the principal Centurions of the forrorn companies liked well of this, and accepted the Conful hit words. Then the soldiers for their part, flainly take weapon in hand and as joyfully, God wot, goth forth of camp. And thus in long ranks and files: nor close united together but broken here and there, with hea-

...very cheer, and as men half vanquished already, they marched after a fort toward the enemy, who was neither in hope nor in heart better resolved and fared then they. For to soon as the Samnites discovered the Roman Standards, suddenly from the vanguard to the rearguard, there went a muttering and bust from one to another, that the Romans were come forth (the only thing they always feared) to embrace and drop their passage, so as now there was no way for them to fly and escape from them, and save themselves, but must either die in the place, or play their enemies and make a land even over their bodies. All their packs and fardeis, they call together upon an heap in the midst: and being armed as they were, every man ranged and marshalled themselves in their own array. Now was there a very little space between the two armies, and they stood looking one upon another, waiting when their enemies would begin to give the first charge and set up the first shout. But neither of both had any reason to fight. And furely on both sides they had gone sundry ways untouched, and without any blows given or taken but that they feared both, lest if they had skirmished of one part first, the other would have come upon them. Thus of themselves they began a faint fight, as unwilling and lost thereto, with an uncertain and unequal show; neither stirred any man one foot. Then the Roman Consil, to begin the skirmish, sent out some few Cornets of horsemen from a side, without the battalions whereof the most part fled from their horses, and others were disarrayed and put out of order: whereupon both Samnites ran out to kill those that were fallen, and Romans also to refuse their fellows. Then the skirmish began a little to wax hot: but the Samnites advanced forward in greater number far, and belittled themselves (as it seemed) more lustily: and withal, the Roman horsemen being disordered and in confusion, with their horses affrighted trod under their feet the footmen that came to refuse. Who beginning once to fly, caused the whole Roman army also to turn their backs. And now the Samnites played upon the backs of the Romans, as they fled: whereat the Consil rode before a gallop to the camp gate, where he bestowed a good corps de guard of horsemen, opposite in the way: and made proclamation, that whoever came toward the camp, were he Samnites or he Romans, should be taken and used as an enemy. With these and such like threats, he put himsefl against the footmen, that marched so fast in heaps to the camp, Whither away they, (quoth he to every footman that he met) here where shall thou find men in a ms to fight within? here shall thou meet with thine enemy, as well as in the field before: no entering here into the camp without victory, so long as thy Consil liveth: chace therefore whether thou hadst rather fight with thy own countrmen or thine enemies. Whilesthe Consil entertained them with this welcome, the horsemen also with spear in reft, and bent bull against them, came about, charging the footmen upon their peril to turn again to battle. Thus not only the Consil his virtue and prowess served in good stead, but fortune also went on their side: for the Samnites followed not the chase so far, but that the Romans had both time and ground enough to turn about their enemies, and to direct their battalions from their camp against the enemy. Then one encouraged another to go to battle again. The Centurions matched the banners out of the bearers hands, and advanced them forward: declaring to their foeldiers, how few the enemies were in number, and how disorderly and out of all array they came against them. In this while the Consil lift up his hands to heaven, and with a clear and audible voice, vowed a Temple to Jupiter Status, it to be the Roman M army stayed their flight, and by running the consil should kill and vanquish the Samnites Legions. Hereupon endeavoured they on all hands, the Captain and foeldier, both horsemen and footmen, to re-enforce the battle. And even the very gods from heaven seemed to have a special regard of the Romans at that time, so quickly the dice turned, and the enemies were repulsed from the rampants: and within a small while forced again to the very place where the battle began. Where by reason of their fardeis and packs which they had heaped together in the midst, and now by in their very ways, they were stopped in their very passage, and for fear left their goods should be rifled and spoild, they call a ring round about their bag and baggage. Then the Roman Infantry afront, and the Cavalry behind, compassed them, and charged upon them right fiercely: where in the midst between, they were either slain or taken. The prisoners were N in number 7500, who were all put naked under the yoke, and told: the number of them that were slain was about 4500. The Romans for all this had no great lift to boast and brag of their victory, for the Consil taking view and account of his loss there two days, found by computation, that he missed 7500.

Whilesthesethings thus passed in Apollo the Samnites with another power, asayed to surprize and get again interrimis, a Colony of the Romans: surnamed upon the Latine high-way: but when they could not be matters of the town, they overtread and plundered the territory: and having got a good booty of men, women, and cattel, one with another: whiles they were driving the same before them, together with certain Coloners whom they had taken prisoners, they light upon Consil as he returned with victory from Luceria: where they not only lost their spoil, but were of themselves slain as they marched disorderly in long files. The Consil made proclamation, That every man should repair to Interrimis, for to own and challenge his own goods, and to receive the same again: and therefore leaving his army, went to Rome against the Election of new Magistrates. When he laboured instantly for a triumph, he was denied that honor; both for that he had loft so many thousands, and also because he had put his captives under the gallowes, and sold them, without further imposition.

The other Col. Posthumius, wanting subject matter of war to work upon among the Samnites, passed.
A passed with his army into Tuscany: and after he had first pillaged and spoilt the Volscians territory, he gave them battle not far from their walls, who stood forth to defend their frontier; where there were 2200, Tuscanians slain: the rest, by reason that the City was so near, eschewed and saved themselves. Then led he his army into the territory of Rofulum, where he not only laid the fields waste, but won the town also: took prisoners above two thousand and flew under two thousand before their walls. Howbeit, in that year, the peace obtained in Hannia, was more honorable and renowned then the war had been. For three of the strongest and most puffed States, even the very Capital Cities of Tuscany, to wit, Volsci, Perusia, and Areurium, desired accord, and having conditioned with the Conuls and promised, to find his foundries clothing and corn, so they might

B have leave to send Orators to Rome to treat for peace, obtained at length a truce of forty years. And for that present, each City was fined to pay * 50000 Ares. For these acts done, the Conful having requelled triumph of the Senat, for manner and fashion, rather then upon any hope to speed: and receiving some of them to deny him flatly, as pretending that it was too late ere he departed the City: and other some, for that without order and direction of the Senat, he passed out of Samnium into Tuscany and that partly his adversaries, & partly the friends of his Colleague, who might take some comfort and contentment, that he also had the repulse with them, were against his triumph: My Masters (quoth he) you that are Senators of Rome, I will not be far mindful of your honor and majesty, as that I will forget my self to be a Conul: and by virtue of the fame authority of commission, wherewith I have conducted and managed these wars for so much

C as, I have happily brought them to end, and subdued Samnium and Tusca, achieved victory, and obtained peace: triumph I will, and ask you no leave. And with that he departed out of the Senat. After this, there arose a debate and disputation among the Tribuns of the Commons. Some of them laid, they would enquire their negative that he should not in this manner triumph, and give so ill a precedent. Others gave out, that they would affliat him in his triumph, marre the heads of all their Concolleges. After much ado, the matter was referred unto the people, and the Conul being thither called, alledged, that L Horatius, and Mer. Valerius Conuls, also Caes Mar-

D centus Roscius of late days, even the father of them, who then was Censor, triumphed without the authority and approbation of Senat, only by the ordinance of the people. Over and besides, he added and said, that himself also would have moved the people therein, but that he knew that the

E Tribuns of the Commons, who were become vaflals and slaves to the Nobles, would have nipped and crossed the bill. As for himself, he protested, that he did and would account of the will and favour of the people, agreeing together, as well as of all their Acts and Decrees whatsoever. So the matter after, by the assistance of three Trib. banded against the opposition and negative voices of seven yeas, and against the general resolution of the Senat, he triumphed: and all the people with great joy solemnized and celebrated the honor of that day. But the records do very much about the acts and affairs of this year also, Claudius writeth. That Pothinus having won certain towns in Samnium, was after in Apulia discomfited and put to flight: and that himself in person being hurt, was with some few besides, driven to take Laceria for refuge: and that it was Art-ilius, that fought in Tuscany, and triumphed. Fabius contrariety reporteth, That both Conuls E warred in Samnium and at Laceria: and that one of the armies was transported into Tuscany: but which of the Conuls had the conduct thereof, he hath not set down within: also that before Laceria, there were on both parts many slain: and how in that battle, there was a Temple vowed to Jupiter Stator, like as Romulus had done before in times past: howbeit, before this time, there was no Temple erected; but only a Jorum, [i. a place pronounced, declin'd, and consecrated before to build a Temple on.] But in this year at last, the City being now twice bound and obliged to perform one and the same vow, made a concurrence of it, and moved the Senate to decree and take order, that the house and temple aforesaid should be erected accordingly.

After this year, there succeeded a brave and noble Conul, L. Papius Curfor, as well in regard of his fathers glory, as his own reputation. Allo a mighty war, and euch a victory as never any General wann the like at the Samnits hands before that day, but L. Papius Curfor in the Conuls father. And as it fell out, they made the like preparation for war, with the same endeavor and furniture of all costly and brave armor, as before time. Moreover, they nourished and favored of the gods before, by a strange kind of induction and inspiration of the loudiers, binding them to take their oaths, after an old ceremonial custom, as if they were to take orders in some holy mysteries; yea, and levied multitudes throughout all Samnium, after a new form of a law and edict: That whoever of the younger fort and serviceable men, fit to bear arms, shewed not themselves, and gave attendance at the Generals appointment and proclamation, and whoever departed without his leave and licence, his head should be forfeit unto Jupiter as accursed and damned. When there G gathered together, to the number of forty thousand fighting men, even the whole flower and manhood of Samnium. There, about the midst of the camp, was a plot of ground set out, well fenced and enclosed all about with hurdles and boards, and the same covered all over with linnen cloaths: the place was two hundred foot square, every way. Then there was a solemn sacrifice celebrated and divine service laid, according to an order read out of an old book made of linnen, and the same by a certain Priest. One Osiris Paccius, a very aged man: who avouched, that he set these sacred and holy ceremonies from the old ancient Religion of the Samnits, according to the manner and custom, which in times past their ancestors had used, at what time as they completed the sacrifice H was done, the General of the army by his Prefevant at arms commanded to cite and call forth by name, the noblest persons, either for parentage, or acts achieved: who were brought into the place aforesaid, one by one. Amongst other preparations of this sacred solemnity (which were able to strike a religious fear and devotion in a mans mind) there were certain altars erected in the midst of this place closely covered in all parts, and sacrifices lying plain all about, and the Centurions standing round with their swords ready drawn. Then the loutier was causd to approach near the altars (like a sacrifice himself, rather then one that should have his part of the sacrifice) and urged by virtue of an oath, to promise, that he would never utter abroad and reveal, whatsoever he there should see or hear. Afterward he was put to wear, after an horrible and dreadful form of words, framed and tending expressly to the curing of his own person, his house and all his race and lineage, in case, he were not into any barril, whereover the Generals should lead him, and if either himself fled out of the field, or saw any one to run away, and flew him not outright in the place. At the first verily, some there were that refused to take such an oath, and presently were massacred by the Altars side. And lying there along together with the feats, which had their throats cut for sacrifices, they laboured for a warning, to teach all the rest how they made refusal. When the chief of the Samnitis had taken this abominable and cursed oath, ten of them were elected and nominated by the foreign Captain, who every one had in charge to chuse himself a fellow, and they likewise incalculably to take other to them, man by man, until they had made up the number of 1600. And these were called Lictoris Legio [i.e. the linnen Legion]. Taking K the name of the covering of that indole wherein the Nobility of the Samnitis were wont. These had given into them brave and glorious armor, with helmets plumed and plumed, because they should seem taller then the rest. Another army there was, consisting of twenty thousand and better, who neither in goodly and tall perspence, nor in martial prowess and reputation, nor yet in furniture and letting out were inferior to the linnen Legion aforesaid. Lo, what a number there was of fighting men, even the whole strength and manhood of all Samnitis, assembled and encamped in Agidius.

The Roman Consuls took their journey from the City of Rome, and C. Catulnus first unto whom were appointed the old Legions, which M. Attulus the Consul of the former year, had left in the territory of Interamnus. And with them he marched into Samnium. And, mean while that the enemies were over much busied and amused with their superfluous accommodations, and held their feeter and mystical councils, he won by force on the Samnitis, the town Alfredum. Where almost 2500 men were slain, and 4270 taken prisoners. But Poppus, having by direction from the Senate enrolled a new army, forced the town Dardania; took fewer prisoners then his Colleague, but in that thereof, put many more to the word. A rich booty there was got, both in the one place and the other. Afterwards the Consuls overran the whole country of Samnium, but they spoild and wathet especially the lands about Atinum. Carinus marched as far as Commumus, and Poppus to Aquilina, where the whole power of the Samnitis lay encamped. There, for a good while they neither far still, and were altogether idle in the camp, nor yet was there any hot fire in the field. They spent the time in provoking them to fight, that gladly they would have taken still for in lying off and giving ground, to thole that affulled them: and thus, I lay with threatening, rather then offering battle, they parled the day. For whiles they began ever and anon, and gave over as quickly, there was no occasion of any skirmishes, & the decision even of small matters and occurrences were prolonged and put off from day to day. The other camp of the Romans lay twenty miles off: and all the other Consul was abstant, yet his hand and counsel was in every enterprise and exploit. For so there lay a greater weight and charge at Aquilina, than at Commumus: for Carinus had a more careful eye that way, then to the place which himself beteaged. L. Papirus being now at all points provided to fight, dispatched a messenger to his Colleague, to signifie unto him: that he minded the next day, if he were not checked by the Auspices to give the enemy battle: and withal, that it was expedient and needful that he likewise should with all his forces assaile Commumus: that the Samnitis within, might have neither means nor force to lend any succour to Aquilina. This post had that one day allowed him to doe his meisage, and attend his dispatch; and by night he made return, and brought word unto the Consul from his Colleague, that he liked well of his purpose and advice, Poppus then immediatly dismissed and sent away the courrier aforesaid, and assembled his fondiers to an audience, where he discoursed at large concerning war in general. Much he spake also as touching the present preparation and magnificent situation of the enemies, more brave and good in those and of importance in the end: for they are not the plumed crets (quoth he) that give the deadly wounds, but the Romans speer and lance it is, that is able to pierce their guided and damasked shields: yea, and that other glittering array with milch white diaper coats must be died red in blood, when they come to stroaks, and to try it out by dint of word. The golden and silvered armies of the Samnitis, were sometimes by my father put to the sword, and killed to the last man: and they served rather for rich spoils to honoure the victorious enemy, then for armor of proof, to defend and save themselves. This is a fatal gift, and defined to our name and family, for to be chosen Generals, and to be oppossed against the greatest munificence and attempts of the Samnitis, and to bring away with them, those spoils which might be ornaments to beautifie the publick places of the City. And the immortal gods no
A "no doubt are present to defend and still us in our quarrel, against those that to oft have fought for peace and alliance, and as often broke the same themselves. And it a man may conjecture and guess of the will and providence of the Gods, they never were to any army more adva- and full of indignity, then to that, which being stained and polluted with the blood of beasts and men, maelstrack and mingled together in an horrible and execrable kind effaccular; and de- rived to a wound of the anger of the gods, having in dread and horror of one side, the vengeance of the same gods, witnesseth their breach of covenants with the Romans; and on the other side the detestable and abominable curies, comprised in an oath, taken against all covenant and promise, hathkorn by constraint and perfec; hattle and detesteth the oath whereby they B are persued, and one time, is in fear of the gods, of their own selves, and their enemies. Thus having flewed unto his fouldiers (who were already of themselves badly and mulitionly en- nongkent against the enemies) that he had certain intelligence of all these things, by the con- fimation avered by certain fugitives that were fled from them unto him; they all being now full of allured hope of Gods help and mans, with one uniform cryed for battle: and nothing grieved them more then this. That it was put to end until the morrow; having in their hearts the rest of that day behind, and that one night for being so long. About mid-night, Papryus hav- ing received letters back from his Colleague, got him up, and when all were fast asleep, and sent the chiet-matter to take token; & observe the prelim of the pullers. There was not one throughout the whole camp, of what quality or degree ever but had a desire to fight. The highest as well as the lowest were earnest and eager: the Captains might behold and see the fouldiers affection and courage that way; and the fouldier likewise the Captains: in so much that the same ardent desire of battle which was in all the rest, reached also even to those that had the charge of the Aupiceps. For when as the chickens would not peck, the chiet-matter adventured to lye and fullike the token, and made report to the Confid, that it was * Trippidum fulf111urn. Wherea- the Conif right glad and joyous pronounced that the token was lucky, and that they to fight under the favour and conduct of the gods; and hencupon he put forth the signal or bloody banner of battle. As he was now marching forth to the field with his army, behold a fugitive out of the enemies camp, brought word, that twenty cohorts or companies of Sannites, and those were about 4000 in an cohont, were gone to Commime. And became his Colleague Cur lulium should not be ignorant hereof; he presently dispatched a carrier in post unto him, and himself commanded the Ensigns and Standards to be advanced and set forward with speed, ordaining the bands in the removal for articles, and disposing them in divers places, with Captains over the same, accordingly, he appointed L. Volturnius to lead the right wing, and L. Serpe the left, and the horesmen he committed to the conduct of two Lieutenant, C. Cederrius and Trebbonius. As for S. Mantius, he charged him in all haste to take off the pack-fuddles from the Mules, and to mount the cohorts of the light armed footmen that lere in the wings, upon their backs, and with them to fetch a compass, and to seizing upon an ill here in sight, and in the heat of the confid, to shew himself from thence and to raise as great a cloud of dust as possibly he could. Whilest the General was occupied hereabout, there arose some warbling amongst the chicken-mallets touching the Aupiceps or prelidge of that day; inso much as they were over heard of the Romans horsemens; who supposing it a matter of good consequence and to be regarded, advertised Sp. Pa- pyrus (the Colius Nephew, or Brothers son) that there was some doubt and question about the Aupiceps. The youth born in those days when there were no Atheists, nor Lectures read of deporting God and Religion: enquired farther into the matter, because he would not certify any thing whereof he was not sure: and when he had found out the truth, gave knowledge thereof to the Conif; who said thus unto him, "God bleis the my ion, and be not thon dissayed there, but fight hardly more valiantly, and do thy best endeavour. As for him that has the charge and oversight of the Birds and Aupiceps, if he have made them no report, and given up a contrary prelidge or false sign, all the mischief and peril light upon his own head for his unwrthy. As for me I was told of a Trippidum, and that the birds fell heartily to their meal: and I hold it for slyly Anpice and token of good succcss unto the people of Rome and the army, and for no other. This said, he commanded the Centurions to set those pullers, in the forefront of the battel. The Sam- nites also for their part set forward their Ensigns, and their battelion: then after gallantly set on in gorgeous armor and brave apparell, in such for, as the very sight of the enemies represented a magnificent and farly strew to the beholders, But see what hapned: before the first shot given, before the first volley of shot and encounter, the principal Pullicer chance to be stricken with a javelin, lanced at adventure and at random, and fell down dead even before the Ensigns, Which being reported unto the Confid, "Behold the handy work of God (noth he) the gods are present in this battel, the guilty person hath his due reward. And as the Conif was a speaking these C words loquall before him a Raven set on a wide clear throat, and cried with a lord notest which Augury. the Col, rejoiced, and avowed, that the gods appeared never in mens affairs more evi- dently. And herewith he commanded the trumpeters to sound, and set up a lively shout: then followed a cruel and terrible fight on both siders, but with hearts and courages far unlike. The Ro- mans were ravished and carried on end to the battel, with anger and hope and heat of conflict greedy of bathing their swords, and embrazing their hands in the enemies bloodshed, But the Sannites many of them by force of necessity and constraint of a blind and impertinent religion, even a- gainst their wills, were forced to make resistance, and defend themselves rather then to fight and and offend the enemy. Neither had they sustained and held out the first stout, charge and shot of the Romans (as having now for certain years past been used ever more to go away defeated and vanquished) but that a mightier fear imprinted and settled in their heart roots, had them perseve from running away: for they ever had continually represented in their eye, the whole turmuire of that secret facrifice: of those armed sacrificers and Priests with naked swords; of that hideous but bery of men and of brute beasts, lying slain one with another in their blood intermingled together: of the Altars bespinkled and stained with the lawful shedding of the one; and the detestable effuion of the other; of the dreadful and horrible executions: and to conclude, of that frantic, furious, and detestable form of words, composed and devised to the detestation and maledeion of their line and race. Being fall bound, I say, with these bonds for fleeing away, they stood to it, and stiered not back, fearing their own countrymen more then the enemies. The Romans from both points, and from the middle and main battalion charged hotly, beat them down, killed and cut them in pieces, thus amazed and astonied: as they were with dread of gods and awe of man. Small refilience made they, as who only leared to flie and run away: so by this time, there was execution and havoc made of them almost to the very Stan-ards. At which very instant, there appeared overwhast from the one fide a dust, as if a mighty army had raised it to their march: namely, Sp. Nausius (or as some say, Odccus Metius) who had the leading of certain Cohorts called Alciris, mounted upon Mules, which on purpose made a dust greater, then for that number they were. For those valents and new horsemens, as they fat on their Mules and Sampter-beats, drew after them trailing on the ground, boughs of trees full of branches and leaves: and first, there appeared in the fore-front (as it were, through a dusky and dim light) their armour and gindons: but the dust behind them, rising higher and thicker, made shew of a troop of horsemens flanked an army of footmen: whereby not only the Samnits but Romans also were deceivd, and the Consul himself, to avoid the error and beat them down: was to: cried aloud amongst the Ensigns, so as his voice reached unto his enemies, That Continuum was won, and his Brother Consul was come with victoy; and therefore, they should endeavour and envoice themselves to get the day, before that another army shoult win the honour out of their hands. Thus cried he out on horseback galloping among the ranks to and fro. Then he commanded the Colonels and Centurions, to make a way for the men of arms. Himself afore, had willed that cavalry and Ciditius, that when they elpied him to bear his speare upright and to shake it, then they should with all the mightly they had, put forth the Cavalty and charge the enemies. Every thing was done at a beck, according as they were directed and instituted before hand. The wayes were made wide between the files.

The horsemens fling out, and with spear in rest charge upon the middle battallion of the enemies, and brake their arrayes whereverover they charged. Volusianus and Secpio seconded them with the Infantry: and while they were disarrayed overthrew them, and bare to them the ground.

Down went these linnen Cohorts now, when God and man fought against them, and were dis-comfired: and as well those that took the oath, and the other that were unsworn, fled amain; and without respect of one thing or other, feared none but their enemies. All the footmen that espied the bastard, were beaten into their camp at Aquae.. The Gentlemen and the men of arms fled toward Benabrestum. The Cavality of the Romans pursuied the horsemens, and the Infantry chaied the footmen. The wings took diversways, the right toward the camp of the Samnits, the left unto the Town, Volusianus was somewhate before, and got the Camp. Secpio found more resistence in the City: not for that vanquished men, as they were, had more contagious and revolution, but because that walls are stronger to endure an assault, and better to keep out armed men then a plain trench and rampart. For, from the Courtise, with stones they beat and repelled the enemy. Secpio foreseeing well enough that they should be longer about the assault of a strong and fenced town unless he dispatched the matter quickly and went through with it, in their first affright and confusion, before they took heart again: demanded of his foulders, They would take it well and abide to see the camp won by the other point of the battal, and themselves (being likewise Conquerers) to be repelled from the City Gates? When they allned, No; and said they would never endure that disgrace: himself with his target over his head, approached the gate, the others following after under a target-tenne, run into the City, thrust down the Samnits about the Gate, and got to the Walls: but to engage themselves farther into the City, they durst not, being so few as they were. The Consul himselfe at the first knew nothing of all this, but was occupied about the retreat, and rallying of his men:

for now the fun was well near down, and the night comming on apace, causd every thing even to the very victors to seem dangers and luficious. But when he was advanced farther, he saw on the right hand the camp taken; and on the left, he heard a confused cry and tumult in the City, compounded of the noise of fighting men and frighted persons: and ever after that instant, it fortune that they skirmished at the gate. Then he rode on, neere and nearer, and saw his owmen upon the Walls, how he not nothing yett but performed; so through the raft adventure and foot-hardnes of some few, an over turn was made, and some advantage got of performing great piece of service and worthy exploit, Whereupon, he commanded the forces that were retired to be called, and with banner displayed to enter the City. So soon as they were in, they took the next quarter to the Gates, and for that the night approached, there they refited, and went no farther. But even in that very night, the enemies abandoned the Town. There There were slain that day before Aquilonia 30,400 Samnites, and 870 taken prisoners: and of field enmies they went away with 90. Moreover, this is reported and recorded of Pappius, that there had not been lightly seen a General in any battle more sightsome, cheerful, and merry; were it of his own natural disposition, or upon aspired confidence of victory. Upon which courage and resolution, he could not be revoked from battle, albeit there was some question and tempest at the Anuipice: and even in the hottest time and dangerous point of the conflict, at what time as the manner is to vow temples to the immortal gods: he vowed unto Jupiter Venus, if he that he defeated the Legions of the enemies, to present him with a cup of a sweet and pleasant mead, before he drank any strong and heady wine of the grape: which vow the gods accepted and liked of, and turned the ill preluge of the Anuipices to good.

The other Consull had as good speed at Continus: For at the break of day he approached with all his forces to the walls of the town, and invested it round about: and let strong guards at the gates, for fear they should inflame, or fallily forth. And even as he was about to give the signal of assault, there came a messenger post from his fellow Consul, who in great affright brought word of the coming of twenty cohorts to the incontinent of them within the City: which both kept him short from giving the assault, and caused him to call back again part of his forces, which were arranged and ready under the counter-Carp to affright the defendants. Then he gave charge to Divitis Decius Scans, one of the Lieutenants, to take the first legion and twenty cohorts of the wings, and other horsemen, to make head against the reigne of the enemies store-sold; and wherefore he met them, there to impeach them, yes, and at occasion served, to give them battle: and in no cause to fuffer that power to come to Continus. Himself commanded that ladders should be erected on every side of the town, and under a lance of targets approached the gates. So that in an instant the gates were burnt open, and the walls scaled on every part. The Samnites, as their hearts failed them well enough to keep the enemies from entrance, before they saw any armed man upon the walls: so after, they perceived, that they were assailed not aloof with stones and darts, but fall by and with hand-strokes; and how that they, who hardly and with great difficulty, from the plain got up the walls, having now gained and truncated the place (which they most feared before) could fight at ease from aloft with their enemy, who was not able to match them in the even ground; that the towers and walls, and gathered all together in the market-place, and there for the gate.

Dum while tried the utmost hazard of battle, But afterwards throwing down their weapons, 15,400 of them yielded themselves to the Consul his mercy. There were slain 4380. Thus went the game at Continus, and thus at Aquilonia.

In the mid way between these two Cities, where a third battle was looked for, the enemies were not to be found. And when they were seven miles off from Continus, they had a countermand from their own country-men, and were called away, and so came not to the reigne, neither in the one battell nor the other. In the shuffling of the evening, when it began to be dark, being within the light of the Camp of one hand, and Aquilonia on the other: they might hear a like noise and cry from both parts, which caused them to pause. But afterwards, when they were over-against the Camp which was fired by the Romans; the flame spreading far abroad declared the defeat of the Samnites more evidently, and flasted them there for going farther. In which very place they laid down here and there in their armour; (as they were) and passed a restfull and inequit long night, expecting (and yet fearing) the light of the day. At the dawning whereof, and so soon as it began to be peep, while they were uncertain and doubtful what to take they happened to be discovered by the cavalry of the enemies: and suddenly in a fearfull amaze and affright, they took them to their heels and fled in great disorder. Those horsemen having pursur'd the Samnites, who in the night leasonekaped out of the town, chance to copy this foresaid multitude, and perceived they were neither entrenched, nor defended with a good corps de guard. This company was defeitd alio even from the walls of Aquilonia: whereupon, by this time the legionary footmen likewise made after them; but they could not overtake them in the chase, to fuit they fled: howbeit the horsemen cut off some, and flew two hundred and fourscore in the tail of the rearguard. In this affright they left much armure behind them, and eighteen ensigns, and to the left of the army faced themselves, and as well as they might in to tears of their salvation. The joy of these two Romans armies was wonderfully encreased. To see one another have so good and fortunate losses in their enterprises, Both the Consuls, by each others advice and consenc, gave their towns thus won unto the footiers to be fackled and rilled: and after the goods were out, to let fire on the empty houses; inibus a wife, that in one and the same day both Aquilonia and Continus were burnt to ashes; and the Consuls, with muchal congratulation and joy, as well between their Legions as themselves, relating one another joyed both their Camps in one, Afterwards in the light of both Armies,rdis highly commended and praised his footders every one as he desired, and rewarded them with gits according. Pappius also for his part, who had performed many and laudable skirmishes as well in the field, and battell, as about the winning of the Camp and forcing the City, betowed by way of honour upon Sp, Namus, and Sp, Papppius his brotherston, as also upon four Centurions and the band of the Hadriati or Ialclines, bracelets a Coronets of gold; and Namus for that he bare himself most worthily in that journey and expedition, wherein with his constient troop of horsemen upon Mules, he did terrify the enemy, as if he had conducted them to a main army of men at arms: and young Pappius for his good service with his cavalry as well in the battle and constant.
fliet, as also in that night wherein he forced the Samnites to fly secretly, and quit the City Aquinio:— the Centurions and foildiers, in this regard, that they were the first who seiz'd the gates and walls of that town: as for all the foremen, in consideration of their manifold travels and brave exploits shewed in orderly places, he gave them bracelets and little horns of fliver. This done, forasmuch as it was time now to draw forth their army from out of Samnmum, either both together, or one of them alone; they came to Consil and confultation thereupon, and thought it was the better course to the end that the Samnites might be brought lower, and their flate more febenably decayed, to go forward still, and charge them with greater force and resOLUTION, and to purifie the reliet that was behind; that Samnmum might be deliver'd up to the Consuls their succedors, utterly subdued and subdu'd: since the enemies now had no army abroad in field, like either to give or abide another battle; and these remained but one manner of making war, even to besiege and affait their Cities and strong Towns; by the winning and subversion whereof, they might with the piggish emin and make their own foildiers for ever, and withal impoverish their enemies and make a hand of them quite now at the last call'd forward to fight for Church and Home. Hereupon the Consuls dispatched their letters to the Senate and people of Rome, containing the effect at large of all these exploits; and then divided themselves, and took two severall wai'es: Papirius, Marched with his legions to the siege of Sepumnum and Carullis with his to besiege Volatium.

The Consuls letters were read and heard with exceeding joy, as well in the court of the Council of the City, as in Common Hall of assemblies; and this publick consent and rejoicings were dynamically with general proceedings, for the space of four days, and with marvellous zeal, affecion, and devotion of private persons in particular. And to lay a truth, this victory was to the flate of Rome not only great and honourable, but also of great consequence, in regard that it fell out in so good and commodious a time. For even then, news came that Tufcany was revolted and rebelled, and men began to call in their minds, and discomposc how they should do in case ought should hap but well in Samnmum to withstand the fors and invasion of the Tuscan: who taking heart, and presuming upon the Samnites, and their cursed and execrable oath, by ventur whereby they were oblig'd to fight to the utmost extremity, embraced the occasion and opportunity of taking arms again, whilst both the Consuls and the whole forces of Rome were diverted and withdrawn into Samnmum and there employed. The Embassadors of their allies and confederates were by M. Attulis the Praetor brought into the Senate, and had audience given them; where they complained, that their territories were over-run, burnt, and spoil'd by the Tufcans their next neighbours; and all becase they were unwilling to relit from the people of Rome: humbly beseeching the LL. of the Senate, to defend and protect them against the violence, wrong, and outrage of common enemies. Antver was returned unto the Embassadors: That the Senate would have regard that their allies should have no caes to repent of their faithfulness, and constant loyalty; and that men many days went over their heads, the Tuscan should taste of the same cup that the Samnites had begun unto them. Howbeit, they would have been slack and cold enough in dealing with the Tufcans, had not fresh news come, that the Fastesello, who had for many years continued in amity and friendship with the people of Rome, were combined with the Tuscan and entered into arms, as well they. The near neighbour-ship of this nation, gave an edge to the Senators, and what them on, to take care and ordain, that their Pecull Herals should be addrest thereto demand restitution and amends for harms done: which being denied, and no goods restored by the advice and authority of the Senate, together with the grant of the people, war was proclaimed against the Tufcans: and the Consuls were commanded to call lots, whether of them should pass out of Samnmum with his forces, into Tufcany.

By this time now Carullus had won Volatium, Palambinum, and Herculanenum, towms appertainning to the Samnites. Volatium was forced within few days: Palambinum, the same day that he came before the walls: but at Herculanenum, he fought two severall battels, with doubtfull and uncertain battle yet and with more loss of his own part than of the enemies. But afterwars, he pitched his camp before the town beleaguered the enemies, and kept them within their walls, gave the assault, and won it in the end. In their three towns there were either taken prisoners or slain in all, to the number of ten thousand: but so as through fear the greater part by far, suffered themselves to be captives, rather than to dye on the edge of the sword.

The Consuls call lots for their Provinces: and it fell unto Carullus to go into Tuscany, as the foildiers wifhed and desired who could no longer away with the rigour of cold weather in Samnmum. As for Papirius, he found a greater power of enemies, and more resistance, before Sepumnum. Many a time he was fought with all in battelle arranged: so skirmished with in his march: yet, and oftentimes under the very walls, the enemies flied out against him from the Town, in such force as he could not tell what to make of it; for neither was it to be called properly a flock alone, nor yet altogether a battelle fight; considering that the enemies were no more protected and covered themselves, by the strength of their walls, than the walls were defended by forces of arms, and men of war: howbeit in the end what with fighting and what with skirmishing, he lodged them within the City so as they durst come abroad no more, but kept themselves close: and were beleaguered indeed: and after long siege, as well with forcible assailants, as by trenches, bastils, and rampiers, he was master of the town: and therefore after he was possed of it, upon anger and choler
The tenth Book of T. Livius.

A cholera that they had so long stood out and put him to so much trouble, that there was more blood-thes; and seven thousand died by the sword, whereas under three thousand were taken prisoners. The spoil and pillage, which was exceeding great, considering that the Samnits had laid up all their gods and some few cities, was given to the soldiers. And now by the snow thick all upon the ground: neither could men endure abroad in the field without home and harbor: and thereupon the Conful restored his Army out of Samnium. Against his comming to Rome, it was decreed by the general voice of all men, that he should triumph: and he triumphed whiles he was in his Magistracy, with great magnificence, and amptuous pomp, as those dates would afford. For as well his footmen as horsemen marched by and by in a show, adorned with their gift and prizes of honour. Many a civick valiant and mortal garland was worn that day. Much looking and wondering there was at the spoliis also of the Samnits armour and apparel: for with their goodly beauty and glorious hue were they comparable to those that his father had won before him, which were commonly seen and well known in the public places of the City, adorned and beautified therewith. Moreover, there were led before him in this triumph and pompous entrance of his into the City, certain captives and prisoners of noble blood defended, men of great worth sometime, and name as well for their own deeds, as their fathers' acts. Great store of Brass Balion in Ingories, and not coined, was carried in new, amounting to the weight of 3000 pounds: which mass of brass or copper was sold of the ransom of prisoners. But this which was got in the faggage of the towns came to 3300 pounds weight and above. All the brass and silver was laid up in the common Treasury of the City, and nothing at all of the whole booty given to the foellidors: and the discontentment and heart-burning that grew thereby, was so much the greater in the common people, by reason they were charged besides with an excation and contribution for foellidors pay; whereas if the Conful had not upon a vain-glorious humour brought into the City Chamber, such sums which he had gained from the enemy there might aught thereof have been belowered freely amongst the foellidors, & of the impuflage their due wages paid and dispatched. Moreover, whiles he was Conful, he dedicated the Temple of Quirinus, which his father, being Dictator, had vowed: for, that himself owed it in the very time of the battle. I find not in any ancient writer; and certainly in so short a space, he could not possibly have built and finished it. He trimmed it besides, and garnished it with the spoils of the enemies, whereof there was in abundance and store, that not only the foent Temple and the market-place were therefor set out and bravely decked, but they were distributed abroad to their allies also and Colonies, near inhabitants, for the decoration and beautifying of their Churches and public places. After the triumph ended, he brought his Army to winter in the Territory of the Vettii, because those quarters were distrest and annoyed by the Samnits.

In this mean while, Carusillus the Conful, having at his first coming given the assault unto Trassium, a City in Tuscany, granted licence to 470 of the richest Citizens, to depart thence and by composition, to pay a great sum of money unto him. The rest of the multitude fell into his hands, after he had won the town by mere force. This done, he ordered five Colonells, to place in places of great strength: where were then of enemies 2400, and not all out 2600 taken prisoners. He granted to the F. Iesu (who lived for peace, and by) a trace for one year, and yet to make present payment of 100000 Asles and to discharge the foellidors wages for that year. After these exploits achieved, he departed to his triumph; which as it was lesse honourable and glorious than that of his companion in government, in regard of the service performed against the Samnits: so, if we consider withal, the Tuscian war it was equal and comparable unto every war. Of brass money he brought into the common Chett 50000 pounds; of the impuflage of the pillage and other spoils, he caused the Chappel of Fortunatus to be built, near unto the Temple of the same goddesses, dedicated by King Servius Tullius. To the foellidors that served on foot, he gave of his booty 150 Asles a piece, and twice as much to every Centurion and horsemann. Which reward they accepted more thankfully at his hands, by reason of the rigour and militie of his Colleague before him. And so gracious was this Conful, that he protected and faved L. Volumnius, one of his Lieutenant's, against the people: who being arrested and called to his answer by M. Carusillus, a Tribune of the Commons, fled for his life to his Lieutenantship (as they say) and avoided thereby the danger of his judgement; so that during his absence in that charge his acquittal might well be set on foot and followed, but brought to a final end and definitive sentence, it could not be.

After this year expired, the new Tribunes of the Commons entered their offices: and for that there was suppos'd some errour in their creation, the fifth day after were other chosen in their stead. The same year there was a Lustrum or solemn fancy of the City, held by P. Cornelius Arvicius, and C. Marius Rutius Centor. In which were numbered and attested 262222 polls of Roman Citizens. These were in order the fix and twenty Chentors from the beginning: and this was reckoned the fifteenth Lustrum after the first institution. In this year, and never before, the spectacles of the Roman Games and Places, in regard of their happy inlets in wars, upon the adorning with wreaths and garlands of flowers upon their heads: and then came up the Jaffon at Rome, borrowed from the manner and costume of Greece, to honour those with branches of the date tree, who won the prices, and were victors in those games.

The same year the Achiles Carusillus, who exhibited the said-palattines and exercises of activity, paved the causey or high-way with flint or pibble stone, from the Temple of Mars unto Boullis H and the fines of certain Publicans or farmers of the City, that were gravers and condemned, paid the charges. Then Poppadins held the great Assembly for election of new Conuls, and created Q. Fabius Gures the son of Maximus, and D. Junius Brutus Secund, Conuls. Poppadins himself was chosen Praetor. This year, so joyful and fortunate in many respects, could hardly countenance and recom pense with all other comforts, one only calamity, namely, a pestilence and mortality, which consumed and devoured both town and country. Infomuch as for the negligent and extremity thereof, it was held for a prodigious and portentous sign beyond all course of nature, and reach of reason. Whereupon, the books of Sibylla were perused, to know out of them, what issue and remedy the gods would vouchsafe to shew of this malady and misery. Wherein they found, I that the image of Asculapius must be lent for, from as far as Epidaurus to Rome. But for that by year, reason that the Conuls were buffeted in the wars, nothing was done, but only one day bestowed wholly in supplications and deviset Letanies to the honour of the said god Asculapius.

The Roman Embassadors being murder'd by the Senonoi in Gaul, and war thereupon denounced and proclaimed against them, Lucius Cæcilius the Praetor, fortified with his whole army to be defeated by them, and put to the sword. When the Roman fleet was spoiled and raufacked by the Tarentines, and their Admiral killed, the Senate dispatched their Embassadors unto them to make complaint of these wrongs and outrages; but they were civil treated and sent away with great abuse, whereupon defiance was [here] given unto them, and war proclaimed. The Summits revolted, Against whom together with the Lucians, Bruttians, and Tusculans, sundry battles were fortunately fought by divers Roman Captains. Pyrrhus the King of the Epirites [or the Albanians] passed over into Italy for to aide the Tarentines. When a Legion of the Campan was sent under the conduct of Decius Jubellius to Rhegium, there to be in garrison, they treacherously slew the natural inhabitants, and seized the City of Rhegium to their own behoof.

V Alcarius Levinus the Consul left the field against Pyrrhus: by occasion principally that his soldiers were terrrified and amazed at the unexpect'd sight of the Elephants. After that battle, when Pyrrhus viewed and beheld the dead bodies of the Romans, lying slain on the ground, he offered and bade, that all their faces were turned toward the enemy array. From hence he went forward spoiling and robbing all the way to Rome. C. Fabricius was sent unto him for to treat about the redemption and ransom of the prisoners; and was solicited by the King (but in vain) to abandon the service of his own country. The foresaid prisoners were enlarged and sent home without paying any ransom at all. Cynes was sent as Embassador from the King unto the Senat: who required, that the King his Master for to end and compound all quarrels, might be received into the City and amity of the people of Rome. But when it was thought best to debate and consult of this important matter, in a more frequent assembly of the Senators, Appius Claudius, who many a day had not intermeddled with the affairs of State and Council, presented himself in the Court among the Senators: where his opinion carried the matter clear away.

D It was proposed that No. Domitius, the first Consul of the Commoners, held a Livistram or survey of the City, in which were found 27,822 Roman Citizens by the poll. A second field was fought against Pyrrhus, but with doubtful event and issue. With the Carthaginians, the alliance was renewed from the fourth time. When a certain fugitive traitor that ran from Pyrrhus, offered to C. Fabricius the Consul for to passon the King, he was sent back again, and the treason was discovered to the King. Over and besides, this book containeth the prosperous affairs in war against the Tusculans, Lucaniats, Bruttians, and Samnites.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the fourteenth Book.

E Pyrrhus passed the seas into Sicily. When among other prodigies and terrible tokens the image of Jupiter in the Capitol was overthrown and quenched down with lightning, he thought therof was recovered and found again by the foot-soldiers. Carius Dentaltus, as he was taking waters, fell in port-side the goods of one that would not answer to his name when he was called. He perceived Pyrrhus after his return again out of Sicily into Italy: and forced him to avoid and depart once for all. Fabricius a Consul, caffed and displaced one of his Senators. C. Cornelius Rufinus, one that had been Consul, for that he had in silver plate the weight of ten pounds. There was a Livistram held by the Consuls, and there in were found 27,124 Citizens. A society and alliance was concluded with Ptolomy King of Egypt. Sextilia a professed virgin was consecrated of uncensured and fornication, and buried Quicke. Two new Colonies were created without, Poseidonia and Conia. A fleet of Carthaginians arrived to aid the Messenians by occasion whereof the league was broken. This book compriseth also the happy exploits against the Lucaniats, Samnites, and Bruttians together with the death of King Pyrrhus.

The Breviary of L. Florus to the fifteenth Book.

F The Tarantoins being vanquished both peace granted, and liberty also restored unto them. The soldiers of the Campan legion aforesaid which had possession of Rhegium, were besieged; and after they had absolutely yielded, were every one made slayer by the head. Certain left youths of Rome, who had missed and beaten the Embassadors of the Apollonians, sent unto the Senat, were delivered unto the hands to be included according to their discretion. The Picentes were overcome in battell, and obtained peace. Two Colonies were sent the one to Ariminum within the marches of Picenum (i.e. Ancona) the other to Beneventum. In Samnium, now and never before began the Romans to issue silver coin for their money. The Umbrians and Sabellians were vanquished, and their submissory of obedience received. The number of the Quinlbers was augmented to be eight.

Potheumius the Consul, because he was besides the Flamin into Mars; and would not suffer him to be Non-resident, and absent himself from his charge. After sundry battles and conflicts that many Roman Captains had against the Carthaginians, C. Lucarius the B. Consul obtained the honour of the small victory when he had defeated their Fleet; and so made an end of the first Punic war. The Carthaginians therefore sued for peace, and had it granted. At what time as the Temple of Veila was on a light fire, Cæcilius the High Priest recovered and saved out of the flame the holy reliques, Two Tribes were added to the rest: Velina and Quirina. The Palikis rebelled, &c. within six areas were submitted, and brought under subjection.

A. Colony was planted at Spoleton. An army was led against the Ligurians [i.e. Genovacis] which was the first time that they were surprised. The Sardians and the Corsicans, who revolted and C. took arms were subdued. Tuccia a Visual virgin and a Votary was condemned and executed for her in- cept or whoredom. War was proclaimed against the Illyrians, for that they killed of the Embassadors which were sent unto them: and being defeated, confessf themselves subjects to the Romans. The number of the Pretors was increased from two to four. The Gauls inhabiting beyond the Alps (toward France) who came down and entered into Italy, were overthrown and put to the sword. In which war the Romans had by report of the Latinus and other confederates and allies, the number of 500,000 fighting men that served under them. The Roman forces passed then first over the river Padus [i.e. Po], where the French Insulianis i.e. Lombards after certain disagreefures were glad to be ruled by reason, and rendered themselves. Mar. Claudius Marcellus the Consul, having Plain Virdurus the General of the Lombards with his own band, went away with the honour of the third rich and royal states got from the enemy. D. The Illyrians were subdued: so were the Illyrians also, after that they had revolted and put themselves in arms; and were fetached that they came under obedience. The Consors held a Luturna, and took account of the number of the Roman Citizens, and found in all 27,000, The Liberinti (or flames of fran- chised) were reduced into four tribes by themselves, twint, Equilina, Palatina, Suburra, and Collina: whereas beforetime they had been dispered indifferently, and mingled among the rest. C. Flaminius the Consor passed the high way called Flaminia, and built the great Circus or Theater named Flaminii Circus. And two Colonies were established within those Territories that were conquered from the Gauls to wit, *Placentia, and Cremona.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the one and twentieth Book.

In this book are rehearsed the acts which passed in Italy, as touching the second Punic war, and how Annibal, the Chief Commandor of the Carthaginians, contrary to the accord of alliance, passed over the river Iberus: by whom Saguntum, a City belonging to the allies of the people of Rome, was in the eighth month of the siege forced by assault. For to complain of these wrongs and injuries Embassadors were sent to the Carthaginians. And for that they would not make satisfaction and amend therefore, war was proclaimed against them. Annibal having passed over the mountains Pyrenæ, and discomfited the Volsceans who made head against him, and would have encompassed his passage, mounted the Alps, and after he had passed through them with great difficulty and pain, and was resisted also the French moun- tainers in furious skirmishes and butts, he defended into Italy: and near the river Ticinus, discomfited and disarmed the Romans in a battle of Country. In which conflict when P. Cornelius Scipio was wounded, his son (the same who afterwards was furnaced Africanus) rescnet bim, and proved his life. G. Annibal after he had defeated the Roman army a second time, near the river Trebia, passed over the Appenine: where his soldiers were mightily afflicted and distressed by reason of foul weather and violence of storms and tempests. Cn. Cornelius Scipio (as well in war against the Carthaginians within Spain, and took prisoner Mago, the General Commander of the enemy.

The one and twentieth book of T. Livius.

The fame may I well say, in the Preface and entrance of this one part of my work, which most writers of histories have promis'd and made promiss of, in the beginning of the whole, to wit, That I will write them most famous and memorable war that ever was, even that, which the Carthaginians under the conduct of Amnibal fought with the people & State of Rome. For neither any other Cities or Nations are known to have warr'd together more wealthy and puissant than they; nor at any time ever were they themselves so great, so strong in forces, and so mighty in means, as now they were. Moreover, they came not newly now, to wage war, without knowledge of the proves and martial skill, one of another; for trial they had made thereof sufficient already, in the first punic war. Besides, so variable was the fortune of the head, so doubtfully were their battles fought, that nearer loss and danger were they, who in the end won the better, and achieved the victory. And to conclude, if a man observe the whole course and proceeding of thefe their wars, their malice and hatred was greater in a manner than their forces: whereas the Romans took ftone from and did think that they, whose hope before was to be vanquished, should unprovok'd begin war fresh with the Conquerors; and the Carthaginians were as malecontent, and thoroughly offended, as taking themselves (not withstanding they were overcome) to be abused too much at their hands by their proud, insolent, and covetous rule over them. Over and besides all this, the report goeth, that Amnibal being but nine years old, or thereabout, came lawning and flattering as wanton children do to his father Amilcar, that he would take him with him into Spain; at what time, as after the African war ended, his father was offering sacrifice, ready to pass over thither with an army: where he was brought to the altar side, and induced to lay his hand thereupon, and to touch the sacrifice, and so to swear, that so soon as ever he were able, he would be a professed and mortal enemy to the people of Rome. Vex'd (no doubt) at the heart, was Amilcar himself, a man of high spirit and great courage, for the loss of the Islands Sicily and Sardinia: for not only Sicily was overvastly yielded (as he thought) as depairing too soon of the fate thereof; and doubting how it should be defended: but also Sardinia was by the cunning and fraudulent practice of the Romans surpriz'd out of the Carthaginians hands, while they were troubled with the commotion and rebellion of AFRICK; and a Tribute besides imposed upon them. He being disquieted, I lay, and troubled with the griefs and discontent, to bare himself for five years space in the Africa war, which infused immediately upon the peace concluded with the Romans; and likewise after, in Spain, for nine years together enlarging ever still the dominion of Carthage; so that all the world might see heintended and designed a greater war than that he had in hand; and if God had spared him longer life, it should have been well seen that the Carthaginians under the leading of Amilcar, would have made that war upon Italy, which afterward they waged by the conduct of Amnibal. But the death of Amilcar hapning in so good leafern (for the Romans) and the childhood and tender naionage of Amnibal together, were the cause that this war was put off and deferred. In the mean time, between the father and the son, Afnrubal, bare all the rule for the space almost of eight years. This Afnrubal had been Amilcar his minion, grown highly into his grace and favour, at the first (as men say) for the very prime and flower of his youth; but afterward, in regard of the singular forwardness of a brave and haughty mind, which soon appeared in him, and for his forwardness to action, he was preferred to be his son in law, and married his daughter. Now, if all this as he Amilcar his son in law, he was advanced to the sovereign conduct of the war, with nothing like all at and content of the Nobility and Peers, but by the means and favour only of the Barcin faction, which bare a great stroke, and might do all in all, among the fouldiers and the common people. Who managed all his affairs, more by policy and sanguine, than by force and violence; and using the authority and name of the Princes and great Lords of those countries, and by entertaining friendship with the chief Rulers, won the hearts of new nations till, and by that means enlarged the power and dignity of the Carthaginians in Spain, rather than by any war and force of arms. But for all this peace with foreign States, he was never the more fure of his own life at home. For a certain barbarous fellow, for anger that his Father and Lord was put to death, threw him in open place: and being laid hold on by them that were attendant about Afnrubal his person, he kept the same connece the longer till he had escaped and gone clear away: yea, and when he was by cruel torments all mangled and torn, he looked so cheerfully and pleasantly on the matter, as if he had seemed to smile; so far his joy of heart surpass'd the pains and anguish of his body. With this Afnrubal, for that he had so singular a gift and wonderful dexterity, in soliciting and annexing unto his dominion on the nations abroad, the people of Rome had renewed the League, upon the two capitulations and conditions first that the river _Iberes _should limit and determine the frontiers of them both: _Iberes _that the Saguntins, left in the midst between the territories of both nations, should remain free and enjoy their ancient liberties.

No doubt at all there was now, but when a new Commander should succeed in the room of Afnrubal, the favour of the people would go clear with the prerogative voice and choice of the fouldiers: who presently brought young Amnibal into the General his pavilion, and with exceeding
A ding great acclamation and accord of all, saluted him by the name of Captain General. For this you must understand, that Aframul by his letters mative had lent for him, being very young, and hardly fourteen years of age; yea, and the matter was debated first in the Coincil-liconic at Castiages, where they of the Barchins side laboured and followed the matter earnestly, that Athenial should be trained in warlike, and grew into his father in equal prowess & general. But Hannu the chiefe man of the contrarie faction: "It is but meet and reason (suppose he) that Aesaual doth demand: and yet for mine own part I think it not good, that his request should be granted. When they meant and marvelled much at this to dissent and speak of his, and will not what construction to make of it, Why then? quoth Hannu to be plain, that floor

B and beauty of youth, which Aesaulus himly yielded and parted withal sometimes into Antipatros father, for rule or abuse at his pleasure; the fame he thinketh by good right he may challenge and have again, from the son to make quitting, but it becometh us not for to accentuate our young youths with the Camp that under the colour, and instead of their military instruction and teaching, they abandon and give their bodies to serve the lust and appetite of the Generals. What? Is this the thing we fear, That the son of Antipatros should carry too long crease he be the excelle grandeur and overaptness of his father, and thefelie flew as it were of his royalty? Or doubt we, that we shall not soon enough serve in all manner allegience his name and talent unto whole son in law, all our Armies have been left; (as it were) in lawful right of inheritance? Nay, I am of opinion, and this is my judgment, That this youth be kept in peace at home unde the Salience of laws, under civil Magistrates, and learn a while to live in quiet condition with the rest of the Citizens and Subjects: for fear left at one time or other, this little spark do burn outright, and tuple a mighty flame. A few and those were in a manner, all of the belt fort and loundelt judgment, accorded with Hannu. But, as commonly it is seen, the greater number weighed the better.

Thus Aesaulus was sent into Spain, and immediately at his first coming, drew all the whole army after him: so highly he was regarded and beloved. The old soldiers believed verily that Antipatros was alive again, and came amongst them: they thought they beheld, and saw the same vigour and spirit in his countenance & vigour, the same quickness and liveliness in his eyes, the same proportion, feature and lineaments of his face. And afterwards, within short time, he had to wrong and wound himself into their favour, that the late remembrance of his father was the least matter of all others, that won him grace and love among them. Never was there one and the self-fame nature, framed and fitted better, for those two things that are in quality most contrary; namely, to rule, and to obey. Whereby, a man could hardly decide and judge, whether he were more dear into the General for the one, or to the Army for the other. For neither Aesaulus would make choice of any one before him, when there was some valiant service or brave exploit to be executed: nor the soldiers put more confidence in any other Leader, nor go more boldly and resolutely to any enterprise, than under him. Most forward he was and hardy to all hazards and dangerous adventures; right provident and wary again, at the very point of peril and jeopardy. Not wary to be able and tire his body: no pains-taking could daunt and brest; his heart. He could away with heat and cold alike. For his diet and feeding, he measured both his meat and drink by his natural appetite, and not by pleasure and delightful taste. For feeping, for waking, day and night was all one with him. When he had once perfonned his service, and finished his exploit; if there were any idle time after, therein would he take his rest and repose: and that should not be upon a soft bed neither, nor procured with great curiosity by still silence, and making no noise about him. Full often many a man hath seen him lying on the hard and bare ground, under a good soldiers jacket and homely caftock cast over him, even among the centinels and corps de guard. For his apparel, it was not more costly nor braver than his fellows and companions: mary, in his armour and horses he loved ever to be goodly be-seen above all other. Amongst toftmen and horsemen both, he would alwayes be a great way torm. And to conclude in giving a charge upon the enemy, and to begin to battell, he was by his good will never the first and when the fight was done, the last man seen to retire out of the field. Of these noble qualities and many virtues, he had not so many, but there were asgreat vices and imperfections in him again, to counterpoise the fame. Cruely moff savage and inhume fullhood and treachery more than. * Punick: no truth, no honestly, no fear of God no regard of oath no conscience, nor religion.

Dipoled thus as he was, and inclined by nature to vertues, and vice, he served full three years under General Aesaulus. During which time, he omitted and forgot no one thing that was meet either to be executed or enterprised by a man that was himselfe another day to be a Captain and chief Commander in the wars. From the very first day that he was chosen and declared Lord General; as it at the same instant, signify had been the Province alligned into him as it, if I say, he had received Commision to war with the Romans, he thought good to make no deiliies, for fear left haply whiles he lingered and slacked the time, some mishap may prevent his designes and cut him short, like as it had overtake his father first, and Aesaulus afterwards: but rather determined to make war upon the Saguntines by affailing whom, the Romans no doubt were touched, and would take arms and enter into the quarrell. But first he led his army into the marches of the: * Octades (a nation beyond Herpus, rather hiding and taking part with the Carthaginians, than under their jurisdiction) that he might not seem to have shot at the Saguntines and intended ought against them directly: but that by order and course of his affairs, after he had subdued the countries bordering upon them, he had been drawn (as it were) for vicinity and neighbourhood like to that war and to join them also with the rest unto the Empire. And first he was by force, and lack'd Corinna, a rich city, the seat town and chief place of all that nation. Whereupon other meaner and smaller Cities also, for fear came under his obedience, and yielded to pay tribute. His Army then after these victories, and enriched with spoil and pillage, was brought back to new Carthage, there to winter. Where he made fure unto him the hearts and affectionate love as well of his own countrymen as of the allies, partly by bestowing the pillage liberally among them, and partly, by making true payment of soldiery wages for the time past, and then in the very prime of the spring he went forward to war upon the "Vactus. He forsook by assault both Hamelund and Arb-vallicum, two Towns of the Carth. Arb-vallicum by the manhood and multitude of the Townmen held out a long time. But certain fugitives that were fled from Hamelund, having rallied them together and joined with other exiled subjects of the Oleodeus nation the summer before subdued, railed also the Carpenters to take arms; and let upon Anniulus, in his return from the Vactus; and not far from the river Tagus, troubled and disordered his march, heavily charged with spoil and booty. Annius forbade to fight, and encamped himself upon the bank of the river: and to soon as the enemies were in their first sleep, and all still and hushed, passed over with his Army to the ford: and after he had pitched his Camp far off from the river side, as that his enemies might have room enough to march away beside him, he determined to let upon them as they should pass over the river: To his horsemen he gave commandance to charge upon the Regiment of footmen, to soon as they perceived them to have taken the water: and upon the bank he arranged forty Elephants against them. There were of the Carpenters, counting the aids and succours of the Oleodes and Vactes, 10,000 strong: an Army invincible, if they had fought on even and indifferent ground. Who being both by nature fierce and courageous, and for multitude confident; prelumptuous besides upon their imagination that the enemy was retired for fear; imposed that the only lay of their victory was, because the river ran between: and letting up a shout and outcrie, without direction of any Leader, in all disorder they ran into the river here and there; every man what way was next him. Now from the other side of the bank, a great troop of horsemen were entered into the river, encountered them in the midst of the channel and fought with great advantage. For whereas the footmen unsteady and not able to keep fast footing and hardly trudging the ford, might easily be cast aside and overturned, even by naked horsemen if they did but put forth and prick forward their horses it skilfully not how the horsemen on the other side having their bodies at liberty. and able to wield their weapon, with their horses under them standing fure even in the midst of the stream and whirlpools, might with ease either right close hand to hand, or assaile the enemies aloof. Many of them besides perished in the water hence by the whirling waves of the river were driven upon the enemies, and by the Elephants trodden under foot, and crostled to death. The hindmost, who with more safety recover their own bank, after they were rallied together from one to divers places as fear had lattered them; before they could upon so great a bright take heart and come again to themselves, Annius who with a four-square battalion had entered the river, forced to flight from the bank: and when he had walled the country, within few days brought the Carpenters also under his obedience.

And now all beyond Iberia was subject to the Carthaginians, the Saguntins only excepted. With whom as yet he would not seem to war: howbeit, to minister some cause and occasion thereof, quarrels were picked, and seeds of dissensions sown between them and their neighbors, namely the Turdetans. Unto whose aid, when he was come, that was himself the lower of all the variance, and had let them together by the ears: and when it appeared plainly that it was not a matter of right to be tried by law, but an occasion rather fought of sight and open war; then the Saguntins sent their Embassadors to Rome, for to crave aid against that war, which doubled was at hand. The Consuls at that time of Rome: were P. Cornelius Scipio, and Titus Sempronius Longus, who having brought the Embassadors into the Council House, and proposed matters unto the L. I. there, concerning the weal publicke, anddesired to lend their Embassadors into Spain to take survey, and look into the state of their allies: who also if they thought it meet, should give Annius warning, not to meddle with their concerns, and molest the Saguntins: and withal, to fall over to Carthage into Africa, and there make relation of the complaints and grievances of the allies of the people of Rome: when I lay this Embassage was decreed, but yet not vent, news came sooner than all men looked for, that Saguntum was already besieged. Then was the matter proposed new again before the Senate, some were of mind to dispatch the Consuls into the Provinces of Spain and Africa, with commission to make war both by sea and land. Others thought better to bend all their forces wholly into Spain against Annius. There were a gain of opinion that great and weighty an enterprise was not hand over head, and rashly to be attempted: but rather that they should attend the return of the Embassadors out of Spain; and this advice that seemed most safe, was held for the better and took place. And therefore so much the sooner were their Embassadors P. Volcinius Flaccus, and Q. Quinctius Pacilus, addresed unto Annius before Saguntum, with direction, from thence to go forward to Carthage (in case he would not desist and give over war) and to demand the Captain himself, for amends and satisfaction of breaking the peace, but whiles the Romans were amended about these consultations and decrees, A decree, Saguntum was by this time with all forcible means assaulted. This City of all other mild wealthy and rich, stood beyond Iberus, situate almost a mile from the sea. The inhabitants are said to have had their beginning out of the Illyrians; and some among them, were descendent from Arderi, a City of the Rutulians; but they grew within short time to such prudence and wealth of theirs, partly by the fruits and revenues of their lands, and partly, by the traffick and gain of their merchandize, and commodities transported by sea, as also by the great influence and encrease of people, and lastly, by their strict rule of discipline, whereby they obtained their truth and loyalty with their allies, even to their own ruin and final destruction.

Annibal after he had invaded their confines as an enemy, and by way of hostility, with his Army overran and wafted their country besieged and assailed the City three times. There was one canto or angle of the wall shooting out into a more plain and open valley, than any other place all about: against which he meant to raise certain mantlets or fabrics, under which he might approach with the Ram to batter the wall. But as the place far from the wall, was even enough and handsome for such engines of battery to be driven upon; so after that they came to the proof and execution indeed the Successors answered nothing to the enterprise begun. For besides that there was a mighty tower over-looked, and commanded them the wall it fell (as in a place doubled and impaled) was more fortified and raised higher there than elsewhere: and also the chafed youth and able men were befowed to make more forcible resistence, where there was like to be most trouble and danger. And first with shot of darts and quarts, and such like they put the enemy back, and would not suffer the pioneers and labourers in any place to encroach on raile rampiers in lability. In proofs also they shot not from the wall only and that tower, but showed them selves in arms for defense, but also their hearts feared them to tally forth, and to break into the guards of the enemies yet, and to enter upon their tents, huts and fabrics. In which skirmishes there died not many more Saganians than Carthaginians. But so soon as Annibal himself, approaching unadvisedly under the wall, was to be wounded grievously in the forepart of his thigh, with a dart or light javelin, and therewith fell to the ground; they all about him fled so fast and were so scared, that they had like to have given over quite and abandoned their mantlets, and other fabrics store laid. After this for some few days, whilst their General was under cure of his hurt, they lay atigger, rather than followed the assailts. In which mean time, as they retired from skirmishes, they ceased not to invent new devices and to prepare new fabrics. Whereupon the assailts began again more hot than before: and in many parts at one and another fell to raise rolling mantlets, so many and so thick that some places would not receive them; and whilst to drive the Ram against the walls, Anibal had men good store, for it is thought he was 35000 in camp strong. The townsman with deviling means to defend and fee to every place, began to move their hands full; but all would not serve. For now were the walls between the rams and many parts thereof shattered and battered: and at one place above the breach, by continual battery, there was in a breach, as the town lay open and naked to the enemy. After that three months, and all the way between fell down with a mighty and notribly crash, in which the Carthaginians thought verily that with that rush the town had been won, by which breach as if the wall had protected both the parties before, they ran forth together one side to fight. The barreled was not by a tumultuous skirmish such as are wont to be about Atlantic of Cities by the occasion and advantage of the one part or the other; but a very great and ranged field (as it were) in an open ground between the breaches of the wall, and the honies of the town that stood a pretty way distant within. Of one side they were picket forward with hope on the other with despair; whilst Annibal thought verily that he was master of the town already. If he had on but a little longer; and the Saganians seeing their town bare, and void of walls, opposed their bodies in the breach, not being backed a foot, left in the space between he should set in the enemy. The more fiercely therefore, and the thicker and closer that they fought together on both parts, the more were wounded and there was not a dart could light in between between their bodies and their armour, but it did mischief.

The Saganians used a we-open called Falaces, in manner of a dart, which they let fly and lanced from them having long shaft or head, round and even every where toward the one end, where it was headed with iron and bound about with row, and smeared with pitch. The iron head was three foot long, that it might pierce every harness and body through. But the greatest fear that it did was this, although it stuck fast in the target, and entered into the body, that being driven and flung, when the middle part was set on fire, by the motion thereof as it flew; it gathered much more fire, forced the fonder to forfeit his armour, and expostled him disarmed and naked to the floor following. Well the fight continued doubtful a long time, by reason that the Saganians took better heart unto them, because they had relied beyond their hope and expectation; and the Carthaginians took themselves vanquished, for that they had not got the victory and better hand whereupon the townsmen all at once set up a cry and beat the enemies back to the very breaches, and rinses of the wall, and from hence thrust them out clean, whilst they were thus encumbered and affrighted; and at last discomfited them put them to flight, and chased them as far as their Camp.

In the mean while news came, that there were Embassadors arrived from Rome: unto whom Annibal dispatched certain messengers to meet with them at sea side, and to give them to understand, That neither they might safely with security of their persons come among the broilis of five my barbarous fierce nations; nor their Master Annibal amidst those dangerous and troublome beneath affairs, had any leisure to attend or give audience unto embassadors. He knew full well, H that the Embassadors being not received and entertained, would straight to Carthage. Whereupon, he addressed aforesaid his letters and couriers to the chief of the Barcine faction, to frame and prepare the minds of that side, so as they of the other part might not gratify or do any thing in favour of the Romans, by which means, besides that they were neither admitted by Annius, nor occasion given them, that embassage also was in vain, and took no effect at Carthage. Only Anno, notwithstanding the whole body of the Senate was against him, spake with great licence and affent of the hearers, by reason of his authority and reputation, and pleaded to the point of the breach of League, in this wise: 'I have, quoth he, foretold and warned you in the name and for the love of the gods, who are the witnesses and judges of covenants and confederacies, I have, I say, admonished you that ye should not send Amilcar his son, or any of his breed unto the Camp: for that neither the ghost and spirit, nor the progeny and race of that man can rest and be quiet; nor the Roman league will ever be assured and established, so long as there remained one alive of the Barcine name and family. But fent ye have, for all my words, unto your armies, a youth boiling in ambition, inflamed with a covetous desire of being a King, and one that seeth no other way thereto, but by raising one war after another, to live guarded with armies and legions about him. In which action of yours, ye have as it were ministered dry towel, and put oil to the fire: ye have, I say, fed that fire, whereof ye now all are blemishing. Your armies now bettie Saguntum, from which by covenant and virtue of the League they are debarred. Within a while and shortly will the Roman legions lie in siege before Carthage, under K the conduct and guidance, no doubt, of those gods, by whose support and aid in the former war, they were revenged for the breach of the accord and alliance. What? know ye not yet, either of your enemy, or your selves, or the fortune of both nations? This good Captain and gentle General, forth of your making, would not admit and receive into his Camp Embassadors coming from our allies, and in the behal of all of our allies: wherein he abolished the law of Nations, Howbeit, they having taken a repulse, from whence even the very Embassadors of enemies, are not wont to be repelled, are come unto you, and by virtue of their League demand and amends of trepas and restitution of satisfaction for their damages, And presuppose the State be not touched nor culpable in this Action they require no more but to have the author himself in peron, who is the offender. The more gently they deal, and the longer it is ere they begin, the more L obitutat they will be, and continue with greater rigour (I fear me) if they once begin. Set before your eyes the Islands * Egates, and * Eryx: and what for these four and twenty years past, ye have endured both by land and sea. Neither was this bearded boy our Captain then, but his father Amilcar himself, even a second Mars, as these his supporters would have him, but what of that? We could not then, according to our league, hold our hands, and let Tarentum in Italy alone; like as now we are doing with Saguntum. Therefore, both God and man took the matter in hand, and vanquished us in the end: and when we were at arguing and debating the case with difcoufe of words about this point, Whether Nation of the twain had broken the league? the event of war, as an indifferent as an equal judge, awarded victory where the right was, And Carthage it is, against which, Annibil even now hath reared mantles, towers, and other engines; M of assault: even now, battereth and shakeeth he Carthage walls with the Ram. The ruins of Sas- guntum (God grant it a false Prophete) will fall upon our heads: and the war begun with the Saguntins, we must maintain against the Romans. How then? (will some man say) shall we yield Annibil unto them? I know well how small my authority is in this point, by reason of the old grudge and enmity between me and his father deceased. Hewbeit, as I rejoiced, that Amilcar was dead, for that if he had lived still, we should now have waitted with the Romans: for this very yonth, an imp of his, I hate and detest as the very fury and fire-brand of this war: whom I would have by my good will, not only to be rendred unto them, for to purge and expiate the breach of league: but if no man would challenge him (or to be punished) I would award that he should be carried and transported as far as there is sea or land, and be sent away thither from N whence we might not once hear of him again and where he might never trouble the quiet and peaceable state of this City any more, Over and besides, my opinion and resolution is that some Embassadors be sent presently to Rome, to satisfy the Senate: and others also, with a message to Annibil that he withdraw his forces from Saguntum, and with commiotion to render up Annibil himself, into the Romans hands, according to the tenor of the League: and a third Embas- sage likewise to the Saguntins, for to make restitution and amends for their losses and loy- es, firmly and absolutely. When Anno had made an end of his speech, it was altogether needless, that any one man there should make reply, and debate the matter with him by way of Oration, the whole Senate was prostrated already and wrought for Anisbell; and with one voice they blamed Hanno, and founded it out. That he had made a bitter speech, and more favourable of an enemy, O than Plauus Velarius himself the Roman Embassador. After this, the Roman Embassadors had this answer returned. That the war began by the Saguntins, and not by Anissibell. Also, that the peo- ple of Rome offered them injury, in preferring the Saguntins before the most ancient alliance of the Carthaginians. While the Romans thus spent time to perfect Embasages, Anissibell having wearied his men, what with skirmishes, and what with trenching and raising mounts and fa- bricks, he gave them rest some few days and bestowed certain good guards to ward and keep the mandates and other engines of battle. In the mean season he encouraged his foildiers, and let their hearts on fire, pally, by pricking and provoking them to anger against their enemies, and partly, by drawing them on, and alluring them with hope of great rewards. But after he had one in a general assembly made proclamation, That the spoil and pilage should be the loudest there; they were all so inclined and enkindled, that presently he had founded the signal of battle; it seemed, that force in the World had been able to resist them, The Saguntins, as they had some relief from skirmishes, and continued certain days, neither affording nor assailing them to give them not over labouring night and day, for to make up a new wall and counter-mars, on that side of the Town which lay open by reason of breaches. But after this, they grew the afflent more hot and furious than before; neither with they well (the flames and alarms were to divers and different on every side) whether to come itself, or where was most need of help and in pain, Amalthe himself was present in person to on: courage and exhort his soldiers, where as the coming Tower was driven which was so high, that it overlooked all the mure and counter-Fabrics of the City, and being once approached near the walls, determined, as it was in every hot and fiery, with ordinance of quarrel, shot, brakes, and other artillery, beat the defendants off from the wall: As as home dally abide upon them, Then Amalthe taking the time, and supposing that he had now a good opportunity presented unto him, sent about 500 Africans that were pioneers with pick-axes, mattocks and hand hale tools, to undermine the wall, and to dig into it from the very foundation. And that was no hindrance matter to do, that for the cement of morter was not hardened and bound with lime, but tempered with cardand lay after the old manner of building: and therefore the wall came tumbling down before it was hewn and wrought into: and through the wide breaches, whose troops of armed loungers entered the Town and withal, they seized one high place above the rest. Whereon they planted their artillery and ordinance of flights and brakes, and call a wall about it, that they might have within the very City a fort and bastion of their own, like a Castle over look all. The Saguntins likewise raised another mure within along side where the Town as yet was not taken: So that on both sides they made fortifications, and also fought with all their might and main. But the Saguntins defending the inner parts, by little and little brought their Town daily into a smaller compass. And by that means, as also by reason of the long siege, as fast as went and want of all things grew more and more for the expectation of provisions and indocous was every day lefs than other: the Romains their only hope, being to far off and their enemies near, and was not to be resisted or overcome: and therefore the Saguntins and Carthaginians, refreshed for a while their troubled and afflicted spirits. These two Nations, being risen upon a discontentment of a like mutiny and rigourously lay of loungers, had flaunted and detained those Muter-matters, that had in commission to take up all sufficient able men for the wars, and to make some fear and fear of rebellion: but being prevented in the beginning by the speedy coming of Amalthe, were soon quiet, and laid down their arms. But the affairs of Saguntins continued nevertheless; For Maharbal, having his son whom Amalthe had left behind as Lieutenent, to belitter himself, that neither the Townsmen nor the enemies, nor the men or absence of the General. This Maharbal had made some fortune skirmishes, and with three runs taken a good part of the wall, so as he shewed to Amalthe at this return, alluring along. E every place full of fresh ruins. Whereupon the army was presently brought against the very Cattle of the City, where began a cruel and bloody conflict, with the slaughter of many on both sides, and one part of the said towers was forced and won. Afterwards was there some treaty of peace and agreement, by means of two persons, Alcon, a Saguntine, and Arcerus a Spaniard, and some small hope there was of it, Alcon supposing he could somewhat prevail by way of request and esteeming, without knowledge of the Saguntins, instead away by night to Amalthe. But after that he saw, that with all his weeping he could do no good, but that heavy and intolerable articles and capitulations of peace were exhibited, as from a wrathful conqueror, of an Orator, proved to be a very tyrant, and remained in the camp with the enemies, saying, that he was sure to die, whoever should move the Saguntins to peace, and under those conditions. For demanded it was of the Saguntins, Impriunene to make restitution to the Trudcians of all harness and lofes, Item, to deliver up all their good and silver. Item, to quit the Town, and depart but with one tunic of apparel a piece; and thence to dwell where the Carthaginians would appoint. When Arcerus answered plainly that the Saguntins would never accept of peace with these conditions, Arcerus replied again and said, That being all things else now failed them, their hearts also must needs come down, and fall like wheat; and therewith promised to deliver unto them the tenor of the said peace, and to be a mediator and deser in the composing thereof. At that time he served, Maharbal as a private soldier; however he publish a friend he was, and an hoit and guilt of old to the Saguntins. Who having in flight of men yielded up his offensive arms, to the wonders of the enemies, and passed the ramparts, was the night (for to himself) before the Governor and Prefett of Saguntins. Thither came running presently, a number of all sorts of people: but after the rest of the multitude were commanded to void Arcerus was called into their Counsell house, and having audience given, in which the he peeped unto them. If Alcon your countryman and fellow citizen, who came from you to Amalthe or to treat about peace, had likewise brought back again unto you from Amalthe the conditions and articles of peace, I needed not to have taken this journey, who am come unto you neither as an Orator from Arcerus, nor yet as a fugitive. But seeing he, hath remained with the enemy, either through your default or his own. I know not whether, if he pretended and chartered thor himself to blame; but if they stand in danger that report a truth unto you, then are ye in a great fault. I therefore, to the end ye should not be ignorant, but that there are conditions offered to you of life, of safety, and of peace; in regard of old amity and acquaintance, in regard of my (I say) of mutual entertainment long time between us, am now come unto you. And that ye may believe, that whatsoever you shall hear delivered from me, I speak it for your good, and for the favour of no man else; this one thing, if no more, may allure you, that neither so long as ye were able to make resistance by your own strength, nor all the while that ye hoped for aid from the Romans, I never made word or mention of peace unto you. But seeing now, that ye have not any hope at all from the Romans, and that your own forces and City walls, are able no longer to defend you: I present unto you a peace, more necessary, I confess, than equal and rea ible, Whereof you may have some hope, in these terms; namely, if Annibal offereth and pretendeth it like a conqueror, so you will hear of it, and accept thereof as conquered: if I say, ye will not make reckning of that which you forsook as a loss and damage (seeing by extremity all is the victors) but that which is left, against and advantage yea and freely given unto you. Your Town, whereof a great part is ruined by him, and which he hath taken in manner all, that he mindeth to put you by; your Lands and possessions he leaveth unto you, purposing to set you out a plot of ground, whereupon you may build your selves a new City. Your gold and silver all, as well common treasure as private monies and plate, he commandeth to be brought unto him: the bodies of your wives and children he is content to spare and save undefiled: upon this condition that you will depart without armor, and with a double suit of apparel a peace, and no K. more. These are the impositions that your enemy (a conqueror) demandeth: Which albeit they be hard and grievous, yet your fortune and state is such, as you must allow thereof and be content. For mine own part, I am not out of hope, but when you have put all into his hands, he will deal better by you, and remit somewhat of these conditions. But I think ye were better to abide all this, rather than your bodies to be murthered, your wives and children to be ravished, and haled and forced before your faces, as the law and manner of war require.

To the hearing of this Oration the people had flocked about, and by little and little enter-mingled their own assemblies with the Senators: and all of a sudden the chief of them withdrew themselves and departed before answer was given: and brought all their silver and gold, as well publick as private, into the market place: and when they had cast it into a great fire made hastily for that purpose, most of them threw themselves into it headlong after. Whereupon there being a fear and trouble already throughout the whole City: behold another outcry besides and noise was heard from the Castle. For a certain Tower that had been a long time battered and shaken, fell down; and at the breach thereof, a band of Carthaginians made entry, and gave sign to their Generals that the City was abandoned of the ordinary Watchmen and corps de garde of the enemies, and altogether lay open and naked. Annibal supposing it was no wisdome to neglect and slack so good an opportunity, with all his forces at once assailed the City, and was it in the turning of an hand: and presently gave order that all above fourteen years of age should be put to the sword. A cruel commandment. no doubt, but yet needful, as afterwards it was well seen in the end and upshot of all. For who would have spared and taken pity on those, that either flut themselves with their wives and children into their houses, and burnt them over their own heads, or in their armor, gave not over fight before they died? This was the Town won with exceeding store of pillage within it. And although much was spoiled on purpose by the owners, and that in the massacre and execution they had no respect of age in the lury of their anger: and for all that, the pilferers fell to the foul discourse: yet certain it is, that of the goods so lost in port-sale, there arate a good round piece of mony: and much rich household stuff and costly apparel was sent to Carthage.

Some there be that write, how Saggantium was won the Eighth Month after the siege began: and that from thence Annibal departed to winter in new Carthage: as also, that the fifth month after he departed from Carthage, he arrived in Italy. Which being so, it cannot be, that P. Cornelius N. and T. Sempronius should be the Consuls, unto whom both in beginning of the siege, the Sagonin Embassadors were sent: and who also in their year of government fought with Annibal, the one near the river * Ticinum, and both together a good while after." Trebus. And we must say, that either all these things were achieved in shorter time a good deal, or else that Saggantium in the beginning of that year, wherein P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls, began not to be besieged; but finally was forced and won. For the battle at Trebus could not be so long after, as to fall in the year wherein Cn. Servilius and C. Flaminius were Consuls. For that Flaminius entered his Consulship at Ariminum, and was created by T. Sempronius, Consul, who after the battle of Trebus came to Rome to elect Consuls, and after the Election was ended, returned again to his army, into the wintering harbours.

About the same time, as well the Embassadors which returned from Carthage, brought word to Rome that there was nothing but war: as also tidings came, of the destruction of Saggantium. And so greatly grieved and terrified the Senators, and pitted withal their allies thus unworthily massacred: so ashamed in themselves they were, that they had not senced in time, so deeply offended and incensed with indignation against the Carthaginians, yea, and so mightily feared the loffe of the very main chance at home, as if the enemy had been already at the gates of the City: that in very deed, having their minds possettled at one time, with so many troubles, they rather trem-
A trembled and quaked for fear, than felted themselves to consultation and counsel. For they considered and saw very well, that neither a more fierce and warlike enemy ever encountered with them: nor the State of Rome was at any time so retly, so feeble, and so undeploped to war. Moreover, it was commonly said, that the "Sarbit, Conia, Hifdri, and Sibricus" had rather chafed the Romans, and made braves of war, than exercised and coiled them in any hard conflicts: as for the Gauls, they were but tumults, rumors, and alarms which they made, and no wars indeed: but the Carthaginians their enemies, they were old beaten enemies, intire and hardened for this 23 years in most difficult service of war, amongst the Spanish Nations, and went away ever with victory: first trained and practiced under Anakles, then under Afribals, and now lately under the conduct of Ancabol, a right hardy and valiant Captain. Considering moreover, that now he cometh fresh from the ruin of Saguntium, a most rich City, and pusheth straight-ways over Italy: drawing after him a train of to many nations of the Spaniards, exereted already by him in the wars: and will not doubt raile the Galts, a people at all times ready to take arms: so as now they were to wage war in Italy, with no more but all the World besides, yea, and under the walls of Rome, for the defence of the City.

Now had the Provinces been nominated and appointed before to the Consul: but then were they commanded by casting lots, to part them between them. To Cornelius fell Sicily: To Sempronius Atcrick and Sicels. Likewise decreed it was, that for that year, there should be levied six Legions of Romans: and of allies, as many as they thought good: also that as great army as might be, should be rigged and set out. So there were enrolled 34000 Roman footmen, and of horsemen 1500: of allies 44000 foot, and 4000 horse, 220 galleys with five couple of oars on a side, and twenty foits, were set atle. After this, a bill was preferred unto the people, that it might please them to determine and grant, that war should be proclaimed against the people of Carthage. And in regard of that war, there was also a solemn supplication Holden through the City: wherein the people adored and prayed the Gods to prosper and bring to an happy end, this war which the people of Rome had determined. And betwixt the Consuls thus were the forsettined: Sempronius had the conduct of two Legions, consisting of four thousand foot, and three hundred horse a piece: also of allies sixteen thousand foot, one thousand and eight hundred Horse, besides 160 galleys, and twelve banks or foits. With this power for Land and Sea service, D was Sempronius sent into Sicily, from thence to pass over into Atcrick, in case the other Consul would be able to impeach the Carthaginians for coming into Italy, Cornelius had the charge of a smaller power: for that L. Maullus the Pretor, was sent in pursuance to France with a sufficient army: but in number of ships especially, was Cornelius scanted 60 galleys of five banks of oars he had, and more, (for it was supposet that the enemy would neither come by Sea, nor fight in that kind of service) and two Roman Legions with the full proportion of Horsemen, and 14000 footmen of allies, with 2400 men of arms. That Province of France (in those parts where the Carthagian was expected) had that year two Legions of Roman footmen, 14000 ailes, besides 1000 Horse from them, and 6000 of the Romans. When all things were thus prepared, to the end that before war began, it might appear they dealt by order of law, and with justice: and that all due complements might be performed, they sent certain grave and ancient personages in Embassage into Atcrick; to wit, Q. Fabius, M. Livius, L. Aemilius, C. Licinius, and Q. Scipio, Firsts, to demand and know of the Carthaginians, Whether Ancabol by their publick warrant and authority, besieged and afflicted Saguntium? then if they vowed the act, and blood to it (as they were like to do) conffenting that it was done by the counsel of the State: to give defiance, and pro hain open war against them. The Romans being arrived at Carthage, had audience given in their Senate-house: where, after Q. Fabius had briefly demanded nothing else, but that one thing which he had in charge and commission, then a principal Senator among the Carthaginians stood up and said:

"Your former Embassage, my masters of Rome, was even as vain as this, when ye required and wished that, for this that you come with now, bowsoever in words it seem more mild and smooth, in very deed and in truth it is more rude and rigorous: for then, was Ancabol only charged and demanded to justice: but now are we both urg'd to acknowledge a fault, and also forced to make restitution and satisfaction of hand: as if we had avowed and confess'd the action. For mine own part, of this mind am I, that the case ought thus to be laid, and the question brought to this issue, whether Saguntum was besieged by a private person, or publick Council but whether by right, or wrongfully. For to enquire and examine whether our citizen and subject have done this by our advice, or of himself, pertained to us alone, as also to confine and punish him accordingly: with you we are to debate this point only, Whether it might land G with the league to do it, or no? And therefore since it pleareth you, that we should dispute and distinguish, between the action of a General, warranted by the publick State, and an enterprise proceeding from his own motive; ye shall understand that there was indeed a league between you and us, contracted by Lutatius the Consul. wherein there is a clause, comprising the allies of both parties: as concerning the Saguntines (who as then were none of your confederates) there was not one word at all therein: but in that league (ye will say) that was contracted with Ancabol, the Saguntins are expressly named and excepted: to which I have nothing to plead, but even that which I have learned of you. For ye your selves denied, that ye were bound to land..."

The answer of one of the principal Volscians in Spain, to the Roman Embassadors.

"to that accord which C. Laelius made with us, because it passed neither by a confident and strong mutual consent of the people. Whereupon, there was another league anew drawn out, and by publick agreement enacted. If you then, be not tied to observe your leagues, unless they be assent and ratified by the nobles, or ratified by the people, no more can the league of Afr. vel oblige us, which he concluded without our privity and knowledge, Forbear therefore fore to speak either of Saguntins, or libertas; and what your mind hath so long conceived, let it hatch now at length, and bring it forth. Then Q. Fabius the Roman Embassador, having made a hollow lap within the plain and fold of his side gown. Here quoth he, within this happer, we present and offer war and peace unto you, take whether ye will. At which word, they all cry out at once with as great flamock and boldness: Mary even which you will your will. Whereat he let his robe loose again; 'Why then, there is war, quoth he, take it amongst you, Let come lay they all again, and welcome be it; and as willingly as we accept thereof, so will we follow and manage it as thoroughly.

This direct demand, and sound denouncing of war, seemed more for the honor of the Romans, than to make much dispute and argument about the right of the cause, and of the covenant; a vain matter before, but now especially after the winning and destruction of Saguntum.

For if the question were to be decided by words and reasoning, that league of Afridius which was exchanged for the former of Laelius, was not the same nor the tenor thereof to be compared: seeing that in the accord of Laelius, this plain and proviso was expressly added, [That it should stand good, and be ratified, if the people approved thereof:] but in this of Afridius there was no such condition at all: and besides, the covenant for so many years space during his life, was so established and confirmed, and no word to the contrary; that when the very maker and author thereof was dead, there was no change and alteration. And yet, put case they should have stood upon the former alliance; the Saguntins were therein well enough comprised and provided for in that the allies of either part were excepted and comprehended. For neither was this clause added [They who at that time were allies] nor yet were they excepted against, who afterwards should become, or be admitted allies. And leaving that it was lawful to entertain new confederates, who is it that would judge it reasonable, either that no man should be received into emity for any good desert whatsoever, or for being once received into protection, should not be defended accordingly: Provided always, that no allies of the Carthaginians should either be folcil to rebellion, or received again. If it themselves as they once revolted.

The Roman Embassadors therefore, as they were commanded at Rome, paffed the last from Cartagin into Spain, for to visit all the Cities, and to see whether they could either draw them to their society, or withdraw them from the Carthaginians. And fulf they came to the Saguntins, where being courteously entertained (for every they were of the Carthaginian government) they stirred up youth other nations beyond ibi, to have a desire to change for a new world. From thence they came to the Volsciens, whose not the answer reported throughout all Spain turned away all other States from binding with the Romans for this, in solemn assembly a sage and ancient father among them framed his answer. With what face can ye Romans require us to preserve your friends-ship and liberty before the Carthaginians seeing that the Saguntins who did the fame have been more cruelly by you their allies betrayed than by their enemies the Carthaginians destroyed?

By my advice go and seek you content, there: whilst the auxilium and liberty of Saguntum is not forgotten.

The lamentable ruins of which City, as it is a doleful example to it shall be a notable warning to all nations of Spain, lest to man ever after repose trust in the protection and society of the Romans. Whereupon, they were commanded to depart the borders of the Volscians immediately, and in no Diet or Council of Spain, had they afterwards any better entertainment, and more courteous language. Thus having in vain gone through all Spain, they took their way into Gaul: where they saw a strange light and a miraculous sight: for all in Antonian (thir the gate and manner of the country) they came to their publick assemblies and thence, these Embassadors after they had for some good while heard the greatness and glory of the people of Rome, and highly magnified their large empire and dominion, and thence made all sues, that they would give the Carthaginians leave (who minded to make war upon Italy) to pass through their Cities and Towns, whereas they set up such a langour, with a certain grumbling and muttering, that scarcely on't the youth were filled and emptied with the Magistrates and Eiders: so fo-lid, so foolish and shameless it moved this demand, in their conceit that they should once imagine that the Gauls were in. After, as they would be content (rather than to let the war paffe into Italy) to ever take upon themselves, and to suffer, and offer their own territories be spoiled and forg'd, for that safety (forsooth) of other men's Lands, who were but mere slaves and strangers unto them. The noise and tumult being at length hushed and appeased, this answer was return'd to the Embassadors: That neither the Romans had deferved so well, nor the Carthaginians so ill, at their hands, that they should take them either for Romans, or again

Carthaginians; But contrary-wise, they were advis'd that some of their nation, whereby the people of Rome driven out of the marches and confines of Italy, put to pay tribute, yea, and induced other outrage and indignities. The like demands and so were paffed to and fro in other

Councils and Assemblies of Gaul: neither could they meet with any friendly entertainment, or have peaceable words given them, before they came to M. Metellus, where after diligent inquiry, and faithful search made by their allies, they had two advertisements that Amabil store."

The one and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

A. beforehand had wrought the hearts of the Gauls to his own purpose, and was possett of them: but they understood withal, that they were not like to continue long in good terms of kindness and favor even to him, (so fierce and savage, so untractable are they, and untamed by nature) unless their Princes and Rulers be ever and anon well fed and plied with gold, whereof that nation of all other is most greedy and covetous. The Roman Embassadors, having thus gone their circuit over all the States of Spain and Gaul, returned to Rome: not long after that the Caff, had taken their journey into their Provinces: where they found the whole City possett with the expectation of war: so rife and currant was the rumor and bruit abroad, that the Carthaginians were already paffed over the River Iberus.

B. Annibal, after the winning of Saguntum, had retir'd himself to winter in new Carthage: and there having intelligence what had been done and decreed as well at Rome, as at Cartagin [in Africa], and that he was reput'd not only the Captain General and Conductor, but also the very author and cause of all this war: so soon as he had divid'd and sold the rest of the booty and pil-lage that remained, thought good now to make no longer delays, but assembli'd the foudlers of the Spanish Nation, and to them he spake in this manner. "My trusty friends and loyal compadres, I am persuad'd that ye your selves doe see as well as I now, that all the States of Spain are in such peace and quietnes, that either ye can make an end of foudlery, and all our forces to be cattled and charg'd from service; of else I must remove the war into other Lands. For to shall these Nations proper and flourith, and not only enjoy the benefits of peace, but also reap the fruits of war, if we will seek to gain riches, and to acquire glory and honor from others. Since therefore we are not to war shortly far from home, and doubt it is, when you shall once again your houses, and whatsoever thereis deer unto you, if any of you be desirous to visit home, his wife and children, kinsfolk, and friends, I give him license and free pauper, But I command you withall, to shew your selves here again before me, in the beginning of the next spring; that with the help of God, we may in hand with that war, whereby I shall put forth both worship and wealth. There was not one in manner but well accepted of this liberty so freely offer'd by himself, and were desirous to have a light of home and land both for that every one already long'd for their friends and kindred, and forelaid in further time to come, a greater mist, and care of more lingering after them. This rest all Winter time, between their travels paff, and those they

D were soon after to endure, refreshed well as their bodies as their minds, and prepared them to abide and endure all new palls whatsoever. So in the very prime of the spring, according to the Edict aforesaid, they all assembl'd together again, Annibal having taken a matter and survey of the aids that were sent unto him from all thole Nations went to God's: and there to Hercules he paid his oaths, and bound himself to new, if the rest of the emperors should speed well and have good issues. After this, dividing and cattling care indifferently, as well for offensive as defensive war being doubtfull while he went by Land through Spain, and France into Italy. Africa should lie open and nailed to the Romans from sicily side: purposed to fortifie and make that part free with strong garrisons. In lieu whereof, he sent for fresh supply out of Africa, specially of Archers and Javelotiers, and thole lightly armed: to the end, that the Africans might serve in Spain, and the Spaniards in Africa; like (both the one and the other) to prove the better fouldiers, far from their own countries, and being bound as it were, with mutual and reciprocal pledges. So he sent into Africa, 1580 footmen, armed with light targets, and 870 forders of the islandes Bacot aera, 1500 Horlemen also out of sundry Nations. Which forces he disposed, partly for the defence of Carthage, and partly to be divid'd and asseg'd, for the guard thereof. He sent withal, certain Commisioners into all their Cities to take up fouldiers, and enrolled 4000 of their choisen youths, who should be brought to Carthage, there to lie in garrison, and to serve for hostages. And supposing that Spain was not to be neglected, and the rather, because he was not ignorant how the Roman Embassadors had visit't the same round to see how they could solicite and work the Princes and rulers to their mind, he committed the charge of this Province to his brother Absalon, a valiant and hardy man: and furnish'd him with good forces, especially out of Africa, to wit, 1180 African footmen, 200 Ligurians, 500 Balear Islanders, To this power of footmen, three hundred Horle of the * Libyphicians, a Nation mixit of Carthaginians and Africans. Of * Numidians and Mores, that cost upon the Ocean, 1900, with a small corner of 200 Horlemen of Jlgerites out of Spain. And because he should want no manner of Land help, fourteen Elephants besides. Moreover, there was a fleet allow'd him for the defence of the Seas. For by what forces and service the Romans had before got victory, thereby it was likely, that they would still maintain and continue their wars, Gallies therefore of five banks of oars, he had at Sea, two of four, and five of three. But of the five oared gallies aforesaid, he had no more but two and thirty, fitted and well appointed with rowers and martiners, and so were the

E five of three banks.

From Godes, the army of Annibal returned to winter in Carthage: and from thence he paffed by the City * Econdins, and Marched forward with his forces to Iberus and the Sea-coasts, Where it is reported, that in his sleep he dreamt, and saw a vision namely, a young-man of divine shape and resemblance, saying, That he was sent from Jupiter to guide him in his voyage into Italy, and will'd him therefore to follow him, and in no wise to turn his eyes from him one way or other. Also, that at the first he being scared and affrighted durst not look either about or behind, but followed him still: afterwards (as men by nature are curious) when he call'd and discours'd in his mind, what it might be; that he was so hidden to be seen behind him; he could not hold and rule his eyes, but must needs look back; and then he beheld behind him, a ten thousand huge greatness coming apace, and all the way as it went, to bear down trees, groves, and thickets; and after that, he perceived a great storm and tempest ensuing, with mighty thunder-claps. Now when he was devious to know what this great coniption and strange light might signify, he heard a voice, saying, That it betokened the ruins and sitting of Italy: willing him therefore, to go to forward with his voyage, and search no further into the secrets of the Gods, but leave them to the hidden delinies. Annibal right joyous at this vision, passed over Ilerus with his whole power divided into three parts; having sent certain before him with gifts and rewards into all parts where he should march with his army, to gain the hearts of the Gauls; and withal, to seek out and discover the passages of the Alpes. So he crossed the River Ilerus with 50000 foot, and 3000 Horses, strong. After this, he subdued the Ilergetes, the "Bargufins," Aulicians, and Aquitains, which lyeth under the hills Pyrenei. The government of all these nations he left over to Hasus that he might have it at his command the skirmishes which ensued France and Spain together. Unto whom he allowed 10000 foot and 1000 horses, for to defend and keep in obedience those countries. After that his army was on foot and began to march through the forest Pyreneus, and that there ran amongst the barbarous people a more certain bruith. That they were to make war with the Romans; three thousand foot of the Carpentians, returned back; and for certain it was known that they departed not, for fear so much of the war; the tedious journey and unpassable ways of the Alpes. Annibal, considering that either to receive them or to keep them by violence, was a dangerous matter; for fear lest thereby he should provoke the first inhabitants of the real; sent home again above 70000 foot, as he perceived to be weary, and to have no mind to the service; and made remembrance, that the Carpentines were by his leave discharged. And doubting left long and safe there, might tempt their commanders and give occasion of mutinies, with the rest of his forces he passed Pyreneus, and pitched his camp before the Town *Illiberis, The Gauls, albeit they were advertised, that it was Ilerus at which Annibal stood; yet became the bruith was blazed. That the Spaniards beyond Ilerus were for being subdued, and strong garrisons placed in their cities; certain Nations of them, for fear of sedition and bondage, rose up in arms, and assembled together at Rhaso. Which being joined to Annibal, he fearing more that they would play him in his journey, than endanger him in fight; sent certain L. Orators or Embassadors to their Princes and great Lords, to signify unto them, "That himself in person would gladly pari with them, and that it should be in their choice whether they would come nearer to Ilerus, or himself go forward to Rhaso; where, being nearer together, they might more easily meet and come. For as he was willing to receive them into his camp, and would be glad to see them there: so he would not think much of his pains, to repair unto them himself, as one that was thither come, as a friend and guest unto France, and not as an enemy; and would not by his good will draw a sword (if the Gauls would let him alone) before he were entered within Italy. And thus much very piously by messengers and couriers between. So forth as the Lords of France, who presently removed their camp to Illiciberis, were come willingly enough to Annibal, as being bribed and corrupted with money and presents, they gave his army good leave to pass through their confines along the town Rhaso.

In I. if this while, the Embassadors of Marseilles had brought no other word to Rome, but that Annibal was only gone over Ilerus: but, by that time, the Boii had stirred up the Inbrians to mutiny, and were resolved themselves even as if he had passed the Alpes already: which they did not so much upon old ran our and malice to the people of Rome. As for that, they took it ill and were discontented, that there were Colonies brought lately into the Gauls country, to be placed about "Paestum, Ilerus, and Creonna. Whereupon they rose suddenly, took arms, and entered by force into those parts, and made so foul work and fearful havoc, that not only the country people and villagers, but a lot the three Roman Commissioners called Triumvirs, to wit, Caius N. Licinius A. Servilius and Titus Animus, who were come to let the lands and territory to the said Colonies, not troubling the walls of Placentia, fled to Mutina. That Licinius was one of them, it is not doubted; but some records have Q. Aulus and C. Herennius, instead of A. Servilius and T. Animus; and others again, nominate P. Cornelius Asinius, and C. Poppinius Mapo. It is an uncertain all, whether they were the Embassadors sent to the Boii, to reason or expostulate the matter, that had abusè offended them, and were evil intreated; or that the Triumvirs above said were set upon and affrighted as they were measuring out the lands. But whilsts they were thus befieged at Mutina, and their Boii lying at siege (a nation unskillful altogether in the feat of assailing Towns, and likewise of all other most cowardly, to attempt any martial exploits) whilsts they lay idle about the walls, and never once advanced against them, they began to make shew of a treaty for peace. Whereupon the Roman Embassadors or Commissioners, being by the chief of the Gauls called out to parle, were not only against law of nations, but with breach also of their faithful promise, and word which they had given that time, apprehended: and the Gauls said plainly, they would not let them go, unless their hostages were delivered them again. These news touching the Embassadors being reported to Mutina with the garrisons in danger: L. Marcius the Preator, in great anger and indignation, brought his army in more haste than good order, before Mutina, There were in those days great woods about the high way, and most part of the country wilds A wilds and woods, not inhabited: where he having engaged himself without his epials, was interpended within an ambush; loth many of his men, and hardly recovered the open campanian country.
There he encamped himself strongly: and for that the Gauls had no heart to assault, nor hope to the camp, his foildiers courages were restrained: albeit it was well known that they had received a firewodofail, and knew there forces to be much impaire: Then began he to match on, in his journey atrefh. And so long as he held his power through the open country the enemies were not inight: but when they were entre the forrests again, they let upon the rereward of them: where, besides the great fright and danger of all the rest, So Roman foildiers were left dead in the place, and the enemies went away with amends. But afterwards, the Gauls ceased to molest B and trouble, and the Romans gave over to fear, so soon as they were palled, and escaped the rough, cumbrous, and unpalable forrests. And the Romans being not able in the open and damp country to match with saile, made half to get to * Tamant a village near unto the Po.
There within a fort which they made with the same, and the provision of victuals by the river, and the aid alof certain Gauls called * Brixians: they defended themselves against the en-mies, whose numbers daily were reealed. After this sudden enmity was reported at Rome, and that the LL. of the Sevnt were advetarded. that besides the war with the Cagalthians the Gauls were up in arms: they gave order, that C. Attilius the Pretor should go (with one Roman L.igion, and four thousand auxiliaries, who were enrolled by the Consuls in a new ley) to aid Molonius: who without any skirmish (by reason that the enemies were fled for fear) came to Tarasus. Also P.
C Corellus having newly leaved one Legion in lieu of that which was lent with the Pretor, departed from the Camp of Rome, and palling with 60 Gauls along the coasts of Tuscan, Liguria, and to forward of S. frey, shortly arriued at * Augilla, and enamped next the mouth of * Rhinedt ur (for the river is divided into many brances, and so dischargeth it self into the Sea) being not fully of belie that Anibal as yet had palled over the mountains Pyrene. But when he understood that he was ready even then to palls Rhodium and doubting in what place to encounter and meet him. his people as yet not received, after their being sea-lie: he lent before, 300 several men of arms: guided by the Mafliffans, and certain Gauls that came to aid: fer to dis-ver all, and take a full view of the enemies failely without danger.
Anibals, his intention was to force the country, either for fear or by means of mony, was now D come into the country of the * Volscians, a plurifie people and a valiant. Theie inhabit along both the banks of * Rhodanum: and mistrusting that they were not able to defend their Lands against the Cagalthians: on that side of the River which lay to them: because they might have the whole River to serve them for a good defence and rampart, transported over the Rhõne in all manner of that event they had and kept the bank on the other side. The ret of the inhabitants ner to the River, and in those alo in several territories Anibal had let foot already, both he himself with gifts allured to get together from all parts shipping, and to frame new veffels: and they or themselves likewise were as willing to have his army transported and their own country ealed and delivered (they cared not how soon) of so great a multitude of troublesome goell. Whereupon, there was got together an hage number of lighter, barges, and boats especially, which E were made in hait without gread workmanship; in which the people inhabiting thereby used to transport wares and commodities from one to another. Other new wherries alo, the Gauls egun hit to make of the hallowed trunks of trees: and alter them, the foildiers for that they had both store of timber and saw after the workmanship but flieght and easie, made in hait certain bottomes, in which they were, like troughs without form or fashion, regarding no handomeneas at all, so they would but floe on the water, and receive burden, in which they might convey over themselves and that which they had.
N ow when they had prepared and made allready for their passage, the enemies on the other side right against them, kept and covered all the bank along with men and Horse, putting them to much trouble and fear. Anibal therefore to withdraw them from that place, commanded Hanes F the ton of * Bomein, at the left whic of the night, to go up the stream along the river side, one days journey, with part of the forces, and thole most of them Spaniards: and whereoever he first could eipie a convenient place, to cross the river, and so land as secretly as he could: and then to fetch about with his men, that when need were he might charge upon the back of the enemy.
Hereunto were appoinied certain Gauls for guides: who from thence conducted them some 25 miles above, to a little 1 and compass about with the river, which here spread out in breadth, by reason that it divided itself and thereby the channel was not so deep: where they hewed him a place ofiillage. There, in all hait they cut down and hewed timber, and made boats, to set over Horse and man and other burthen. The Spaniards made no more ado, but falling their apparel to veffels of lether like bladders, full of wind, and laying their bucklers thereupon, set aloft and Ppossed over nimby. The ret of the army alo, with joying planks and trough together, was set over.
Where having enamped near the river, as being weary with their night journey, and tollome work, they rested one day to refresh themselves, whiles their Captain studied and was occupied to execute his commision and his intended service in good and convenient time. The morning after they removed from thence, and gave knowledge by smoke that they were posset over and not far off. Which when Anibal perceived, for that he would no at the vantage of that time, he gave signal to his men alo to get over the water. Now bad the fooemen already their boats prepared and fixed. And the course and ranks of barges (which to receive and
break the force of the current from above, transported the Horsemens, besides the HorSES that swam after made for the small boats that passed beneath, a gentle and calm water. For a number of HORSES swam after the ships, hailed by the bridge reeds which were tied to the pumps, besides those which were tied and bridled, and fitted to serve the men of arms to go as ever they were landed, were betowed in barges and ferry-boats. The Gauls stood upon the bank with loud hooping, hollowing, yelling and singing after their manner, who flathing their targets over their heads, brandishing and florishing their swords in their right hands, flew themselves ready to receive them, albeit for great numbers and World of barges and boats fell in their eye over against them, together with a hideous roaring of the water, might have feared them; besides sundry noises of mariners and soldiers, who laboured and striving to break the power and force of the water, and who being on the other side of the bank encouraged their fellows that were passing over. And thus fearing enough as they were, with the tumult and noise presented before their faces; behold there arose a more fearful and terrible outcry behind their backs, upon the forcing and winning of their camp by Hannibal. And himself in person came soon after; so that they were put in fear on both sides. For not only out of the ships there was a great multitude got to Land, but also a power at their backs unlooked for, came forward and charged them. The Gauls, after they had made some resistance, and saw they were easily put back; brake through, where they espied the way to lie most open, and so in great fear they fled divers ways into their Towns and Villages. Annibal then, having converted over the rest of his forces by leisure, cared no more now for any French flits and tumults, and so encamped himself. But for the transporting of the K Elephants, I suppose there were sundry devices: and certainly, however it was, the thing is diversely recorded. Some say, that when the Elephants were gathered together upon the bank, the most courageous and fiercest of them all, was chafed, angered, and raised of purpose by his master or keeper: and when he was pursued of the beast, and to save himself fled from him, and took the River, therewith the Elephant followed after him as he swam, and so drew after him the whole drove of the rest; and as any one of them (fearing the depth) failed to wade, the very force of the River carried him to the other side. But it is more credibly and certainly reported, that they were conveyed over uncertain barges: which as it was a fater way and safer course before it was practised, so when it was done and past, it was more easily credited. They caused therefore one vessel or barge, 200 foot long, and 50 foot broad, to reach from the land side and Lady the shore into the River; which because it should not be carried down with the course and stream of the water, they fastened to the bank above with many strong ropes; and like as it had been a bridge, they covered it over with earth, that the beasts might boldly go thereon as upon the firm ground. Now there was another barge full as broad, but of length only 100 foot; fitted and appointed to pass the River and was tied and coupled thereto: and when as the Elephants (driven after the females going before) upon the steady barge, as it had been upon a cauley, were gone over into the latter which was fastened unto it; then presently was looted from the bonds whereby it was lightly tied, and so haled and drawn by certain galley boats, directed with oars through to the other bank. Thus when the first were landed, they went for more still, until they were all set over: and verified, so long as they were driven on still, as it were upon a long bridge. They nothing feared: the foremost only were afraid when the barge was loosed, and they parted from their fellows, and so were carried away into the wide and deep River, where thronging and thronging together, and juggling one another, they made some trouble, whilsts they that were on most gave back from the water almsich as they could, until such time as very fear (when they law all about them nothing but water) cauited them to be quiet. Some of them also taking beasts as they were, and unruly, fell out into the River, but by reason of their heavines, they stood sure, and calling their Governours, they sought the founds foot by foot, by little and little, and got safe to Land.

While the Elephants were thus transporting over, Annibal in the mean time had sent 500 Numidian light Horsemens to the Romans camp, as espials to discover the ground; where they knew to learn what forces they had, and sliven after their designs and purposes. This wing and troop was encompassed by three hundred Roman Horsemens, sent as is aforesaid from the mouth of Rhodanus: where there was a more cruel skirmish than for so small a number, for besides many hurt, there were slain on both sides in a manner alike: but in the end, the fear and flight of the Numidians gave the victory to the Romans; being now already much travelled and wearied: on whose part (being the winners), were slain 160, not all Romans, but some Gauls: and on the losers side who were overcome, there died above 200. This beginning and prognostication as it were of the war as it portended and prefaged an happy end and succours of the whole unto the Romans: so it was clearly plain, that the victory would hang long in equal balance, not without much effusion of blood, and danger of their part. The conflict being thus determined, they returned each one to his own Captain. As for Scipio, he could not resolve to take any course himself; but according as he saw the plots and enterprises of the enemy, so to frame his own. And Annibal again being uncertain whether to go forward with his journey begun, into Italy, or to give battle unto the first army of the Romans that came in his way and met him: was drawn away from all pretense of conflict by occasion of the coming of the Embassadors of the Boi, and of a great Lord and Potentate, called Matalus, who promising to be his guides unto him in his voyage, and companions in his perils, thought it good, and gave advice to invade and set upon Italy first of all before any any other war, whiles forces were entire in heart, no where put to the hazard, and to give them as it were the bent hand. The common multitude of the Carthaginians (for that the former war was not clean forgot and out of remembrance) feared their enemies but more their imminent journey, and the Alpes especially, the name whereof to men not experienced was very secret & terrible. Whereupon, Amilcar being now resolute to march onward in his journey, and to put into Italy attended his people to an audience, and by sundry means, as well by way of tribute, as also by enuironment, windeth and alwastes the minds of his soldiers, "I travel (quoth he) what sudden fright or new feat hath polished your hearts that ever before have been made unstable, who have adhered to you for twenty years, and always won the victory, who departed not out of Spain, before that all those Nations and Lands, which lie enclosed between two diverse Seas, were brought in subjection to the Carthaginians; who taking indignation and great disdain that the people of Rome should require all those to be yeilded unto justice (as offenders and malefactors) that had besieged Siciliam, have thereupon passed the river Ilen, with this intent even to destroy and extirp the Roman name, and to set free the whole world out of their servitude, and to have mingled upon the battlefields a name which long after his travel from Eoliens to Wolf from the setting of the sun, the rising of the sun: now when ye see the greater part (by far) of one journey done, and the worst and mountain of Pyrenees, and moderate and melancholy nations incumbrant: that great river that was passed over in three the greatest thousand Gauls, that would have impeded your passage yeare and the fears of this time is to come now, Lay, when you are within the sight of the Alpes to the other side whereof beareth low close and quiet as it were, and land still tidied at the gates of the enemies, Why? what other thing take ye the Alpes to be but high hills? And imagine they be higher than the cliffs of Pyrenean, where there is no land (I am sure) that reaches up to heaven, and no place for men unprotected. But for the Alpes, they are inhabited and they are tilled they be bread and seed living creatures and cattle; and are they a fertile and miserable for some few, unprofitable for whole armies. These very Embassadors whom you see here, drew not over the Alpes with wings, neither were their armies time out of mind born and bred there; but came from other parts as strangers and inhabited by so many good days passed by they were vanquished or else made to acknowledge with a steady hope, that the good fields that lie between Tyberis and the walls of Ramo are the end of your journey.
